

Every person who maliciously cuts, defaces, breaks or injures any book, map, chart, picture, engraving, statue, coin, model, apparatus, or other work of literature, art, mechanics or object of curiosity, deposited in any public library, gallery, museum or collection is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Penal Code of California,
1915, Section 623,

✓ 242483

For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

<http://archive.org/details/nation204jannewy>

GAMBLE ON THE JORDAN JOE ALEX MORRIS, Jr.

THE
NATION

JANUARY 2, 1967 35 cents

242483

BURLINGAME
JAN 4 1967
LIBRARY

THE LOGIC & LIMITS OF TECHNOLOGY

HARVEY WHEELER

Means, Ends & Human Institutions

•
LORD BOWDEN

How Much Science Can We Afford?

'LA VIDA' AND US

Oscar Lewis / ELMER BENDINER

'Overtaken by Events' / WILLIAM APPLEMAN WILLIAMS

'My Fourteen Months with Castro' / KAL WAGENHEIM

LETTERS

material evidence

New York City

DEAR SIR: Your editorial, "Those Missing Exhibits" [Nov. 14], misses a point which seems also to have eluded all the other writers commenting on the situation.

Since when does the family of a murder victim have the right to decide what is and what isn't evidence, and when, if ever, it may be examined, and by whom?

According to the Bureau of Census estimates, 8,500 people were murdered in the U.S. in 1963, one of whom was John F. Kennedy. Presumably the other families were equally bereaved and substantially worse off. Did any of these decide what evidence the authorities would be permitted to examine? Wouldn't this constitute withholding evidence in a felony?

Robert S. Calese

myth and rhetoric

Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Jack Newfield's article ["The Bobby Phenomenon," The Nation, Nov. 14] is myth making in the greatest sense of the word. As a member of "the young, the black, the alienated, the romantic, the educated," I do not feel these groups will be so easily deceived into thinking they need this . . . leader who only identifies with them in that rhetoric he supposedly deplores so much as Newfield asserts. The biggest myth of all is that any real change desired and needed by these people will be achieved by replacing the "liberal" Democratic President Johnson with another "liberal" Democrat called Robert Kennedy.

O. Marshall Seavey

Russian poets

Clinton, N.J.

DEAR SIR: The lesson about poets that the world has never seemed to learn is that, though they may write lovely poetry, they are inclined all too often to be essentially irresponsible, through a failure of intelligence and a one-sided sensibility. Thus they become—the concomitant of irresponsible—dangerous. Nations which put them in jail are often only looking to survival, a time-honored, well-recognized prerogative of nations. . . .

The degree of irresponsibility, born of ignorance, or shall we say stupidity, rather than malice, of such figures as Pasternak, Siniavsky and Daniel was profound. It boils down to who is to be served—"the greatest good of the greatest number" or the willful, capricious and unreliable private sensibility?

Bruce Watson

New York City

DEAR SIR: Simon Karlinsky's book review ["Yevtushenko and the Underground Poets," The Nation, Nov. 21] . . . proved, in an erudite way, that Yevtushenko is rather a mediocre poet [but] . . . Professor Karlinsky avoided any political implications in his analysis. . . . Yevtushenko is often described as a "rebel" and a courageous one, but it seems his courage and revolt were always in harmonious accord with the Politburo's aims, claims and needs: in other words—only when courage and rebellion were allowed to certain carefully chosen writers and intellectuals. . . . The warm ballyhoo given to Yevtushenko by the American press, presenting him as the charming "bad boy" of Russian literature, the embarrassing appreciation from men like Robert Kennedy, Arthur Miller and John Steinbeck, seems to me a serious moral defeat for intellectual America. It constitutes an insult to all those who really work to enlarge the margin of human dignity and intellectual independence in the Soviet Union . . . and who cannot dream of getting an exit visa to visit even Poland or Czechoslovakia. . . .

Leopold Tyrmand

EDITORIALS

Peace and the Pentagon

The Hanoi bombings of December 13 and 14 represent an egregious piece of mismanagement and clumsy public relations. What could have been more stupid than to bomb within or close to the city as the Christmas cease-fire approached, while the Pope's plea for peace was still reverberating in people's minds and Senator Mansfield had added his voice to the same end, and when U Thant, surely not without preconditions, had consented to remain as Secretary General of the UN? The unhappy Robert McCloskey at State was left holding the bag until, two days later, the Pentagon released a map showing the "city limits" of Hanoi, to support a contention that the bombs had fallen no closer than 2½ miles from this boundary. Suppose enemy bombers scored hits on Teaneck or Yonkers, would there not be a basis for a protest that New York City had been under attack? Among neutrals, and men of good will everywhere, more credence will be given to the North Vietnamese protests than to the Pentagon's excuses.

But was it mere clumsiness that Hanoi was punished precisely at this juncture? Whenever peace talk has been in the air, some such incident has occurred. A pattern so uniform at least raises the suspicion that someone must be misreading instructions or construing them in such a way as to obstruct moves for peace. President Johnson is said to be selecting the North Vietnamese bombing targets personally. But, as Richard Fryklund points out in the Washington Star, the President "does not . . . approve each day's bombing, leaving that decision to the military." Further: "The decision this week to attack the Hanoi area was made by the military when the weather cleared, according to Pentagon sources." (Italics added.) Whoever gave the orders for these operations at this particular time was surely not so stupid as to overlook their political significance. One is almost forced to conclude that these tried and true methods of upsetting possible progress toward negotiations have been applied by design.

If so, we must expect more of the same, in one guise or another. Nevertheless, hopes that the United States will cease escalating the war and make serious overtures for peace have been raised by Ambassador Goldberg's letter of December 19, asking U Thant to take "whatever steps you consider necessary to bring about the necessary discussions which could lead to a cease-fire." Hopes have been dashed so often that no seasoned observer will regard this overture with glowing optimism, but it may mark the beginning of the long and difficult process of ending the war. For one thing, it is not accompanied by the circus atmosphere of a "peace offensive," with ambassadors of good will dispatched to all parts of the world to prove that the North Vietnamese, the Vietcong and the Chinese Communists are reckless aggressors if they do not accept our generous offer. This time the tone is quiet and the language has a chastened sound, quite unlike the earlier phrasing, which could be summed up as a demand that the enemy come to the conference table or have his head bashed in.

But there is a more cogent reason for regarding the current moves as something more than a smoke screen for further enlargement of the war. A headline in the New York World Journal Tribune reads: "Johnson Up to Neck in Troubles," and this observation is echoed in newspapers all over the country. And, as all agree, the chief of Mr. Johnson's troubles, and the cause of most of the others, is the war in Vietnam. Rarely if ever in American history has a President been plunged so quickly from the pinnacle of success and popularity to public disapprobation. He has little time to extricate himself before the electioneering of the 1968 campaign begins in earnest. Since Mr. Johnson has always understood foreign policy primarily in its effect on domestic politics, he must be looking for a way out of the disastrous impasse into which he has led the country—and himself.

Possibly, also, the article by McGeorge Bundy in the current issue of Foreign Affairs reflects a growing anxiety within the Johnson Administration about the U.S. course in Southeast Asia. Reading Mr. Bundy's present views, one finds it hard to believe that only a few months ago he was one of the principal advocates of a hard line toward the North Vietnamese and the Chinese Communists. Now he tells us that a victory for Ho Chi Minh "would not mean automatic communization of all Asia, and the defeat of aggression would not mean an end to the pervasive—if sometimes exaggerated—threat of China." Bundy's thesis is that this and other foreign policy questions should not be viewed as black and white but in shades of gray. To try to defeat Hanoi would be wrong, this new Bundy argues, on three counts: it would carry great risk of war with China and the Soviet Union; it would engage us in a "new and terrible contest for which we have no taste or need"—a contest for the future of North Vietnam; and it would not settle the issue in the South.

But it is precisely these three risks which Mr. Johnson is now confronting. The new Bundy, not the old, is the one to whom Mr. Johnson should lend his ear, and perhaps that is the view to which he is now turning.

Science and State

The desuetude of the Department of State cannot be blamed solely on Secretary Rusk, although he cannot be absolved either. Under his leadership State has fallen as far behind the times as the Post Office. This is not a mere matter of inconvenience, but a condition that adds to the dangers of an already precarious world situation. (See article by Smith Simpson, for many years a State Department foreign officer, to be published in The Nation January 9.) A generally neglected factor in State's disability is discussed by Prof. Eugene B. Skolnikoff of M.I.T. in the November 25 issue of Science. State acts almost as if the science-technology revolution had never occurred. It has a science office, but the post of Director of International Scientific and Technological Affairs has been vacant for more than two years and efforts to fill it have so far been unsuccessful. Recent history tells why. An earlier version of the office, established in 1950, was allowed to atrophy by Secretary Dulles. In 1958, after

IN THIS ISSUE

January 2, 1967

EDITORIALS

2

ARTICLES

6 Gamble on the Jordan

242483

Joe Alex Morris, Jr.

Logic & Limits of Technology:

9 Means, Ends and Human Institutions

Harvey Wheeler

17 How Much Science Can We Afford?

Lord Bowden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

22 Outside the Kingdom of the Middle Class

Elmer Bendiner

23 Last Chance for Democracy

William A. Williams

24 The Ultimate Antientropy (poem)

Theodore Weiss

25 Bridge to Disenchantment

Kal Wagenheim

26 Recent Books on Latin America

Marysa Navarro Gerassi

26 An Anthology of Nothings

H. R. Wolf

27 To Solve a Paradox

Victor Rabinowitz

28 War (poem)

Ned O'Gorman

29 Fluoroscoping the AMA

Richard Carter

29 Theatre

Harold Clurman

31 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Science
CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Vol. 204
No. 1

the Sputnik crisis, efforts were made to revive it, but the performance since then has not been such as to attract a first-rate man when the post became vacant.

As Skolnikoff puts it, "The Secretary of State's role as chief policy adviser to the President will . . . be increasingly in jeopardy if the Department . . . continues to be deficient in effective technical-political competence, while the issues with which it must deal involve ever more sophisticated scientific and technological elements."

The fact that State can get, for the asking, scientific or technical advice from agencies which are well informed in their particular fields is precisely why it needs an office of its own to evaluate such counsel. Skolnikoff cites several instances: one will suffice to show the nature of the difficulty, although not necessarily as Skolnikoff sees it. In 1962, Khrushchev included in his congratulatory telegram on the Glenn orbital flight an offer for cooperation in space. President Kennedy asked the appropriate agencies to develop proposals for a reply. The National Aeronautics and Space Administration came forward with decided views. Its performance in the recent Gemini series has, of course, been brilliant, but the fact remains that, then and now, the idea foremost in the minds of the NASA managers has been to beat the Russians to the moon. It was hardly necessary for them to knock down foolish schemes like mating a Soviet lunar capsule with an American rocket, or putting a Russian and an American pilot into a space vehicle. But they also dismissed practical possibilities for cooperation (not necessarily limited to the United States and the USSR) which would have assisted the astronauts and taxpayers of both countries, while continuing to give full scope to the initiative and ingenuity of the engineers. Instead, for "technical" reasons, NASA killed all ideas that might have resulted in cooperation on a significant scale. Handicapped as it was, the State Department could neither advance proposals of its own nor raise questions that might have exposed NASA's built-in parochialism.

The actual danger inherent in the present situation is illustrated by the confrontation in the Cuban missile crisis, which Skolnikoff does not mention. (He does refer to the siting of U.S. intermediate-range missiles in Europe in the mid-fifties, and the later Skybolt contretemps.) In Cuba we were in the stronger position and Khrushchev had to yield, but the Defense Department may overestimate the power of a weapons system, or the American advantage in a strategic situation. If an adversary knows such an evaluation to be excessive but the State Department does not, matters may proceed to a lethal showdown.

Aside from such hazards, under the present setup opportunities for positive action are being neglected. Developments in such fields as health, transport and agriculture should weigh in the formulation of foreign policy. While technology is pulling the nations together into one world, the United States, foremost in the field, is technologically backward in its foreign secretariat.

The deficiency will not be easy to remedy. It is not only a matter of getting the right man for the job in the sense of scientific and engineering competence; he must be something of a statesman as well. Men possessed of such composite talents exist but, assuming that one of them can be induced to apply for the job, unless the Secretary and his senior officers are persuaded of the importance of science and technology in the department's operations, the efforts of any individual will come to nought. Yet, as things stand, the fact that a serious deficiency exists is scarcely recognized in the high echelons.

The History Makers

The decision of the Kennedy family to support Jacqueline Kennedy in her suit to block publication of William Manchester's Death of a President has stimulated an outpouring of accusations, explanations, intimations and protestations unparalleled in the history of American publishing. At a time when the United States is mired abroad in its most hated and dishonorable war, and is faced at home with crises in the whole spectrum of its social problems, the attention of the country (and indeed of the world) is riveted on this fight between the late President's widow and the man designated to narrate the "official" account of Mr. Kennedy's last hours on earth.

The uproar may be fascinating but it is not informative. However, one thing plain to any observer is that a number of allegedly knowledgeable people involved themselves in an exceedingly unwise venture. Mr. Manchester should have known better than to sign a paper which gave the Kennedys—of all proud and opinionated people—the right to pass on his manuscript, line by line; the family and their associates should not have supposed that if they talked to Mr. Manchester with what seems to have been almost compulsive candor he would have the wit or will to suppress any confidences that might prove embarrassing; and Look magazine was, to say the least, incautious to pay an absurdly large sum for a manuscript whose clearance for publication rested on the optimistic interpretation of an ambiguous telegram. A number of people are being hurt by the consequences of supposing that history can be written to order.

The cascading notoriety of the affair is a function of the universal preoccupation with the details of the assassination. This is perhaps the most unfortunate aspect of a thoroughly deplorable episode. It now appears that Mrs. Kennedy and Mr. Manchester have been able to find ways of accommodating their differences. But the impression will inevitably be left with the citizens that—once again—a curtain has been dropped between them and a crucial event in their country's history.

If Americans in public life and the public eye will learn from this battle of wills to keep their hands off history, the attention currently being paid to Mrs. Kennedy's suit may not in the end seem so grotesquely out of scale.

Liebman on the Burning Deck

In an editorial, "That Committee Again" (November 28), we summarized our efforts to make clear to the public and Congress the simple fact that the Committee of One Million Against the Admission of Communist China is essentially the Committee of One—a promotion of Marvin Liebman, an enterprising press agent who specializes in right-wing causes. It is the nature of the profession that every publicist needs a full-blown sense of his own importance and powers of persuasion; Mr. Liebman's gifts in this line are legendary. The committee was organized in 1953, with the mission of obtaining a million endorsements to a fiery declaration of opposition to Communist China's admission to the United Nations and U.S. recognition of the Peking regime. The goal was achieved, largely through Mr. Liebman's energy, militancy and gall. Membership on the committee was automatic by virtue of the endorsement. Hundreds of nationally known names were recruited, including many members of Congress.

Each autumn, just before the General Assembly took up the question of China's admission to the UN, the committee bought space in a few leading newspapers to reiterate its stand. The last such manifesto appeared in the October 31 New York Times. Once again the committee triumphed (China was turned down more decisively than in the previous year); at the same time there were more misgivings as to its stand. These doubts culminated on December 17 with the formal resignation of Sen. Jacob K. Javits from the committee, on the ground that its position is so inflexible that it "forecloses even the hope of negotiation" with Peking. Mr. Javits told Mr. Liebman that while the great majority of nations participating in the latest UN vote believe that many issues remain to be settled before Peking "can claim respectable status in the eyes of the world," this did not mean that they wished to "cease efforts to bring Communist China into the community of nations."

By itself, Mr. Javits' withdrawal would scarcely have warranted the page 1 story which appeared in The New York Times, but he took the unusual step of sending copies of his letter of resignation to forty-nine other Senators and 284 Representatives who were still nominally members. The Times story suggested that members of Congress "had begun to have doubts about continuing to endorse the committee's policies." Evidently Mr. Javits wished to assuage their fears that constituents would find them guilty of the most intolerable offense a member of Congress can commit—allowing anyone to suspect that he might be "soft on communism." Perhaps forewarned of Mr. Javits' defection and the alienation of other Congressmen, Mr. Liebman announced on the same day that names of Congressional members would no longer appear on committee letterheads and publications. With these names missing, and with further withdrawals in prospect, the Committee of One Million may perhaps shrink to Marvin Liebman and a part-time secretary, which is just about what its importance warrants.

A Most Uncommon Man

This and future generations will forever be in debt to Irving W. Halpern, who died on December 10 at the age of 77. He was a most uncommon man. His public life, which spanned over fifty years, was a rare example of farsightedness and indefatigability in the service of enlightened principles of penology. An early advocate of probation in preference to imprisonment, a cause he was espousing as early as 1910, he brought to his work a formidable array of talent.

He was born in Russia and came to this country as a small child, where he was obliged to end his schooling early to go to work. Thus he later became probably the only high school dropout on the faculty of a major university, teaching criminology to graduate students at New York University School of Law. He was an accomplished writer, author of many works on crime and probation which are among today's standard reference works. Among his friends, Irving Halpern was a brilliant wit and an engaging storyteller who, had he so chosen, could have led a successful life in the theatre. He brightened his immediate world as he enlightened his profession.

His widow is Judge Caroline Simon of the New York Court of Claims, and New York's former Secretary of State. But the name of Mrs. Irving Halpern is as honorable a title as any she has won or worn.

The Hoffa Decision

From time to time the Supreme Court fails to bring its full resources to bear on an important issue, usually with the result that the issue is not properly settled and returns to haunt the Court in the future. The Hoffa decision belongs in this category. Two Justices, White and Fortas, did not participate in the decision. Justices Clark and Douglas would not have granted the writ of certiorari in the first place. The lower and intermediate appellate courts had found that the government had not planted an informer on Hoffa; Justices Clark and Douglas would have let the matter rest on this finding and for that reason took no part in the proceedings. The result was a 4-to-1 decision in which only the Chief Justice, to his credit, saw and met the issue squarely. Before discussing this issue, it should be kept in mind that the Court consented to review only one aspect of the case, namely, whether evidence obtained by means of deceptively planting a secret informer in the quarters and councils of the defendant during the trial violated his rights under the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Amendments. The Court did not review the question of what effect the barrage of anti-Hoffa publicity, much of which had been stimulated by the Attorney General, had had upon his right to a fair trial. And the Court did not pass on the question of the effect the government's intensive electronic surveillance of the defendant and his counsel had on "the right to counsel" (see "The Hoffa Trial" by Fred J. Cook, The Nation, April 27, 1964).

The question, then, came down to this: Edward Grady Partin, a local official of the Teamsters, against whom serious charges (embezzlement, kidnaping and manslaughter) were pending in the state and federal courts, was admittedly a government informer when he visited Hoffa and volunteered to aid him during the trial. Partin was paid by the government for the incriminating evidence he supplied and for the almost daily reports he furnished the prosecution of what was going on in the defense headquarters. Nevertheless, four members of the Court decided that since Partin had actually testified on direct examination only to matters which Hoffa had said outside the presence of his attorneys, the right to counsel had not been infringed. As Justice Stewart put it, "Partin did not enter the suite by force or by stealth. He was not a surreptitious eavesdropper." In brief, the Fourth Amendment offers no protection against misplaced confidence. While this reasoning is clear enough, it places such a narrow interpretation on "the right to counsel" as to make a mockery of that right.

The Chief Justice, who as district attorney of Alameda County had occasion to rely on the testimony of some extremely unsavory informers, lashed out at Partin's role in the Hoffa prosecution. Partin's motive, the Chief Justice said, for being an informer was "his strong desire to work his way out of jail and out of his various legal entanglements with the state and federal governments." Partin, he noted, had "been uniquely successful in satisfying that motive. . . . In the four years since he first volunteered to be an informer against Hoffa, he has not been prosecuted on any of the serious charges for which he was at that time jailed, and the state charges seem to have vanished into thin air." The Chief Justice said of Partin:

This type of informer, and the uses to which he was put in this case, evidence a serious potential for undermining the integrity of the truth-finding process in the federal courts. Given the incentives and background of Partin, no conviction should be allowed to stand when based heavily on his testimony. And that is exactly the quicksand upon which these convictions rest, because without Partin, who was the principal government witness, there would probably have been no convictions here. Thus, although petitioners make their main arguments on constitutional grounds and raise serious Fourth and Sixth Amendment questions, it should not even be necessary for the Court to reach those questions. For the affront to the quality and fairness of federal law enforcement which this case presents is sufficient to require an exercise of our supervisory powers.

In another case which also involved a Teamster official (Dave Beck), Justice Douglas had occasion to say in the course of a dissenting opinion: "This case shows the need to make as sure as it is humanly possible that one after whom the mob and public passions are in full pursuit is treated fairly." The majority opinion on the Hoffa case may be technically sound, but the Chief Justice's indignant dissent will convince most thoughtful persons that Hoffa was not fairly treated. The precedent which the majority opinion establishes—if it is permitted to stand—will surely return to haunt the Court in the future.

GAMBLE ON THE JORDAN

JOE ALEX MORRIS, Jr.

Mr. Morris is Middle East correspondent for the Los Angeles Times. He has been reporting from the Arab world over the past fifteen years.

Beirut

The danger of war is ever present in the Middle East. It is not so much a danger of intent: everyone knows where his enemies' ambitions lie. Rather, the critical point centers on miscalculations in strategy.

Thus when Syria's President Nureddin Atassi publicly offered arms recently to any Jordanians who wanted to revolt against King Hussein, the resulting tension did not even close the borders. Conversely, rarely has reaction to an isolated event gotten so out of hand as in the case of Israel's punitive raid on three Jordanian villages in the Mount Hebron area last November 13. At dawn on that Sunday, Israeli forces struck at the border village of Samu some 10 miles south of Hebron, and at two other hamlets. It was a retaliation raid, Israel said, for terrorist activities emanating from these places.

The Israelis appeared anxious to avoid casualties, and by Jordanian account only six civilians were killed in the action. But anyone who walked through Samu, as I did the day after the raid, could see from the rubble-strewn street that more houses were destroyed than the forty acknowledged at first by Israel. The UN later put the number at 125. The international chorus of disapproval, capped by the Security Council's formal vote of censure against Israel, made many people both inside the Jewish state and outside wonder whether it had been worth while—particularly since Israel itself had proclaimed that the base for Arab terrorism was Syria, not King Hussein's pro-Western principality.

There are at least three possible explanations for Israel's action. The first is simply that the "hawks" in Israel's inner councils became exasperated by the mounting wave of terrorist attacks and decided to strike at the easiest target. Actions against Syria have been tried before, but the mountainous terrain along the Syrian frontier makes them difficult. That is the simplest explanation, but it raises the question of whether Israel's leaders would risk the international consequences for so little gain, especially when similar raids into Jordan in 1965 obviously had little effect. In addition, the action led to grave disturbances on Jordan's West Bank, and has put King Hussein into an embarrassing confrontation not only with the Arab states but with the Palestinian two-thirds of Jordan's population. If the young King should go, his replacement is hardly likely to be pro-Israel. The border has been fairly quiet since Samu, but few people think it will stay that way.

A second explanation—endorsed by no less an expert than President Nasser's unofficial press spokesman—is that Israel wants to create trouble for Jordan in the hope of taking over the rest of old Palestine when the Hashemite empire goes up in flames. Many Arabs, and quite a number of other people, are convinced that Israel must follow a policy of territorial expansionism as publicly urged by the Harut party, among others. The easiest and most obvious chunk of land is the West Bank, whose incorporation into Jordan by Hussein's grandfather is not recognized by most other Arabs.

The third notion is that Israel thought the time ripe to jab the Arabs again, both to keep them off balance and before they get too uppity. The mounting number of terrorist incidents inside Israel would certainly have played a part in such thinking. Probably the most important of these episodes was the sabotage last fall of three apartment buildings in a Jerusalem suburb. Nobody was hurt and damage was slight, but psychologically it brought the enemy to the doorstep of every Israeli citizen.

Samu certainly produced quick political results. The attack set the Arabs battling tooth and nail—not against Israel but among themselves. Rarely have the recriminations and backbiting reached the present level, not to mention the outright appeals pouring from Cairo and Damascus radio stations for Palestinians to revolt against King Hussein.

Furthermore, it has brought into question—and into open debate for the first time—the whole concept of the United Arab Command. The UAC was a creature of the Arab summits, and its mission was to build for the day of reckoning with Israel. It had oil money from the affluent, and cannon fodder from the crowded streets and refugee camps in Jordan and the Gaza strip. The UAC also had a military plan, and the essence of it was that the Arabs should at all costs avoid a premature major engagement with Israel. The target date was 1970, or thereabouts. Meanwhile, Kuwait and Saudi money was to be used to help the poorer Arab states build up respectable military machines, and buy supersonic airplanes and modern ground equipment.

The Samu attack turned these plans into a shambles. The Jordanians have publicly complained about the lack of Egyptian air cover over Mount Hebron—a responsibility assigned to the Egyptians under the master plan. Cairo has countered by charging that Jordan refused to permit Egyptian planes to operate from the West Bank, and also blocked plans to move Iraqi and Saudi troops into Jordanian front-line positions. Jordan has come back to taunt Egypt with hiding behind the buffer of United Nations troops in the Sinai, and the Syrians—whipped up, as usual, to the maddest frenzy—have, as noted, offered arms to anti-Hussein elements in Jordan and pledged their army to assist when the insurrection starts.

From an Israeli point of view, the crowning success of the Samu strategy came when Syria launched Arab terrorists on sabotage missions—not into Israel, but into Jordan.

Yet when all the chips are counted, will the Israelis still be congratulating themselves for their cleverness? The Israelis were surprised at Samu when the hopelessly outnumbered Jordan frontier forces stood and fought. They were even more surprised when Jordan army reinforcements rushed into an ambush, then stood and fought—again under extremely adverse conditions after their vehicles had been shot out from underneath them (according to Western intelligence reports from Tel Aviv).

The Samu raid had one positive result from the Arab point of view. King Hussein is now committed to arming the frontier villages, something he had promised vaguely to do in the past but never carried out. From now on, the Arab world will watch closely to see that he keeps his word.

If one believes in an eventual Arab-Israeli military confrontation, as most Arabs do, Samu produced other benefits for the Arab side. The United States has agreed to speed up deliveries of some thirty-six early-model F-104 fighters to Jordan, and Washington has indicated it will give a sympathetic hearing to other Jordanian requests for “defensive” weaponry, such as armored personnel carriers. Both announcements were, of course, made largely to take the political pressure off Hussein, and in fact there is little point in delivering the Starfighters in advance of their programmed date because the Jordanian pilots won't be ready to fly them. Still, the announcements reflected America's deep concern about the fate of the Hashemite King. And there is good reason to worry, for never before has the 31-year-old Hussein been under so much pressure from all sides.

Since Samu, Cairo, Damascus and the Cairo-based Palestine Liberation Organization have mounted a drum-fire against the pro-Western monarch, accusing him of being a pawn of the Western powers and soft on Israel. The accusation stings, because Hussein has little control over his own foreign policy, so long as he is dependent on American and British subsidies to keep his barren country going.

Domestically, the Samu attack resulted in the most serious disorders on the West Bank since that area was incorporated into Jordan. There were general strikes in the main towns of Jerusalem, Nablus, Ramallah and Hebron (only Bethlehem, with its penchant for the tourist dollar, stayed relatively clear of involvement). And almost everywhere, the strikes and accompanying protest demonstrations led to violence. After seventy-two hours of mounting troubles, Hussein had to call in crack Bedouin units of the army. The most feared of these are the desert patrol, which still dresses in the flowing ankle-length skirts worn by the Arab of the desert.

These troops are popularly known as “Glubb's Girls,” after Gen. John Bagot Glubb, the last British commander of the old Arab Legion, and their appearance sends a shiver of fear down every Palestinian's back. When they discard their flowing red and white checked headdresses for tin helmets, the shop shutters ring down with alacrity all over the West Bank. The Jordan army quickly re-established control, at the cost of eight civilian and security forces dead. But this is only the first step if there is ever to be a real reconciliation of the East and West Banks of the Jordan River under King Hussein's aegis.

The bitterness between the Palestinians, who form two-thirds of Jordan's population, and the old Jordanians who still run the government and almost everything else, is deep and real. It will not be overcome by platitudes such as King Hussein's constant repetition that "All Palestinians are Jordanians; all Jordanians are Palestinians."

The hostility was very much in evidence in the walled Old City of Jerusalem on the day when two anti-government demonstrators were killed by gunfire. Crowds roamed the narrow, cobblestoned streets, screaming filthy abuse of the King; on the wall of the government hospital, one of the wounded scrawled dramatically in his own blood the slogan: "We died for Palestine. Long live Egypt and Palestine."

What made the West Bank disturbances really serious was the fact that almost the entire Palestinian political leadership came out in support of the protests. The strike committees formed in the big towns included religious leaders, mayors and parliamentarians. Hussein's immediate reaction was to stop the political protest as his Bedouins had stopped the demonstrations. He banned a scheduled meeting in Jerusalem which was intended to draw up a list of grievances. The King probably had little choice. It was well known in advance that the assembly of notables would ask for drastic changes in Jordan's policy, and this could have been interpreted only as a sharp defeat for the government and for Hussein himself.

These repressive measures solved nothing, of course. The lid is back on the West Bank, but the pot continues to simmer. The question many Israelis are publicly asking is: was Samu worth it? From the point of view of Israel's own security, it hardly seems so. Heretofore, the West Bank had gone along with a sort of uncomfortable coexistence with the East Bank, with occasional isolated political eruptions. The zooming revenues from the tourist trade in the Holy Land were every year making this coexistence more palatable. In Jordan as a whole, the GNP was mounting at a healthy 8 or 9 per cent every year, and the first symptoms of an economic boom were beginning to be felt after years of making ends meet.

This boom is largely artificial, due in part to heavy injections of U.S. and other foreign aid. But both Jordanians and pro-Nasser Palestinians were beginning to make comparisons with the Socialist paradise down in Egypt and coming up with the answer that Jordan was not doing so badly after all. The renewal of the East Bank-West Bank confrontation has scotched any hope that this modest swing toward accepting the political realities of the Middle East today would continue. Is that what Israel really wanted?

Many political observers here have severe doubts about the effectiveness of any reprisal policy under present conditions. The Syrians, who are largely responsible for the terrorism that prompted it, were jubilant over the Samu raid; it gave them a golden opportunity to point out what happens to pro-Western Arab states. The bickering within the United Arab Command only confirmed what everybody already knew: that the UAC is ridden with dissension on key policy matters such as stationing and movements of troops. Nor would future reprisal raids against Syria be likely to change things very much. The Syrians have a knack for turning military embarrassments into political triumphs, much as Nasser did with the Suez campaign of 1956.

In fact, Samu probably helped the Syrians more than anyone else. It took the spotlight off the unstable and leftist regime in Damascus. Political tension drained out of the Syrian capital: for the first time in months, the Soviet T-34 tanks usually parked around the military headquarters in downtown Damascus were removed.

The Israeli attack on Samu thus appears to have helped Israel's worst enemies the most, and harmed grievously those of its Arab enemies least likely to rock the boat. This brings up the question: if not retaliation, what? There is no easy answer, but the solution might lie in what has happened in the divided village of Beit Safafa. Two years ago, the Israelis replaced the rusty barbed wire fence on the border there with a strong chain-link affair. There haven't been any incidents in Beit Safafa since. It could be argued that building a fence all around Israel would be expensive. It could also be argued that it would, in the long run, be cheaper than anything else in both political and human terms. Or perhaps the Israelis don't want to fence themselves in and the Arabs out. So, at any rate, believe many Arabs who view Israeli strategy in terms of long-range expansionism.

Where in the midst of this slowly cooking pile stands Gamal Abdel Nasser, who for all his domestic and other problems remains the key man in any Middle Eastern situation? The evidence is that—as he has so often in the past—the Egyptian rais finds himself straddling two divergent paths.

The most obvious is his support for "progressive" and "liberationist" movements everywhere in the Arab world, and his opposition to the conservatives, led by King Faisal of Saudi Arabia. Yet Nasser is quite obviously not prepared for a confrontation with Israel, and perhaps not even with King Hussein.

The Egyptians have rejected Hussein's taunts about hiding behind a UN protective umbrella in the Sinai with the highly dubious riposte that the UN emergency force is not there to seal off the border between Arab and Jew. With a limited and steadily declining number of men, the UN umbrella is largely symbolic; but then it always has been, and it has been effective because neither Israel nor Egypt will risk the international umbrage involved in challenging it.

There are signs that the Egyptians do not share the Syrians' determination to rub out Hussein and the Hashemite monarchy either. True, the Cairo radio is full of its usual venom and invective, as are the Egyptian papers. But when Palestine Liberation Organization leader Ahmed Shukairy said he would eventually lead Palestinian troops back into Jordan's West Bank, regardless of whether Hussein wanted them or not, Egyptian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Riad commented succinctly that Shukairy spoke for himself, not the Egyptian Government.

The best prognosis, then, is that the Egyptians want to keep the political boat rocking, but are not ready to see it overturned. At least not if the end result were to be another round of big-power intervention in the Middle East.

LOGIC & LIMITS OF TECHNOLOGY

In recent years, and particularly since the publication in 1964 of Jacques Ellul's The Technological Society (see Robert Theobald's review, The Nation, October 19, 1964), there has been a growing belief that scientific and technical acceleration, while not necessarily beneficial, must be accepted because technology is driven by a self-propelling logic that operates quite independently of human choice and direction. "Within the technical circle," to quote Ellul, "nothing else can subsist because technique's proper motion . . . tends irresistibly toward a completeness. To the degree that this completeness is not yet attained, technique is advancing, eliminating every lesser force."

While Ellul's powerfully integrated argument has had the desirable effect of arousing public interest on the need to control and direct the technological process, it has also inadvertently contributed to the myth of the inevitability of this process. Since the subject is one of prime importance, The Nation, in accordance with a practice of recent years of devoting the year-end issue to a general subject of major intellectual concern, has devoted the bulk of this issue to two essays which approach the problem of the growth of science and the spread of technology along converging lines. Harvey Wheeler, a staff member of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions, and the author of its publications, The Rise and Fall of Liberal Democracy and The Restoration of Politics, submits Mr. Ellul's thesis to a rigorous, logical analysis, seeking to discover whether or not man is fated to be enveloped in a rigid technological mold over which he has little control. On the other hand, Lord Bowden, Principal of the Institute of Science and Technology at the University of Manchester, and until recently Minister of State for Education and Science, after demonstrating that exponential trends tend to abate—an assurance that will be gratefully received—approaches the subject from the viewpoint of priorities among the conflicting demands that modern communities make upon their common scientific resources. While these two papers deal decisively with the problems their authors set themselves, they have the virtue of all good social inquiry that implicit in their arguments is a wealth of suggestions for further investigation.

—The Editors

Means, Ends and Human Institutions

HARVEY WHEELER

Jacques Ellul makes a simple and compelling point in The Technological Society. It is that means tend to swallow up ends. This is said to happen first in the components of a civilization: in religion, in the economy, in the political order, in science, and so on. Then, gradually but inexorably, this technological revolution spreads from the part to the whole until the entire society has become one big technological phenomenon. The idea is dramatic; the empirical evidence is vivid and persuasive; it accords with the common-sense impressions we all have about the times in which we live. Everyone is familiar with organizations that begin life in profound dedication to some sublime goal and gradually mature into a concern with merely maintaining the existence of the organization and preserving the power of its leadership. It is hard to think of any long-established organizations in which this has not occurred. Especially noteworthy examples are to be found in the history of reform churches and revolutionary parties.

So run our immediate assenting reflections on first reading Ellul's book. But it is curious that the illustrations that come most easily to mind concern organizations rather than arts or crafts. Ellul is obviously on the track of something important when he expands the common-sense idea of technology to make it include all human institutions. But does he then lose the common-sense meaning of technology entirely? The fact that the most dramatic illustrations of the thesis arise from our efforts with human beings rather than with our material environment raises a preliminary question as to whether we are not really dealing with general problems of social organization rather than with the special problem of technology. Political sociologists have long pondered the drift toward oligarchical control and bureaucratic structure that besets formal organizations. Maxims about the corrupting influence of power are as old as speculation itself, and the prevention and cure of such diseases of the body politic was the special province of constitutionalism. Of course, Marx had suggested that the aims of constitutionalism would be undercut by the forces of economics. The similarities between Marx and Ellul are striking enough to remind us that it is almost impossible to prove or to disprove such propositions. They may be right; the processes they describe may be autonomous. And yet, there may be many other autonomous processes in society, each with its loyal advocates. We are inundated by a constellation of would-be causative agents, each put forward in a style that is at once aggressive and defensive, reminiscent of what would be called paranoia if found in individuals rather than ideologies. Ellul leaves the reader with so strong a feeling of this methodological paranoia that the impulse to find out where he went wrong in analysis overpowers the enthusiastic assent elicited by his compelling descriptive passages.

Two features obviously require scrutiny: the ends-means inversion and the extension of the idea of technology beyond the arts and crafts. If we are to ask whether it is possible to conceive of a means that cannot become an end in itself, one possible answer immediately presents itself: the case of a technique which, in swallowing up its initial goals, destroys itself as a technique. Moreover, the question may be turned around. Are there goals that swallow up techniques? Does the ends-means inversion run backward as well as forward?

One could say that anarchism is a goal that purports to swallow up means. Anarchism rests on a theory of social action that is nontechnological; it relies upon instinctual and nonrational forces. Anarchism claims that if these forces are not technologically interfered with they will exert themselves beneficially throughout human affairs. Revolutionary general strikes will put down technology and then creative syndics and cooperatives will take over. Anarchism assumes that the result will be harmonious—that the universe has built into it a principle of harmony which will assert itself if left alone. And, while anarchism is a puny soldier to send to battle against Ellul's massive institutional forces, it has some blood brothers that are not so summarily dismissed. Anarchism is a conception similar to the notion of mechanics in classical physics. Suppose one relies entirely upon classical mechanics to produce order in the universe. Would not that be nontechnological? We must say yes; that is, as one of its rigorous proponents once explained, classical mechanics does not require God as a hypothesis. Mechanics, of course, was but a theory, as is the technological imperative under discussion. But mechanics found impressive descriptive verification.

The laissez-faire market was viewed by its expositors as exhibiting principles of mechanics. It was self-creating, self-regulating and self-equilibrating. It follows that the market was nontechnological. It was even anti-technological. It proved that there could not be an efficacious technology for the rational design, control and operation of an economic system. Whatever one's personal position on this matter, it must be admitted that a large number of men of high intelligence regard it as being sound and practicable. So we conclude that in the realms of instinct and mechanics, nontechnological processes can at least be imagined. This leads us to a curiosity found in the technological imperative.

What is it that gives dramatic power to Ellul's technological imperative? How does technology become an autonomous force? What is it that gives it the drive to swallow up ends? How is one to describe the process by which technology overtakes and dominates all human functions? If one looks at this technological phenomenon as a whole it can only be described as an instance of mechanics. Being autonomous, it can spread of its own accord. Now what are we to make of a social order dominated by an autonomous force that swallows up human functions? At the very least, we can say that it is not, strictly speaking, a technological order. Missing is the rationality of means that is embedded in the very name of technology. If, in fact, the entire social order could be operated as a technology, Ellul's dilemma would disappear. The efficacious realization of social goals would be assured. The cure for the ills arising from the proliferation of technologies could be found in submitting them to an overall control technology. This, as we have seen, would be the opposite of a system of mechanics. The curiosity is that the technological imperative makes its inexorable way through human functions on the basis of a principle of mechanics, and yet mechanics is essentially anti-technological.

The spread of technologies brings us to the general problem of designing a technology. For even if the process is inexorable, each novel application of technology requires an initial act of design. The function of designing a technology cannot itself be made into pure technique. If that happened, the act of designing would disappear. Design is novel creation. It is distinguished from technological creation, which is routinized. This being so, if one of the characteristics of a social order is the constant design of new technologies, such an order cannot itself be called technological. It must be as fully nontechnological as it is technology designing. The function of technology design either denies the technological imperative or requires its revision to account for the design function and for the kind of society in which novel design predominates. Ellul suggests that at some point technology closes the door on design and cuts itself off from its generative principle. But if this were to happen, technology could no longer spread.

The whole force of Ellul's argument derives from what is made to appear as technology's inexorable spread. But he cannot have it both ways. The technological force that kills design stunts its own growth by the very same measure. The connection between the design of technologies and their spread brings us to the heart of the matter, the issue on which Ellul stands or falls. This is the proposition that technology spreads not only throughout all manufacturing processes but that it encompasses all other human functions as well. If this is true Ellul brings a powerful message; if not, he gives us little more than some well-classified descriptive material about industrial management and bureaucracy.

And on the other hand, if one reduces the technological imperative to the sole question of whether or not human action is capable of being routinized, then the doctrine of the spread of technology is true but it is also meaningless. Using this meaning of technology it is apparent that there has never been a nontechnological society and that the more primitive the society the more it is the witless captive of the technological imperative. This is so because when societies exist at the bare margin of subsistence, all their institutions must be dominated by the technical problems of survival. Eskimo society is an especially dramatic example.

*Mathematical drawings and diagrams
courtesy New York Public Library*

The conventional restriction of the meaning of technology to the making of things had the advantage of accounting for much that is distinctive and dehumanizing about modern industrial societies. When the technological idea is expanded to include all other human functions it sacrifices this virtue without acquiring new ones in compensation. We see this when we look beyond the mere fact of routinization and enumerate the different kinds of objects to which human routines may be applied. They are three: things, symbols and people. When subjected to routinization these objects yield crafts, idioms and organizations. The distinctions are necessary even though elements of all three may be present in most actual forms of routinized behavior.

The simplest craft depends for its survival upon some organized group to preserve and transmit it, and that transmission must employ at least some degree of logic. But even so, careful distinctions among these three functions are necessary in order to test the proposition that technology is invading every sphere of life.

What brings these different kinds of functions into existence? In each case it would be an architectonic—a design—operation. The arts and sciences bring new techniques for making things into existence. Logic and mathematics are created through philosophy. Human organizations are created through politics. The making of things cannot become progressive, cannot acquire fuller improvement, self-realization, development and articulation, without the preservation and progressive development of the arts and sciences. Problem solving cannot expand without the growth and development of philosophy. The making of new systems of rules and roles cannot spread and extend itself to larger and more complex operations without the expansion of politics. It is conceivable that a static condition might occur in which none of these departments of culture would grow or develop into new areas. This static condition, rather than the expansive condition Ellul described, would be characterized as a purely technological order. Recall the earlier example of the Eskimos. Every moment of their short, hazardous lives is spent in rigorously controlled technological routines, carefully held in a static divorce from creativity, progressive development and novel principles of design.

An age in which technology is expanding rather than one in which it is static must also be one in which art, science, philosophy and politics are expanding. And in fact they are expanding throughout the world today. Moreover, the prospect for the future seems to promise their further expansion. This follows from the nature of cybernation. Those functions that can be reduced to technological operations are precisely the ones that can be automated. This means that technology is destined to disappear into the computer rather than sweep everything before it. Ellul seems to be not only self-contradictory; he has also managed to get the story of the future backward. But even if this were not so—even if the world could be frozen into pre-cybernated patterns—the technological imperative would stop short at the threshold of symbolic and human systems. Their objects are so different from the objects of craft technologies that the idea of technology cannot be made to encompass them. This is seen by considering the pure technological situation, as for example in the famous Robinson Crusoe predicament.

Crusoe was faced with the necessity of inaugurating the basic survival technologies: tool making, food getting and the maintenance of physical comfort. He did this by devising ways to deal with different elements in his environment. Whether or not he was fully aware of the fact, he had to take advantage of the laws of nature. Technology means designing ways to harness the forces of natural determinism.

Plant a seed, water and cultivate it, and the return will be 100 to 1. It is a simple routine, a technique of farming, and it will yield enormous profits. There is nothing nature can do about agricultural technologies precisely because it is nature. That is, because it is the captive of a certain degree of determinism that can be technologically harnessed as a windmill harnesses the forces of winds. Agriculture as an example of technology consists of following a routine which, because of the determinism of nature, and to the extent that the expected determinism of nature can be relied upon in fact, will always produce the designed result. Of course, if natural determinism is interfered with, if water fails, if plant diseases strike, or if soil nutrients become depleted, the technique no longer works. The same routines will be of no avail because the natural determinism upon which they depend has somehow been tampered with. They can be rendered effective again only by a "revolution"—some novel act of creativity which redesigns the technology to accommodate the change in natural determinism. So the automaticity of technological results depends not only on the accuracy and precision of design of the technological pattern but also upon the determinism of nature.

How does this apply to symbolic systems? At first thought there seems to be nothing more technological than logic and mathematics. But what is the natural determinism on which they depend for their efficacy? In order for logic to be a technology in the precise sense described for agriculture it must have some instrumental relationship to a natural determinism. There are several possibilities.

Symbols themselves may be regarded as containing an intrinsic determinism. It would follow that a logic is merely the explication of that determinism. But if that is so, symbols are really like plants and animals. Human will has nothing to do with how they turn out. But a problem arises here because a symbol is something created by man. It is an artifact the moment it comes into existence. We are comparing a symbol, such as the number three, with a thing, such as a seed. But that is not the only problem. We are also confronted with a different kind of product. Logic creates a product in the mind. It increases knowledge. The product of grammar, logic and mathematics is education. But the educational experience is like the creative experience rather than the technological experience. It disappears if we make it technological. This would happen if logic were performed as are assembly processes in factories. The performer would not need to understand the meaning of his acts, or why his technology works. Only in such a case could we speak of logic as a technology in the same sense as machine tending. But in such a case it would not be logic. The computer permits us to convert information processing into a technology and to substitute machine tenders for mathematicians. But again, these machine tenders are not performing logical or mathematical operations, even though the result of their work is to expand rationality enormously. The point is that the educational significance of symbols depends upon their artificial immutability, whereas the technological significance of matter depends upon the plasticity implicit in its determinisms. If we behave technologically toward symbols as we do toward matter, rending the symbol three into the symbol five, we destroy the symbolic idiom.

A second possibility is to regard logic as a principle that is somehow built into the universe as a whole. It is, so to speak, the inner philosophy of the universe. A mathematical discovery would merely make explicit a part of the philosophy of the universe that was always there. This way of thinking is like that of the ancients who hypothesized a logos. Logic is merely the logos made available to the mind through symbols. But if logic is seen in this way it cannot be judged a technology. Whatever else the logos may be, it is not a technology, for it incorporates ends and goals within itself—justice, wisdom, truth, beauty and goodness.

Third, we can regard logic as a matter of convention. It is the rules and the roles that logicians adopt and then decide to obey. But if that is the case, logic again loses the character of a technology and adopts features we associate with politics. We can see this the more clearly if we hypothesize that every human function—let us say every technology—is capable of being mathematicized. This means that it is capable of being reduced to a problem-solving situation. This is the assumption of that branch of applied mathematics known as operations' research. Let us assume that it is possible. Let us further assume that the most perfect possible computer has already been built. This would mean we would possess the capacity to solve in practice all problems that in theory were capable of solution. At first glance such a world might appear to be completely technologized. It would contain one big automaton—the computer—with all knowledge inside it. All one need do is ask it questions and it will produce truth.

But then, what is this computer? Is it a machine? We know it has certain properties of machines, just as the brain has the properties of a biological organ. But it is not its machineness that defines the computer but rather its special capability of producing solutions. Now this means that no matter how many separate computing machines there might be in existence, they are all parts of the same logical universe, so in effect there is really only one computer. For remember, they are all perfectly designed and they all contain all the knowledge of the world. So it is really knowledge and truth that each one contains. Under this condition if the same problem were posed to each computer, each would always give back the same answer. So it is not really any individual computer that is doing anything. It is not really any individual computer that possesses anything. A given computer is merely the vehicle for the revelation of truth. It is, in short, a kind of symbol. It is the biggest and most complete symbol in the universe, but it is symbolic. It is, in effect, the logos. But again, we cannot predicate technological attributes of the logos. We may predicate philosophy, however. One way we might describe this revealed philosophy—this universe of symbol—is through something like the imagery of Teilhard de Chardin. His term for it was noosphere. This is what the computer reveals: our noosphere. Logic is the descriptive name we give to the various parts of the noosphere. Logic, logos, noosphere, but not technology; at least not without distorting technology into something quite un-Ellulian.

Our third candidate for technological status was politics. Here also, we need a pure example. Let us assume, as Graham Wallas once did, that a perfectly functioning Friends meeting might provide such an example. At this meeting, to suppose further, a decision has been taken to engage in a peace demonstration. The time, place and manner is established. The order of march is arranged, the songs to be sung are selected; those who will provide food, those who will speak to the press, and what will be done in the event of arrest are all provided for in advance. The result is the production of a series of designed, agreed upon, patterned rules of conduct and roles of behavior.

Now compare this process and product with our first category, the technology of making things. Determinism is lacking in two ways. In the first place it is lacking with regard to results. Even if everything proceeds precisely as planned there is no guarantee that the political authorities will react in the desired fashion. Politics is not like the cultivation of seeds. Everything may be done perfectly and still there may be no fruit. And this indeterminism of effect is known in advance. In fact, there may be a prior conviction that the demonstration will not bear fruit. In this case we may speak of the "myth" of the demonstration; that somehow a fruitless demonstration is the right thing to do regardless of the practical result. Even if the result is completely unpredictable, it is the myth that the action is virtuous that sustains the participants, rather than any expected practical result. Such behavior cannot be called technological in any sense of the term intended by Ellul. But an ineradicable element of myth inhabits all political action.

The second way in which determinism is here lacking is possibly more important. It concerns the indeterminism of the performers who have agreed to produce the action—the integrated system of roles which is the concrete substance of this piece of politics. Our example has not been a case of studying in advance the built-in behavioral determinism of these people and then manipulating them accordingly. That may be what is popularly meant by politics. It may be all that Ellul means by politics. But it is not the situation we are dealing with and it does not even come into the definition of politics as we have used the term. In politics one is always dealing with a group of individuals who are self-determining—that is, political. They decide to act according to a plan they have invented and of which they approve. That is what happens in legislation. It is only by individually deciding to adopt the allotted rules and roles that the plan—the prospective political event—can be realized. This means that the determinism characteristic of a political event is not intrinsic to the individual natures of the participants—not ineradicable, as is the germination rate of seeds. It is something that their natures have adopted, and they could have adopted a different plan and followed different roles. In political action human beings impose a determinism upon themselves and that determinism—that law—is the plan.

Compare this political plan with the technological plan previously described. The former exploited a known natural determinism. The latter is a plan which itself embodies the putative determinism ultimately to be exhibited by the synchronized actions of all participants. In both cases there is law. In both cases the law expresses determinism. In the first case one creates a technology capable of exploiting the determinism. In the second case one creates the determinism and then attempts to realize the rules and roles embodied in it. But their realization is in their performance. The act of creativity is similar in politics and in drama. It consists of playing out the roles properly; of doing through choice and rational designs what nature does through determinism.

In an extreme form we may speak of excessively legalistic behavior. Perhaps the most famous example of legalistic behavior is that of the Biblical Pharisees. Their goal was to live a holy life. It was defined as a life of ritual purity and was insured by strict adherence to the law. But this adherence to law was a knowing, self-imposed and self-conscious conformity. Otherwise it lost its meaning. This was the way one produced and exhibited virtue. No ritual is merely instrumental; it is also intrinsically holy. "The outward and obvious sign of an inward and spiritual grace." Ritual is symbol but it is also holy; just as politics is symbolic action (roles according to rules) but it also is justice, in the sense that it is just for all to obey the law. But if this is the case neither one can be a technology, for instrumentality and agency rather than goodness in itself is the distinguishing quality of a technology. If we try to argue that there is no difference between a food-growing technology and a holy ritual, because the holy ritual is a "technique" for producing holiness, we see that our error is fundamental. Ritual is not a means of producing something else. It is; it embodies the goal desired. Ritual is the opposite of technology. It brings ends into means.

What is the counter response? Can one reply that the practitioner merely believes that a ritual embodies holiness, and that from an objective standpoint it is no different from any other technology? But the point is that there cannot be an objective standpoint. We may not believe that someone else's ritual embodies the holy; on that basis, and that basis only, we say it is a technology. But this cannot be true of the believer, for if he didn't believe in the ritual's intrinsic holiness he would not observe it. The moment it becomes instrumental, that is to say, technological, it ceases to inspire his adherence.

Turn the question around. A technology does not depend upon our belief; it works regardless of belief. No behavior which inspires our adherence only as long as we believe it to embody holiness, virtue or justice can be a technology. This means that the third category of technology must be viewed in a fuller light. Human organization can never really be technological. If the technological invasion were to occur, organization as such would cease to exist.

To this point we have distinguished four kinds of processes that are so qualitatively different from technology that wherever they are present the technological imperative is inapplicable. They are: mechanics (technology may take advantage of and exploit mechanics, but the process itself is nontechnological), design, philosophy and politics. In at least two places the argument went a little further and even suggested that the contemporary world might be moving in a direction opposite from that charted by Ellul. For technology requires a sophisticated symbolic environment. It contains an intrinsic symbolic imperative. This symbolic component is fully as characteristic of a technological order as is the ends-means inversion.

Every technology tends to produce its own symbolic transformation. It follows that a technological revolution produces a symbolic revolution. Again, let us take a simple example. The art of building a house is a manual art. It involves the crafts of carpentry and masonry performed by artisans. These crafts become technologies. We can describe their technological elements. We can preserve these arts in guilds, or write them down in books. One day someone may begin to apply philosophy to the technology. Such a one asks not only how to do something but how to do it well, so that it is good and beautiful. He asks that the craft be subordinated to principles of goodness and beauty. He goes on. He asks not only how the art is performed but why it works. That is, he seeks for whatever truth there may be implicit in it. He wants a theory of the art. What he does is to abstract the elementary principles from the technology and then he formulates a theory of their operation so designed that one can work out in symbol all that is needed to make a plan that can be followed by a technologist.

Now we have something new, which we call architecture. We have a profession rather than a craft. This is a symbolic transformation of the technology of making buildings and it is devoted to different aims than was the technology from which it was drawn. It aims at beauty, goodness, wisdom and truth. Nonetheless, we can say that its principles are implicit in the original technology and that such principles are implicit in every technology. However, they must be discovered and their science must be invented by men. It is not claimed that all sciences have been produced in this fashion, but many have. Professions certainly have. The point is that a science and a profession are implicit in a technology in the same way that a technology is implicit in an art. This implication is being realized in the contemporary Western world at a furious rate. It is the process of the scientific revolution. Ellul is just one revolution too late. Technological transformation was the process of the industrial revolution. Symbolic transformation is the process of the scientific revolution. All the old technologies are in the process of acquiring their architectures—their principles of goodness, beauty, wisdom and truth—their “symbolic imperatives.” But recalling the earlier argument about logic and philosophy, it is clear that to the extent that this is true it is also true that our times possess a kind of functional telos issuing in a drive toward the articulation of philosophy. The symbolic imperative active in each technology works toward its progressive subordination to philosophy and politics. This is merely another way of stating a contemporary commonplace—that world order and planning are the twin imperatives of our times. It also confirms what Teilhard described as man’s expanding symbolic environment, what he called the noosphere.

We are far from being locked into a world helplessly dominated by a technological imperative. That very imperative, merely in articulating itself, turns into a symbolic imperative. In the end there is an even deeper implication that is profoundly architectonic. For the general symbolic idiom implied by the various separate systems is politics, the architectonic science. Ellul has unwittingly achieved a curious result. He has given us a foundation for concluding that the world is on the verge of a new flowering of political philosophy. To the extent that his facts are right, his fears are groundless. The only thing that might prevent the consummation of the symbolic revolution would be some contrary process capable of inhibiting the full articulation of technologies. But that would be the opposite of the empirical condition Ellul finds in the world.

But merely to point out inadequacies and errors in Ellul’s explanation says little or nothing about what he is trying to explain. Why is it that we feel the problem Ellul is concerned about is a real one even though his approach to it is wrong? It is at this point that Max Born joins the list of cosmic pessimists. He is concerned about the same problem. Born says that the modern world is one in which it is impossible for actions to be influenced by ethical and moral values. The culprit is not technology but science. Here we have a much more formidable adversary. Max Born claims that the necessary end product of the scientific revolution—the revolution in which science acquired power in measure for the power it bestowed—is the separation of actions from their ethical implications. The great example is the atomic bomb. The roster of those involved is a directory of giants: Einstein, Bohr, Heisenberg, Fermi, Szilard, and dozens more. “We have gathered here the greatest collection of crackpots the world has ever seen,” said General Groves to his staff on the eve of the Manhattan Project.

It was a project the scientists had initiated themselves. The story of the initial letter to Roosevelt from Einstein, Szilard and Wigner is part of the world’s imperishable folklore. Less well known is the story of the second letter sent after the collapse of Germany and recommending that the project be abandoned. It lay unattended on Roosevelt’s desk the day of his death. In retrospect, the scientists involved confess they had few moral qualms about the bomb in the beginning. The need to defeat Hitler was paramount. The fear that he might be building the bomb was enough to quiet any qualms. A man like Hitler would never refuse to use the bomb on ethical grounds; the only thing to deter such a monster would be fear of reprisal, though it was never explained how the deterrent was to be made credible without first showing what our bomb could do against an actual target. This question that was begged at the start remained to devour the ethical problem at the end. The connection between ethics and action was first stretched and finally severed entirely. Even worse was another facet of the scientific revolution revealed by the bomb. The full ethical implications of a scientific endeavor may not become apparent until many years after its consummation. This is not the fault of the scientist but it is his special burden.

Of course it has always been true that an action in the present may have unforeseeable harmful effects in the future. The invention of the automobile is the most fashionable illustration. Science raises this separation to a new level. For the more profound an innovation and the more universal its applications, the more difficult it is to forecast its effects. This was Max Born's point and it was clear that the bomb was the chief example he had in mind.

Ellul, while speaking of the same result, had attributed it to institutional forces rather than to the limits of perception. Born's proposition is simply that in order for morality to find realization in action it must be possible to perceive the consequences of action. Science is the culprit rather than technology. Science has destroyed ethics—not because of the familiar complaint that the processes and conceptions of science are ethically neutral—positivism is simply not at issue. The culprit is both simpler and more elusive. It is the objective situation in which we all find ourselves ■ ■ ■ result of the scientific revolution.

In the 1930s two economists, Berle and Means, made an elaborate statistical and legal analysis of the modern American corporation and proved that ownership had become deprived of control. Recently, some economists have carried this further, describing the virtual disappearance of ownership as a significant factor in economics. A post-ownership—"para-proprietaral"—society would be the result. Born raises an analogous question about the separation of action from effects. He asks about a post-ethical society.

What is true of ethics applies also to politics. The world of the scientific revolution has become so complex that only men of general wisdom and knowledge can run it properly. But its problems are so specialized that the generalist cannot understand them. The experts and scientists who do understand lack the general knowledge made politically necessary by the discord produced by their proliferating specialties. But this means that politics as the architectonic discipline is rendered impossible, and we must ponder not only the problem of a post-ethical but also that of a post-political world. Both problems concern the special insufficiencies of perception resulting from science. This means that the solution can be approached in two ways—by controlling science or by enhancing perception.

Scientists are no happier about proposals to control science than are businessmen about proposals to control business. Their defenses are remarkably similar: business (science) is what made the modern world great; to interfere with business (science) will inevitably destroy our most precious liberty. And even though the scientist finds a more receptive audience than the businessman, it is not apparent that his case is better. The issue is not that of foisting dictatorial controls on thought processes, it is the perennial issue of the rule of law. All freedoms must be constitutionalized in order to be assured, and it is merely the constitutionalization of science that is at issue. The military, the state and the economy previously have come up for constitutionalization; now it is the turn of science. We are, after all, just at the threshold of the scientific revolution. It is really up to us to decide at what rate this revolution will proceed, where its sway will carry and how it will be consolidated. A large part of the problem of a society that has become ethically and politically dysfunctional could be solved through the determined political control of science—building ethics and justice in at the top, so to speak.

The other side of the problem remains: the improvement of human perception. All finite things have their limits; there is no reason to think the human brain is an exception. But, as Pierre Auger has pointed out, one thing no animal can perceive directly is his own perceptual limitations. If he could, that act of perception would constitute a removal of the limit. We furnish a clever chimpanzee with a disassembled rod and he perceives that the food outside his cage may be reached by a simple act of mechanical assembly. As we make the tool progressively more complex we reach the chimpanzee's limit of perception. He is not only unable to solve the problem; he is unable to perceive the presence of a potential tool in the complex parts furnished him. He begins to go through aimless repetitive cycles.

The same thing could be true of the human being. Man could have come to the limit of his perceptual abilities in several areas without the slightest awareness of having done so. For if he could perceive that fact directly, the act of perception would remove the limit and replace it with a potentially solvable problem. What might be the indirect evidence that human perceptive limits had been reached? Perhaps it would be various counterparts of the aimless, repetitive cycles referred to in the chimpanzee. This would accord with the behavior of those with impaired and deranged brains. Regarding the human species as a whole, one thinks immediately of cycles of economic depression and of the cyclical theories of history.

Suppose we press this matter of the limit of human perception a bit further. Where would such limits appear and where would they not? Immediately we can distinguish between two different types of apperceptive behavior: that for which collective and accumulative knowledge provides the foundation and that in which each individual (or each collectivity) must start from the beginning. The first would include areas such as mathematics and science. Each generation stands upon the shoulders of its predecessors, and the process is cumulative. There may come a limit to how far science can progress but it does not appear to be near.

The second type of apperceptive behavior would be best illustrated by ethics and politics (conceived broadly), for these are areas in which each individual either imbibes traditions unthinkingly or is forced to start from the beginning and learn each lesson and precept for himself. One cannot take the ethical solution another man has found satisfactory and apply it to the solution of one's own ethical problems as one would apply a newly discovered scientific formula. If political knowledge were cumulative, the problem of achieving the rule of law would have to be solved only once in history. Instead, political wisdom being noncumulative, its lessons must be learned and applied anew with pain and violence each time the principles of civic order must be extended to a new level.

Theoretical proof has almost none of the significance for politics that it has for science and mathematics. Science must be distinguished from politics just as earlier it was set apart from technology. And the reason is ultimately the same. There are many things about people that are like atoms and integers, and for such areas science is certainly applicable. But politics is not such an area because its laws provide the sources of determinism rather than the description of them. This makes it almost impossible for men to visualize in advance how a new law—a political innovation—might work out. It would be something like trying to visualize in advance how a universe based upon different physical properties might work. But this locks societies into a circle of conservatism, because they will resist adopting an innovation until they can be certain in advance that it will work. That is why political perception becomes so strongly circumscribed that men are inhibited from devising political solutions to novel problems until they are forced to do so by outright crisis. When novel problems arise at a leisurely pace this disparity may not be too troublesome, but one of the political meanings of the scientific revolution is that novel problems requiring major political innovations will arise with increasing frequency and severity. The disparity between our ability to produce and our ability to solve political problems seems destined to reach the state of endemic, generalized political crisis.

What is the conclusion? We conceive of an objective foundation for the separation of morality from action and of organization from justice. Science, being cumulative, poses progressively more complex ethical and political problems, but ethics and politics, being noncumulative, face a rapidly growing disparity between the problems they can solve and those with which they are confronted. The outlook is most pessimistic. Civilization would appear to be doomed, like the bewildered chimpanzee, to aimless, cyclical behavior. Except that now the tools in the cage are so highly destructive that man can't possibly survive in an environment of endemic cyclical crisis.

What is the solution? It must come through concerted efforts in the realm of cultural—ethical and political—apperception: a crash program to see that man's symbolic environment is maintained in the proper ecological balance; a revolution in education to take maximum advantage of the human life span devoted to noncumulative departments of perception. It is here and not in science that we must invest more time and effort. This is the educational imperative that is implicit in the symbolic revolution wrought by contemporary science. In the end, the true solution may come only when science has succeeded in extending life expectancy in the human being by fifty years or so. We may already have produced a dysfunctional culture, one in which the congenital biological limits of its members prevent them from coping with the demands of their cultural environment.

How Much Science Can We Afford?

LORD BOWDEN

London

Because of the rate at which institutions grow in our society, processes which have gone on steadily for centuries may have to stop quite suddenly and quite soon, and policies that we have been able to follow for decades may have to be scrapped at great cost in spiritual anguish, and perhaps at the price of great economic upheavals. Many of our traditional ideas have simultaneously and abruptly become obsolete, and we do not know how to adapt ourselves to the new situation. The problems thus urgently presented by growth appear broadly in society, but for this essay I shall dwell particularly on those associated with science and the science-based industries, and with the educational systems on which they depend.

The demand for electricity in Britain has doubled every nine or ten years since 1900; in other words, it has increased at about 8 per cent compound interest for more than sixty years. Such doubling and redoubling in equal intervals of time is termed by mathematicians and scientists an exponential growth.

The problems of exponential growth are familiar enough to the designers of atomic bombs, and they are well known to all biologists. Bacteria in soup or greenfly on a rose bush will increase in the same uncontrollable way as long as resources are there for them. All such growth curves straighten out after a time, and then they usually flatten off or decline. The population of the earth will probably double before the end of the century. If it doubled every thirty years for another 300 years, each human being would have only a few square feet to stand on. We all know that our standard of living, and indeed the possibility of living at all on the earth, will depend on the rapid introduction of effective methods of limiting the population.

But this is not my main theme. The number of practicing scientists in the world seems to double every ten years or so; in fact, of all the scientists who have ever lived, three-quarters are alive and practicing their profession today. Furthermore, of all the scientific knowledge in the world, two-thirds has been discovered since the Second World War.

It has been true to say that "three-quarters of all the scientists who ever lived are alive today" at any time during the past 200 years. But today we can see for the first time that a long continued process of growth must be coming to an end. For more than 200 years scientists were everywhere an insignificant minority of the population. In Britain today they outnumber both the clergy and the officers of the armed forces. If the rate of progress which has been maintained ever since the time of Sir Isaac Newton continued for another 200 years, every man, woman and child on earth would be a scientist, and so would every horse, cow, dog and mule as well. It cannot go on like this much longer. What will limit the growth of science and the number of scientists?

No one knows how many people could study science if the opportunity were given to them. At the moment about 5 per cent of the young people in Britain go to university, and half of them study science or technology; the number has doubled in the last decade, but I don't think that we need worry yet about the supply of potential scientists of moderate competence. Bragg has asserted that Britain produces an average of one really good physicist per million of the population per annum, but we must remember the not quite so good, who come in much greater numbers, and we must educate more of them and fit them for this modern world. Half the 20 year olds went to college in California in 1964, and in America they talk of the possibility that 20 per cent of their adult population may have Ph.D.s by 1990. (I don't think they really mean it.)

We may be very short of scientists in a few years' time and there are those who believe that by making pure science so attractive we have deprived industry of men it badly needs. But there are other important limits on the growth of science which we shall feel suddenly and soon. Our whole modern society and all our industries depend on the growth of science; until recently the total cost of science was almost insignificant, but if science doesn't stop growing soon it will bankrupt the community.

When I was a student with Lord Rutherford in the Cavendish Laboratory in Cambridge in the early 1930s, the whole budget which that great man had at his disposal for research was about £2,500 a year. No wonder he used to admonish his students and say: "We have no money to spend, so we shall have to think." With this miserably inadequate sum he laid the foundations of modern nuclear physics and of our whole nuclear power program. No fewer than eight of his colleagues were Nobel Prize winners. Never again will so many Nobel Prize winners be so cheaply maintained. In 1964 the Cavendish Laboratory spent about £300,000.

High-energy nuclear physics has become so expensive that no single university anywhere in the world can afford the enormous machines that are needed to study the ultimate structure of matter. The Rutherford Laboratory in Harwell cost £6 million last year, and the jointly sponsored laboratories of CERN in Geneva spent about £9 million.

The end is not in sight. The CERN machine has a magnet half a mile round, which is positioned everywhere to a few thousandths of an inch. Particles travel round and round for a total distance as far as from the earth to the moon as they accelerate. There is talk of another machine twice as big to be finished soon in Russia, of another six times as big to be built somewhere in America, and European scientists are planning a machine ten times as big as the machine in Geneva—it will cost several billion dollars to build and run. Design studies for an even bigger machine have begun. Can we afford it, now or ever?

Every country produces more scientists every year, and every scientist costs more to equip than his predecessors did. On the other hand, no country has been able to increase its gross national product at much more than a quarter of the rate at which it has increased expenditure on science. America is spending more today on research and development than the whole of the federal budget before Pearl Harbor. If the figure goes on mounting at its present rate America will be spending 10 per cent of its GNP on research and development by 1973—and twice its GNP by the year 2000. Our improving standard of living could never have been achieved if we and our ancestors before us had not invested so heavily in science and the science-based industries. The new national economic plans suggest that the demand for scientists, technologists and technicians will grow twice as fast as that for administrators and clerical officers—four times as fast as the national average. But how much longer can we afford to let science go on growing as it has grown since the time of Newton?

An expanded version of Lord Bowden's essay, based on a paper he delivered to the European Institute of Business Administration, appeared in New Scientist.

Furthermore, the schools which educate our young people for the scientific age are becoming more and more expensive—they need more and more staff, and the children are staying at school much longer than they used to do. For example, the average age at which students graduate as Ph.D.s and leave the university has increased steadily since the war. The trend is more obvious in America and on the Continent than it is in Britain. In Germany and Holland a disquieting number of men are students until 30. The average age of retirement seems to be falling steadily. The two curves will intersect in 1995, at which point will scientists retire immediately upon graduation?

The dilemma which confronts us is quite plain. We believe, as no other civilization has ever done before us, in the all-important role of science to the community; we know (and no one has ever known this before) that science has grown steadily for 200 years or more, but we have to decide not whether, but when, this steady exponential expansion must be stopped. Expenditure on pure research has been doubling every five years. Many administrators, and almost all the scientists I have talked to, hope and expect that we shall double our expenditure again, though we shall probably take more than five years to do it; many people hope that we shall double it for a second time before 1985, but I know very few people who expect that we shall be able to double our present rate of expenditure more than three times in the foreseeable future.

Herodotus tells us that Pharaoh used 100,000 men for twenty years to build his Pyramid, that he sold his daughter to buy some of the stones, and that the whole enterprise devastated Egypt as badly as a major war.

St. Peter's was built "ad maiorem dei gloriam." It embodies man's sense of communion with the infinite, its construction added immeasurably to the prestige of the Church. It expresses the spirit of the age, quite superbly. But the bill nearly bankrupted the papacy—it was financed by the sale of indulgences which provoked the wrath of Luther, and led to the growth of the Protestant churches. CERN was built to help men probe the profoundest secrets of nature; its construction taxed the engineering and scientific skill of some of the ablest men of their generation. It has added greatly to the reputation and prestige of those who built and used it. It expresses the spirit of this age of ours. The whole bill has still to be paid. It may deprive many a British university of funds it urgently needs, and lead to the stoppage of very promising lines of research.

No one has ever built a bigger pyramid than Cheops or a longer wall than Shi Hwang Ti, or a bigger palace than Diocletian, or a greater cathedral than St. Peter's. Before long we shall have to decide if the world is ever to see a bigger telescope than George Ellery Hale's on Mount Palomar, which was designed thirty years ago, has dominated astronomy ever since the war, and made modern cosmology possible. Shall we ever need a bigger steerable radio telescope than Lovell's in Jodrell Bank, or a bigger proton accelerator than those John Adams built in CERN and G. K. Green built in Brookhaven, or a bigger linear electron accelerator than W. K. H. Panofsky's in Stanford, which is reputed to cost more to operate than the whole of the rest of the great university which houses the machine? Our funds, may I repeat it, are limited.

I must pursue the analogy a little further. How many modern scientists have convinced themselves that they are now the heirs of creation, that society owes them a living and must provide them with the facilities they need to further their researches? The men who built the Great Pyramids, the ancient monasteries and cathedrals, the palaces and museums and art galleries of Europe, all had the same expectations. In fact the world owes a living to no one who does not earn it, and whose efforts have no economic significance. Intellectual achievements may be rewarding to the individuals, and vitally important to society, but they must be judged on their merits; no man must be the sole judge of his own cause.

Gibbon once remarked that in the 18th century all religions were considered by the people as equally true, by the philosophers as equally false, and by the magistrates as equally useful. Price has told us that today all sciences are considered by their professors as equally significant, by the politicians as equally incomprehensible, and by the treasury as equally expensive.

Our classical scholars and some other members of faculties of arts used to despise the scientists who were trying to make themselves academically respectable. It was a dean of Christ Church who claimed: "The advantages of a classical education are twofold. It allows us to look with contempt upon those who have not shared its advantages, and it fits us for places of emolument, both in this world and in that which is to come." Science is now respectable in all our universities. The attitude of some scientists to engineers, technologists, administrators and social scientists has been lukewarm at best, but let us hope, now that the importance of scientists and technologists to society has at last been recognized, that these important and influential men will be more tolerant of innovation than their old opponents were for a century or more.

The unbounded ambitions of the aristocracy and of the clergy became so great that common men rebelled and destroyed them. President Eisenhower found it necessary to warn his countrymen of the growing power of the scientists and of the great corporations which are exploiting the space age. It seems almost inevitable to me that the Russian Government must be having the same kind of administrative problems in controlling its space program. The U.S. National Aeronautics and Space Administration is already deploying resources which might feed and clothe half the undeveloped world. It is attracting engineers and technologists from the undeveloped countries which need them and cannot spare them, and it is producing a world-wide drift of men which we in Britain have come to call the "brain drain."

In science as in other things, death will be the price of life. But who signs the death warrants? Ten years ago I asked Dr. Stratton, president of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, what was the most difficult and important of his tasks. He said, without any hesitation or doubt, "to devise techniques for closing things down." And this, remember, was in the largest and wealthiest school of science and technology in the world.

We shall have to divide our unprecedentedly large but limited resources among all the claimants more carefully than we have ever done before, and we shall do so knowing as we do it that our decisions will affect not only the scientific health of the community but almost certainly the growth of our industries, and even our national survival. We must do so knowing full well that scientific progress always has been unpredictable and that it always will be, and that the man in government can never hope to know as much about the projects he is saving or condemning as the young men in the laboratories who will have to depend for their professional lives upon his judgment.

For the first time in history administrators will be among the most important men in the world of science. They are already all-powerful in America and they will soon be at work in every Western country. Their power to shape the future will increase the ascendancy of the Executive over the legislature, which is already alarming to many people. They must be watched—but by whom? The only men who can understand and control the growth of science are scientists, but there are very few of them who understand but have no personal and private interest in the results of government policy. The decisions made by scientific administrators will probably be more important than any others made by either civil servants or politicians. Great issues will inevitably depend on new scientific discoveries and scientific policies which are too complicated for laymen to comprehend; our future will be influenced by scientific discoveries which cannot be foreseen, much more than it is by political dogma, however sacred.

There are many who wonder if our parliament can exercise effective control over this vital component of national policy. If war is too important to trust to the generals, who should look after science?

We may take comfort from American experience. Just as we tend to assume that a good administrator can run anything and learn technical details from his subordinates, Americans assume that any good scientist can administer, or get his administration done for him by his staff; all that matters is his ability to hold his own with his professional peers—no professional administrator could do this. Perhaps both countries are right up to a point!

The components of our economy which are growing most rapidly are the science-based industries. For example, electronics grew by about 32 per cent between 1963 and 1964, a rate which was eight times the national average. Our industrial laboratories have to recruit men who have been doing pure research in university and condition them to believe that applied research, upon which the profits of industry depend, is interesting and worth doing. Some firms have gone so far as to establish laboratories in which they attempt to reorient their young men. This process is expensive and difficult and is made harder by the reluctance of our own universities to take a proper interest in industrial problems.

There is a shortage of engineering students in Britain for the first time since the war—and in Germany and America. The claims which have been made for the "purity" of science research have persuaded teachers everywhere that engineering is in some way inferior and unworthy of their best pupils. Science and technology have so much in common that many men can be equally successful in a laboratory or a factory. We have not enough of such men. Until we educate more of them we cannot allow too many to escape from industry for the whole of their lives.

Should we favor the applied sciences as a matter of deliberate policy, if necessary, at the expense of the pure science upon which, in the end, the whole system depends? Is our rapid development of pure science depriving industry of too many men who would be valuable engineers? Men who could help British industry earn a living in the markets of the world have become scientists whose contributions to our economy will not be noticed for decades—if indeed they ever have any effect at all.

We ask ourselves anxiously if expenditure on research has to grow five times as fast as the gross national product, out of which science must be paid for. Could we increase the GNP by concentrating our resources and our best men on problems which we expect to be immediately useful to industry? If we did this for a few years should we then be so much wealthier that we could spend even more on pure science? What is the time lag in the machine? The time which has to elapse before a new laboratory experiment is embodied in a commercial product is less today than it was fifty years ago, but if pure science stopped growing exponentially in Britain in 1970, would our own industry notice anything before 1980—or 1990?

We shall have to consider, as the Americans have done, if we must try to establish "Centers of Excellence." Many academics would like to insist that our limited funds are shared more or less equally among all claimants. This may be "fair," but in fact the secret of efficiency is to concentrate resources in a few big institutions, or in a few good departments, wherever they may be. We must contemplate the idea of reinforcing success, and we must not quail at the implications of what has sometimes been described as the "principle of maximum unfairness."

Pure science can be done anywhere in the world, it can be done in great international laboratories, and its results become known to all the scientists in the world almost at once. It is the one really international enterprise of our times, and its practitioners are as free as the medieval clergy to wander about the world. But industrial development depends on applied science which must have been done on the spot, and which may depend on local conditions, local ores, local resources and local markets. For a century or more American industry depended on innovation inspired by pure research which had been done in Europe. Today most of the best science in the world is done in America, if only because so many of the essential tools of the scientist are so expensive, and European industry has become dependent on American science since the war in much the same way as American industry depended on European science from the time of Waterloo to the Battle of Britain.

The growth of American industry in the 19th century shows beyond doubt that a country can become enormously rich without a vast program of pure science. The time is long past when Europe can afford to undertake pure scientific research for the whole world. No one disputes its value or its significance for our society or for the world, but we have to decide if the intellectual and educational value of our own scientific research is enough to justify its cost. Is it true that it provides the best way of training young men for industry and the professions? There are those who say it is the only really satisfactory preparation for industry. Are they right? Should we finance high-energy nuclear physics and optical astronomy in the same way and for the same reasons as we finance the opera and the theatre, our orchestras and the ballet? All of them are essential and delightful components of our national life. Apart from its economic significance, can we really claim more for science than the rest? Until recently we spent much more on the arts than we did on science. How times have changed!

I have come to believe that the most important and valuable of all America's assets is to be found in the traditions of her great Land Grant Universities which were established by the Morrill Act, signed by President Lincoln in 1862, in the middle of the Civil War, just after the battle of Gettysburg. The new foundations were inspired by ideas which first appeared in Lancashire but came to fruition in New England. The basic principle is simple. A university should study any or all of the problems of contemporary society. Agriculture, the mechanical arts, medicine, business — all were in their turn important, each was studied and all were taught to students young and old. The astonishing flowering of American universities and their post-graduate schools springs from this tradition. Pure science came late to American universities.

We have just founded a couple of business schools in Britain. We need them. But far more urgently do we need the tradition which led inevitably to their creation in America when first they were needed seventy years ago. Our own academies have been lamentably unwilling to concede the intellectual value and the social significance of applied science and of many other disciplines. Although we all accept the fact that pure science has led to some of the most wonderful new intellectual developments of our time, and we can wholeheartedly admire our pure scientists for their skill and their brilliance, we must at the same time remind them and ourselves that society can justify the expense of providing them with the resources and equipment they use only if they do something in return. They must teach and stimulate young men, and they must be able and willing to turn their minds to the complex and perhaps insoluble problems of the day. The interaction between industry, science and the rest of society is infinitely complex, and no man can ignore the obligations which come with his privileges. This idea is far more clearly understood in America than it is here, and it has done much to make America rich and great.

Symbiosis between their government, their industries and their universities is complete. The government expects the universities to study problems which are important to the nation, and the universities expect lavish support from the federal government. A visitor finds it hard to be sure if the university dons have taken over Washington, or whether the central administration has taken over the universities. The system is complex and confusing, but most effective. We should study it and perhaps adapt it to our very different traditions and institutions.

If the world of science is chaos, roughly organized, it will be essential to avoid too great a tidiness in the administrative machine which controls it. I look forward to the day when every big firm and every department of state which has problems to solve is able and willing to approach individual universities—individual professors if need be—and sponsor a program of pure or applied research. Lest it be thought that this procedure would lead to the complete breakdown of the administrative machine, I must remark that there are no fewer than five large independent government agencies which sponsor research in American universities, as well as a dozen big private foundations and scores of small ones. This variety and apparent confusion has in fact been essential to the growth of American science. The medical research of the Rockefeller Foundation is world famous. The income of the Ford Foundation is greater than that of our University Grants Committee, and its dollar reserves are greater than those of the sterling bloc. It has initiated vast and important educational experiments. The Nuffield Foundation has sponsored much of the best contemporary work in this field in Britain. Without the help of Ford and Nuffield, education in the English-speaking world would still be in the horse-and-buggy era. Diversity and variety have been more than the spice of life. They have been the secret of conception, parturition and growth. Coordination, and administrative efficiency, can all too easily become the enemies of morale, and destroy the initiative and creative powers of individuals and research establishments. But some coordination we must have.

It is remarkable that trends in science are universal and world-wide; the same subjects seem to become popular, or fall out of favor, everywhere at once. The science community is very closely knit. Scientific fashions seem to be as inexplicable as the success of the Beatles, who appeal at the same moment to young people in Europe, in America and in Russia, and even in Indonesia. No central administration could possibly have foreseen such a fashion, no government could have inspired it, and it seems as if no government can stop it. All that the government can do about scientific fashions is deny some of its scientists the funds that they want, and if it does this some of these distinguished and important men will fold up their tents like Arabs, and as silently steal away.

The government must decide most complex and embarrassing problems. We do not really know if the education we are providing is suitable for men who are to manage the new world we are so busily creating. Does a university unfit a man for some parts of commerce and industry? If so, where are the recruits for these industries (which may be very important) to come from?

Almost every institution in the country tries to improve its efficiency. Schools and universities on the other hand do their best to improve what they call their "staff/student ratio." By this they mean—though they never say it explicitly—that they try to reduce the number of graduates who are educated every year per member of staff. This is done (so we are told) in the interests of staff and students, but it seems to me that the interests of the community demand that we shall have to adopt all the techniques which will help a limited number of staff educate an increasing number of students. These problems are on us now—they cannot wait. We must use big lecture theatres, television, films, as well as small tutorial groups. Our system of lecturing has scarcely altered since before the invention of printing. I think that we could enormously improve the efficiency of our educational machine. The idea of "cost effectiveness" must become familiar to the whole academic world, as it has never been before.

I must try to summarize future trends as best I can see them. The exponential growth of science and the science-based industries, which has been observed for so long, must inevitably give place to a more regular and linear rate of growth. Science will, as it were, begin to grow at simple interest instead of compound interest. After a few more years—unless the national economic plan succeeds beyond our expectations—this growth may itself be slowed down. If the growth of science is halted too quickly, in a short-sighted attempt to save money, then it seems to me to be inevitable that our whole economic growth will grind to a halt in a few years, whatever the planners may do.

If all goes well, I think that we shall have two or three times as many scientists in Britain by 1985 as we have today, but their number will be increasing relatively slowly. Their equipment will be better and their output will be greater than it has ever been before, but thereafter knowledge will grow steadily and regularly but not exponentially. The average income of the population, which will depend even more on science than it does today, will grow steadily for as long as one can foresee.

Ours is not the only economy which will grow. One of the most important questions which face us in the Western world is the probable growth of the developing countries, particularly India and China. China is the biggest country in the world and it is the least known to us in the West. Its people are numerous and intelligent, and hard working. Its civilization is ancient and for thousands of years its achievements surpassed anything the West could show. In the last few years it has begun to industrialize itself and to educate its people.

It seems reasonable to suppose that in the next thirty-five years (until the year 2000) China will be able to do as much as Russia did in the past forty-five years (since 1920 when its economic advance began). Russia is now making about 800 pounds of steel per annum per head of the population. China may have a population of 1,000 million and manufacture 400 million tons of steel a year before the century is out. This is twice as much as the U.S., Russia and the United Kingdom made between them in 1964. China will once again be one of the greatest powers in the world.

If we assume, as I think we must, that scientific ability is equally likely to occur among the people of all races, then the time must come when scientific leadership will pass to the most populous societies, and China will probably lead the scientific world again in the 21st century, as it may have done for the first thousand years of our era.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Outside the Kingdom of the Middle Class

LA VIDA. By Oscar Lewis. Random House. 669 pp. $10.

ELMER BENDINER

Mr. Bendiner, writer and editor, is the author of The Bowery Man (Thomas Nelson).

To the bigot or the puritan, the desperately poor present no emotional problem. It is clear to them that poverty is the consequence of some character flaw, probably due to an ethnic taint. The liberal, however, often is moved to love—though it sometimes seems like pity—and to a firm conclusion that, given proper diet, housing, playgrounds and schooling, the poor can be qualified to enter the kingdom of middle-class values to which, it is assumed, all humans aspire.

The achievements of the liberals—though eminently praiseworthy in themselves—have not always accomplished the great transformation. It is embarrassing to a reformer to find that new housing projects quickly become skyscraper slums, and that when a trickle of affluence sweeps down to the lowest strata of society it sometimes enables a slum dweller to feed a narcotics habit or buy a Cadillac instead of paying the rent.

An explanation of why some of the poor behave as they do, and why hand-outs and social work are inadequate, has now been formulated neatly, concisely, even brilliantly, by anthropologist Oscar Lewis. After extensive field work in Mexico he has turned to the Puerto Rican slum dwellers of San Juan and New York. In his introduction to La Vida he presents a compelling thesis. Poverty may be ameliorated or even eliminated, he says, without necessarily modifying the vast and horrible "subculture of poverty"—a way of life that spits at middle-class values.

It is an outlaw subculture as Lewis describes it. Those who live in it are excluded from all the "major institutions of the larger society"—except the jail, the army and the welfare rolls. It is marked by a total lack of inner organization, for here no political parties are meaningful. When it gives rise to gangs, Lewis points out, it may alarm the rest of society but it nevertheless is a sign of comparative health. There is no real childhood in the subculture, for the biological readiness is all that distinguishes men and women from boys and girls. Above all, it is a way of living without a tomorrow. The present moment is all and satisfactions cannot be deferred, for doom sits on every threshold and the individual is helpless and hopeless.

Lewis does not describe this subculture as Puerto Rican or even as the culture of all of the poor. The subculture crosses national and racial lines and grows only in a particular soil. It has not been observed, he points out, among the hideously impoverished low castes of India, nor among the Jews of Eastern Europe, nor in primitive societies, nor, he suspects, in any Socialist country, whatever the state of its economic health.

The subculture mushrooms in the dark shadows of affluence, in a society whose highest expression is in terms of material wealth among people forever denied that wealth. It is a response to frustration.

Yet even when the root cause of the frustration is lifted, when income rises slightly and the housing pinch is relaxed, when cars and TV sets are within grasp, the subculture of poverty persists from generation to generation in a legacy of outlawry and despair.

If ameliorating poverty—unquestionably necessary in itself—does not always eliminate the subculture, what does? Lewis' answer is that the proposition's converse is true. The subculture can be destroyed without abolishing poverty. He cites Cuba as an example where, he says, people are still poor and still live in slums but the culture of poverty is gone. The poor have been incorporated into the mainstream of society; they have been given a sense of participation in history and the refreshing knowledge that there is a tomorrow.

Lewis' concept thus provides a realistic hope. Here is not the promise of salvation through social work or the deferment of hope until some ultimate reorganization of society. He suggests instead that the entire wretched pattern of poverty can be blown away by the winds of a ghetto revolution. Inevitably the reader must see in this concept a clarification of the battle cry of "black power." That potent phrase, read in the light of Lewis' thinking—though he does not refer to it—takes on a meaning that has nothing to do with complex attempts at definition or ultimate blueprints.

Lewis' thesis of the culture of poverty is established in a 50-page introduction which, for this reviewer at least, outweighs the 669 pages of documentation that follow. In getting his data, Lewis pursued the method of his Mexican research. He and his team move into an area armed with tape recorders and a profound sensitivity. A family is selected almost at random. A woman tells her story on tape. Her lovers, children, parents, friends, neighbors, tape their stories, casting oblique lights on the original telling so that incidents are seen from various vantage points à la Rashomon. An investigator drops in and chronicles every event in the course of a single day in the family's house.

The result is a mass of tape that must run to countless miles. This is edited down to publishable size, translated and produced as a document. It makes a harrowing book, certainly, but I do not know what it means. It is not needed to support the argument in the introduction and it does not strengthen it.

We are given a picture of abject brutalizing poverty—children giving birth to children in a senseless agony; sex in a thousand forms, minutely described, until the world seems a gigantic, monotonous brothel, underscoring the savage irony of the Spanish euphemism for whoring—La Vida. Lechery and drunkenness are detailed to the last spittle of vomit and the telling stain on the bed sheet. Here is loveless sex performed to a background of shrieks and curses. Here are children watching wild-eyed while their parents clutch each other in love and stab each other in hate.

Why does Lewis give us this? Is the Rios family meant to be "typical" and, if so, of what? Certainly, it is not a "typical" Puerto Rican family, and Lewis denies any suggestion that he intended it to be so. It may be typical of the particular slum in which Lewis worked but is not the whole concept of a "typical" family unscientific?

And if the Rios family is not typical of anything, then I do not know what this "slice of life" is meant to convey. Is it even a valid portrait of this one family? What criteria did Lewis use to sift out the details he excluded? Did he leave out the humdrum talk of clothes and weather and school and jobs? If so, then the day-in-day-out cacophony is misleading. Stripped of amenities even a family in Suburbia can reveal a gaping hell of obsessions and frustrations although, admittedly, these would find less horrendous manifestations.

But suppose that the material is indeed edited so that all that was excluded was only more of the same. Do we have here a faithful portrait of the Rios family? Is it possible to know a person by listening to a tape recording of his autobiography, supplemented by other taped autobiographies? I doubt it.

The art of knowing a person demands an ability to pierce the self-pretense which uses language to disguise rather than to reveal.

Last Chance for Democracy

OVERTAKEN BY EVENTS: The Dominican Crisis from the Fall of Trujillo to the Civil War. By John Bartlow Martin. Doubleday & Co. 821 pp. $7.95.

WILLIAM A. WILLIAMS

Mr. Williams is currently on leave from the University of Wisconsin, where he teaches history. He is the author of The United States, Cuba and Castro (Monthly Review Press).

This is a detailed and movingly candid account, from the inside near the top, of American relations with the Dominican Republic from the fall of Trujillo in 1961 through the coup against Juan Bosch, and on to the suppression of the popular uprising of 1965 by American military intervention.

Every citizen seriously concerned about his country and its foreign policy should take or make the time to read this book. An effort is required, primarily because the reader has to confront and consider some of the principal issues on his own. Ambassador Martin is telling us many things about which he does not speak directly, or even intentionally; and one has the feeling that he began to make his own serious confrontations only in the course of his writing.

The Ambassador argues that good American intentions and basically sound American policy were overtaken by events, and quotes President Kennedy to make his point: "We did the best we could." In that context, Martin places major emphasis on the limits of American power. But it says a great deal for his perceptiveness and honesty, however, that the evidence he presents suggests precisely the opposite. Suggests, that is, that the effective use of America's vast power to implement a poor American policy defeated America's good intentions by force

It is true that in these pages the compassionate reader may reassure himself that victims can be attractive people and achieve a kind of tragic dignity even though what they do appalls the senses. But he is left with a curiously incomplete picture, with raw material which cries for meaningful structure. Those with a taste for people and for life may wish that a novelist—without a tape recorder—would take up where Oscar Lewis left off. An artist who goes to that slum that stands between the sea and the walls of San Juan may one day give us the fuller truth that can be had only in fiction.

ing events to conform to a fundamentally mistaken and unsound conception of reality.

One clear indication of this pattern comes in the way that all the protagonists reveal an almost complete disregard of history. History is not magic; it does not supply answers to our problems. But it can make us aware of what has been going on before (and as) we make the scene, and thereby enables us to orient ourselves and provide a basis for using our intelligence to realize our ideals. It can, that is, unless our perception is clouded by a priori conceptions, and unless our intelligence is grinding along in the rut of making yesterday sufficient unto tomorrow.

Martin uses about one-tenth of his book to survey Dominican history. His theme is how a long, slow, painful movement toward effective self-government was seriously interrupted by American intervention between 1916 and 1924, and then by the Trujillo dictatorship. He describes the results, as of 1961, in these terms: "The Republic was a sick, destroyed nation, to be viewed as one ravaged by a thirty-years war, even one to be occupied and reconstituted."

It might reasonably be expected, on the basis of that kind of analysis, that American leaders would approach the Dominican situation with a willingness to take a long-range view, a recognition that many, many difficulties would arise before the country recovered its self-confidence and mounted a sustained effort to realize its potential, and a realization that vast aid would be required if the United States decided to become involved in the process.

What happened instead was a euphoric flip over what Martin repeatedly describes as the "matchless opportunity," or the "chance to do things that few people ever have." That kind of wildly romantic

FREEDOM AND ORDER IN THE UNIVERSITY

Edited with an introduction by Samuel Gorovitz

Essays by Paul Goodman, Walter P. Metzger, John R. Searle, Sanford H. Kadish, and Mortimer R. Kadish

The principal concern of this book is the conflict between the desire for individual freedom and the need for social order, with particular emphasis on problems arising out of this conflict within the university. The writers share broad agreement about the objectives and obligations of the university and the value of allowing students and staff alike full freedom for growth and development. Yet their positions cover a broad spectrum, and sharp disagreements emerge. Goodman holds that the only defensible order arises out of total freedom; Metzger provides an eloquent historical account of the development of academic freedom and appeals for its extension to students; Searle develops guidelines for dealing with problems of student freedom; and S. Kadish offers a defense of the judicious imposition of behavior-governing rules. Each of these essays receives comments from the other writers, and the final essay, by M. Kadish, presents a reflective discussion of the positions taken and the issues involved.

$2.95 paper, $5.75 cloth

Available from your bookstore or

THE PRESS OF WESTERN RESERVE UNIVERSITY
Cleveland 44106

transcendence of the miserable truth is unquestionably necessary for the people who set about to make a revolution under such circumstances, but it is absurdly irrelevant on the part of outsiders—no matter how sympathetic.

One has constantly to hang on as the author first staggers us with accounts of how terrible it is, and then jolts us with his rhetoric about the golden opportunity. One quickly comes to feel that he is back with the prophets of the Great China Dream of the 1890s, or watching Woodrow Wilson boost himself into orbit with his rhetoric about making the world safe for democracy.

That is a good part of the trouble. It is all out of the past. Even Kennedy's touchstone, the New Frontier, was a relic of 19th-century thought. It seems clear, for example, that the last-chance-to-do-something-great excitement over the Dominican Republic was originally part of the Alliance For Progress reaction to Castro's success in wrenching Cuba out of the 19th-century American empire; and that the increased intensity of that attitude after the Bay of Pigs fiasco was part (along with Leap to the Moon) of a general fear in the Kennedy group that history was passing them by and that something had to be done—quick! Kennedy was at most only semi-facetious in his goodbye to Martin: "If you blow this, you'd better not come home."

Martin constantly thought, talked and wrote about the "last chance for Dominican democracy." He could not avoid, therefore, being ultimately disappointed and defeated. For to define one stage of a long and tortuous process as "the last chance" is to trap oneself. But Martin was highly motivated, dedicated and capable—as well as running scared—and he did a great deal to hold the line for the American 19th-century view of the world prior to the inauguration of Juan Bosch early in 1963. He was very effective in helping the provisional government to survive, and in turning Dominican dissatisfaction, unrest and impatience into the formal channels of a national election.

But Bosch was a man who rocked the 19th-century boat. Ironically, he did so not because he was a 20th-century revolutionary but because he was a sensitive man of the 19th century who had a deep sense that neither he nor anyone else could make it work in 1965. He was thus fatalistic, indecisive and difficult. Martin was skeptical from the outset. "We could not trust Juan Bosch. For President he would not do." Yet in the end it was Bosch who gave Martin the insights that, largely unconsciously and not wholly formulated, are imbedded in this book. There was a significant difference, moreover, between Martin and his superiors in Washington. Martin was sufficiently open to reality to begin to move beyond his existing outlook, and he had the integrity to play it straight with Bosch. Given his approach, the only place to fault him concerns his long delay in initiating the routine courtly maneuvers (or ritual) that would have made it possible for Bosch to ask for extensive assistance on a crash basis.

It is doubtful that it would have made any difference. Martin's overlords in Washington were not capable of transcending their two basic convictions. First, that self-determination and democracy are really honored only when they produce results that conform to their conception of American experience and practice; and, second, that the Right produces more of those results than the Left. However, a commitment to self-determination transcends one's preferences and hopes about how it will be used. Self-preservation is the only legitimate basis for violating a commitment to self-determination. And, clearly enough, the Dominican Republic does not threaten the existence of the United States. But if the definition of self-determination as Americanization is accepted as being true, then the second axiom is also true. This false syllogism is the basis of American policy, and American leaders deploy American power in a sustained effort to force reality into that mold.

In the case of Juan Bosch, American leaders used American power very effectively by simply sitting on their hands. They hitched their britches, crossed their legs, sighed audibly, and let him fail.

"Plainly," Martin accurately reports, "the overwhelming majority of the Dominican people expected [Bosch] to make a revolution." Prompt and extensive American aid, given openly and sympathetically, was the only way Bosch could finance such a revolution, which would outflank the extreme Left and, at the same time, control the conservatives and the military.

It is extremely doubtful whether any underdeveloped society can reach 1966 by the strategy of marching through the morass of the 19th century even if it has massive American assistance, but that is the only possible way that effort can have any chance of success. We can provide the aid and make the effort through a close alliance with an informed, capable and honest native benevolent despotism. Or we can stand back and let the society make its quantum leap in its own way and through its own devices, and then reach an open and honest accommodation with the results.

That is the actual lesson of Ambassador Martin's book, and it needs to be mastered by the public so that it can drive it home to its leaders. For either America's leaders have not learned it or, if they have, they do not have the candor and guts to confront and resolve the issue with the American people. For Washington said "no" in response to Martin's requests to help Bosch. "Ever since Bosch has been in," a high embassy official reported to Martin, "we've been turned down." I

THE ULTIMATE ANTIENTROPY*

Unity is plural and at minimum two.

—R. Buckminster Fuller

Whether one paints five Helens after some much experienced woman or develops one, his beau ideal, from the five, most lovely, untouched virgins of Crotona (such Cicero's account of Zeuxis' purist practice) or laboriously patches her together cheek by jowl out of all the women he has shuffled through, are not their ends the same?

So even he who will not let the name of Helen or woman, for that matter, be attached to what he splotches on the canvas, refusing to be tamed by recognition — for he claims he paints a painting, not a landscape, apples, females — deems he's plucked from out his head-long brain and brush a universal as it is a most unique, concrete past any momentary model. And though we may wish to celebrate the fleeting or prefer the theory as it lords it over its bleak and boring product, Zeus, we recall, laid all (this every time) his eggs in one small basket; the consequence, in the most famous case, was a Helen who inherited her papa's quality most jovial: being so promiscuous, so radiantly loose, that we have hardly seen the last of her. The sparks her eyes shot forth are seeds that will not die. Men far flung still warm their hands, their hearts, and more at the thought of her as at the Troy the flint of flesh against the tinder of a god produced.

Helen, it seems, is more herself the more she's reproduced.

THEODORE WEISS

*According to Norbert Wiener and R. Buckminster Fuller, "Man is the ultimate antientropy."

do not think Martin asked soon enough for nearly the amount of aid that was required. But the primary point is that the Kennedy administration made the initial decision to go all out in the Dominican Republic, and then backed off. Martin cannot be blamed for that failure, nor for Kennedy's failure to seize the opportunity to level with the American people about the fundamental issues and problems involved in foreign aid. Neither can Martin be blamed, whatever his own doubts about Bosch, for the Kennedy administration's disingenuous way of blaming the failure on Bosch. To be charged with failure, Bosch would have had to be given an opportunity to succeed. The Kennedy administration never gave him that chance.

What happened, of course, was that the military, supported by a segment of the business community, deposed Bosch. Martin mistakenly says the subsequent inability to control the military junta that replaced Bosch shows the limits of American power. But this is only a symptom. The real limits of American power are revealed in the inability to impose a 19th-century outlook on 20th-century reality. Behind that, of course, is the limit imposed by the inability to break free of that outlook itself. No one need worry about the limits of American power. There will be many such limits even after we enter the 20th century. But once we do, we can at least operate creatively within the new and relevant limits instead of behaving destructively in an effort to preserve the past.

True enough, U.S. air-borne troops and Marines suppressed the general and popular uprising of 1965. But the bubbles are again reaching the surface. There will be another revolution. And Martin has made an honest and courageous effort to keep us from making the same mistakes still another time around.

capita income was only $90.25; only 11 per cent of the families drank milk and only 4 per cent ate meat; 43 per cent were illiterate and 36 per cent suffered from intestinal parasites; while throughout Cuba 37.8 per cent of the labor force was unemployed.

But, educated in the United States, married to an American wife, and friend and counselor to numerous U.S. businessmen in Cuba, López-Fresquet's dream was of a government that was "both democratic and friendly to the U.S." He saw his role as a "bridge to renew the traditional good relations that geography, history, culture and economy direct Cuba to maintain with the U.S." His disenchantment began with Castro whom he sees as "the fruit of Cuban soil, produced by immorality, cynicism and irresponsibility," with a "psychopathic suspicion of everything American" and no knowledge of "the activities of private enterprise." To López-Fresquet "no reconciliation was possible," and he resigned his cabinet post on March 17, 1960, spent several months trying to organize anti-Castro resistance, and finally went into exile.

Although López-Fresquet believes that "nothing that the U.S. could have done would have caused Castro to remain a friend," he "does not absolve the Eisenhower administration from its subsequent handling of the Cuban situation." He remembers the complacency of the two U.S. ambassadors to the Batista government, Arthur Gardner and Earl T. Smith: "whose department provided Castro with all the examples he needed to convince the Cuban people of the evil intentions of U.S. policy in Cuba," as well as "the decorations given to Batista's hired killers, and the assistance the U.S. military mission offered the army of the dictator." He recalls that the CIA, as early as May 14, 1959 ("a date when the only Cubans who opposed the revolutionary government were the Batistianos") had established a phantom corporation in Florida which later turned out to be the employer of the four U.S. pilots who died on the last day of the Bay of Pigs inva-

Bridge to Disenchantment

MY FOURTEEN MONTHS WITH CASTRO. By Rufo López-Fresquet. World Publishing Co. 223 pp. $4.95.

KAL WAGENHEIM

Mr. Wagenheim is editor of the monthly San Juan Review. He has lived in Puerto Rico and covered Caribbean affairs for the past six years.

Economist Rufo López-Fresquet—a lover of logic, efficiency and democratic procedures—ought to have been born in Scandinavia; instead, he was born in Cuba, whose history of administrative chaos, corruption and tyranny is the antithesis of his manera de ser.

Not that the author is a timid soul. As a student he opposed the Machado dictatorship and spent two years exiled in Mexico; in 1935 and 1953 he was imprisoned for anti-Batista activities, and after his release he was active in the clandestine movement in Havana which helped overthrow Batista and paved the way for Castro's dramatic entry to power. He then served as the treasury minister of Cuba's revolutionary government for fourteen months and nine days.

In 1960, "in bathing suit and sandals, and carrying only a .45 automatic, a few papers and some money," he disembarked from a boat at Key West, Fla., a refugee from Castro's Cuba. Now living in Puerto Rico (for the past few years he has been a tax consultant to the Puerto Rican Government), he is despised by some of his fellow Cuban exiles for his "radical far Left" ideas, and considered "too conservative and pro-American" by the Cuba he left behind. His book, written with the help of author-professor, Irving Peter Pflaum, and Mrs. Melanie Pflaum, is a detailed, if slightly disorganized, account of his intimate contact with the leadership of the Cuban Revolution, ranging from memorable anecdotes about Castro to the intricacies of Cuba's tax and agrarian reform laws.

López-Fresquet supported many of Castro's economic measures. "Cuba's ills," he writes, "were the symptoms of a structural malady that had to be torn up by the very roots." In 1959, while the "tourist zones and residential sections of Havana formed a dazzling picture," he reports that 90 per cent of all cars owned were registered in the capital city of Havana; that in the rural areas annual per

Gertrude Stein's masterpiece

THE MAKING OF AMERICANS

(the only complete version)

$10.95 plus postage from

SOMETHING ELSE PRESS, Inc.

160 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10010

Or ask your bookdealer for it

Recent Books on Latin America

INTERNAL SECURITY AND MILITARY POWER: Counterinsurgency and Civil Action in Latin America. By Willard F. Barber and C. Neale Renning. Ohio State University Press. 338 pp. $6.50.

An explanation, with examples, of the U.S. military effort in instructing Latin American armed forces to crush revolutions—even before they begin.

TRUJILLO: The Life and Times of a Caribbean Dictator. By Robert D. Crassweller. The Macmillan Co. 468 pp. $8.95.

Crassweller does an interesting job of exposing the scandalous life of the dictator, but his work does not probe the agony of the country's problems.

TRAVELS IN BRAZIL. By Henry Koster. Edited and with an introduction by C. Harvey Gardiner. Southern Illinois University Press. 182 pp. $5.85.

An account of a tour of Brazil during the early 19th century, told in a delightful and informative manner by an English traveler.

CHURCH AND STATE IN LATIN AMERICA. By J. Lloyd Mechem. University of North Carolina Press. 465 pp. $8.50.

An updated and revised edition of the most comprehensive study of church and state relations in Latin America. Excellent reference work.

MEXICAN MARXIST: VICENTE LOMBARDO TOLEDANO. By Robert Paul Millon. University of North Carolina Press. 222 pp. $6.

A biography of Mexico's leading labor organizer, which is sympathetic in tone but insufficiently analytical of the complex political scene.

NATIONALISM IN LATIN AMERICA. By Gerhard Masur. The Macmillan Co. 278 pp. $5.95.

Surveys Latin America's nationalism from independence until the present, but not in depth.

NATIONALISM IN CONTEMPORARY LATIN AMERICA. By Arthur P. Whitaker and David C. Jordan. The Free Press. 229 pp. $6.95.

Dealing only with the 20th century, this study, though more informative than Masur's, also suffers from superficiality.

MARYSA NAVARRO GERASSI

sion. He also describes Castro's visit to Washington in April, 1959, and Eisenhower's sudden decision to fly to Georgia to play golf ("a diplomatic discourtesy"); Castro's meeting with Vice President Nixon ("this man has spent the whole time scolding me," Castro commented); the fact that the United States allowed light planes to fly from Florida in 1959 and burn Cuban cane fields and destroy sugar mills, and the "virulent campaign that certain sectors of the U.S. press waged against Cuba."

It was during that 1959 trip that López-Fresquet, upset by the U.S. press coverage, met with Time executive, C. D. Jackson, and asked him whether he thought his magazine's reporting was "objective."

"Whoever told you, young man, that Time is objective? We take sides and we combat whomever we place in a position contrary to ours," he records as the reply.

But he returns to Fidel Castro as the vivid center for the Cuban disaster:

He [Castro] is fascinated by catastrophe. (If removed from power) he would flee, not to Switzerland, this is not his nature, but to some inaccessible region of Latin America where he will hope to become the center of a revolution for all of Latin America. . . . Possessed by a persecution complex, he approaches life as if he were still a guerrilla fighter in the mountains. He is not a coward . . . he is motivated by temerity. . . . [Castro] is not a real revolutionary, because he has no cause. He has used different causes and will fight against anything that tends to limit his actions. He speaks until he is tired. He eats until he is sated. He moves until he is exhausted. He will fight until he is killed. He rebelled against Batista, against the Cuban community, against the U.S. He will rebel against Russia. . . . He has not tried to organize the community to bring a better life to Cuba, he has tried to make the community an ally in his permanent rebellion.

Though Castro's version of a tropical "Great Society" has its grotesque aspects to López-Fresquet, he turns up little evidence that a Washington-oriented Cuba would be more attractive, and he ends as he began, in criticism of the United States. "At no time should the U.S. have felt limited to two alternatives: Batista or Castro. The U.S. has failed . . . it has not shown the Cuban people the hope of a future free from Communism and also free from personal dictatorship."

In a world where might makes right (Hungary, 1956; Santo Domingo, 1965), the López-Fresquets of this world may be right, but they rarely win.

An Anthology of Nothings

NIL: Episodes in the literary conquest of void during the nineteenth century. By Robert Martin Adams. Oxford University Press. 249 pp. $6.

H. R. WOLF

Mr. Wolf teaches at Eastern Michigan University. He has contributed articles to The Psychoanalytic Review and American Imago.

Robert Martin Adams' Nil: Episodes in the literary conquest of void during the nineteenth century takes us into the existential underside of 19th-century literature. What we had thought were the dominant qualities of the age—"social reform," "religious questioning" and "scientific growth"—are called into question by Adams: "The great game of stretching appearances to cover realities is one at which the nineteenth century was so surpassingly good that in effect the nightmare of Nothing comes mostly to those who, for a multiplicity of possible reasons, seek or invite it." A view of the 19th century as progressive and positivist is rejected by Adams and is replaced by a view which makes the century a possible scenario of an Antonioni film.

For reasons which are not clearly articulated in the first section of the book, Adams prefers to avoid a causative approach to our "void-haunted, void-fascinated age." Social and intellectual history are ruled out as a means of understanding the development of existential consciousness. Somewhat petulantly, Adams writes off these critical perspectives as the "stock Darwin-Marx-Freud-World-War-I answer to this question." Ironically, some of the best pages in the book are devoted to an analysis of F. H. Bradley's Appearance and Reality in which Adams spells out with uncharacteristic clarity some of the philosophic sources of existential Angst. At a time when literary criticism is returning to a liberal imagination of the relationship between life and literature (Steven Marcus' The Other Victorians and Leo Marx's The Machine in the Garden come to mind), Professor Adams' study seems excessively formalist. It is New Criticism dressed up as phenomenology.

Because of the abandonment of social or intellectual analysis of ideas, and because of the nature of the material ("It [nothing] is never anything but a flat conception, a sudden blank; one is always a beginner in the study of this topic"), the book has what may be called lateral structure. Argumentation as drama (beginning-middle-end) gives way to a projection of a series of literary objects. In this sense, Nil is a catalogue, an anthology of Nothings, and will be useful for its parts, not its cumulative effect.

Since it is impossible to summarize what are presented as autonomous renderings of Nothing, I will present some of Adams' insights—usually provocative, always needing expansion and humility—into the rhetoric of void.

De Quincey is seen as setting up "purple passages" as a defense against direct confrontation with the void. This rhetorical "high-wire work" comes perilously close to falling but, in the end, maintains its balance, however precarious.

Poe's rationalism struggles to hold off dissolution of mind and matter: "Creation of threadbare exteriors, threatened by void without and vertigo within, Poe always raises the cracked house of reason next to the tarn of death and despair." Adams, for the most part, writes metaphorically, often drawing his imagery out of the texts he is working with. Criticism approaches poetry, and we find ourselves slipping into Nothing, rather than having it sized up for us.

In his discussion of Gogol's Dead Souls, Adams shows most clearly the relationship between narrative technique and void. The narrator of Dead Souls, in the act of narration, undermines the validity of storytelling. The first paragraph of Dead Souls is justly cited as an example of narrative subverting itself, turning away from the world it is turned toward: "The gentleman in the carriage was not handsome but neither was he particularly bad-looking; he was neither too fat nor too thin; he could not be said to be old, but he was not too young either."

For Flaubert, the acute sense of void derives "neither from introspection . . . nor from contemplation of ultimate distances . . . but from the middle ground of human experience and human history, seen in a special light." Society embodies Nothing. Style (one thinks of camp) is the only stay against void.

Baudelaire invokes Nothing as an escape from the impermanence of ego; Moby Dick is seen as an attempt to find a rhetoric that will suggest Nothing—the endless stylistic approaches to the whale; Mallarmé does not so much attempt to describe Nothing as to use language in such a way as to suggest its own dissolution: "Words themselves, jolted by radical metaphors and violent syntax out of their accustomed contexts, become multivalent and transparent, first as puns and anagrams, then through a series of connections so tenuous and intuitive as only to be symbolized by the relationships which make up a constellation"; for Wagner, it is Nothing as Liebestod; for Zola and Ibsen, it is sex and the fatal woman as Nothing; all these writers play variations upon Nothing. And others: S  nancour, Novalis, Maistre, James, Verhaeren, Leconte de Lisle, Stendhal, Barbey d'Aurevilly, Villiers de L'Isle-Adam, E.T.A. Hoffmann. And even so, the list is not complete.

Just as Nil is in need of a controlling social or intellectual perspective, so could it use a psychological vision. One would think that a discussion of self-destructive impulses and their relationship to 19th-century culture would be necessary. One would think also that the problem of identity—so often taking the form of feeling that one is nothing, nowhere—would have to be discussed in terms of the same cultural situation. To write such a book without alluding in some way to Erikson's work and Beyond the Pleasure Principle seems hardly possible or, if possible, less than we would want from a critic-scholar of Professor Adams' obvious sensitivity and insight. In the absence of such controlling perspectives, one comes away from Nil without feeling that he now can turn to other 19th-century texts with a stable conceptual framework to help him.

At some points, the book moves toward these needs: in the discussion of Bradley; in the brief account of the exemption of major English novelists from the problem of Nil.

By Adams' own admission, this is a preliminary study; and there is no doubt that existential and phenomenological critics will draw out its tightly knit fabric. Well and good. But one must get behind mind or outside of it, especially when its content is a "blank." Alienation and schizophrenia have the caste of Nothing, but there are methods of analysis to bring Something into Being.

As the United States sets fire to Vietnam, a possible prelude to the last fire, the rhetoric of Nothing seems inconsequential against the sources and determinants of this urge toward annihilation. Literary criticism which is not in some sense political, which is not in some sense psychological, cannot serve the deepest needs of this time. The medium is not the message.

To Solve a Paradox

TOWARD A GENERAL THEORY OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT. By Thomas I. Emerson. Random House. 245 pp. $4.95.

VICTOR RABINOWITZ

Mr. Rabinowitz is a member of the New York bar, and specializes in constitutional law, civil liberties and civil rights.

Every state, almost by definition, must resist sedition, most of all when it threatens to be successful; yet the democratic state, if it is to retain its character, must permit utterances which might promote successful sedition. The keeping of law and order is a basic responsibility of any state; yet speech which threatens law and order must be permitted in a democracy, even if the threat is real. To resolve these dilemmas, to solve these paradoxes, is an abiding problem in a free and open society. In the United States, the ground rules for the task are set by the First Amendment to the Constitution.

The need for freedom of expression is clear enough. It is the best method of advancing knowledge and discovering social truth; it provides the government with the public criticism without which despotism flourishes; it affords some degree of balance between stability and change; and finally (and perhaps most important), it is necessary if the primary function of a democratic society is to be met—the self-fulfillment of the individual and the complete realization of his dignity as a human being.

The courts as well as political commentators and philosophers have advanced a broad spectrum of approaches to the guarantees provided by the First Amendment. At one extreme, as in Gillow v. New York, the Supreme Court applied the "bad tendency" test (since abandoned) and held that the state might punish utterances "tending to corrupt public morals, incite to crime or disturb the public peace"; on the other, Justice Black and the late Alexander Meiklejohn have come close to advocating an "absolute test" which, while not "absolutely absolute," does limit the area of restraint to a minimum.

Aside from the problem of defining the abstract principles of freedom of expression, many other problems of interpretation are plain to a practicing lawyer. These arise on an administrative level but they are most important in practice. Actually, in applying the First Amendment, or any law, the standards should be clear and objective; otherwise every policeman and every magistrate will apply the rules in accordance with his own political concepts or his own psychological quirks which, realistically speaking, are not likely to be very progressive or to tend toward greater freedom. Since freedom of speech and press are meant to be exercised in large part on the streets, recognition by police officers of the limitation on their authority to interfere is important; it is small consolation for a street-corner speaker to know that if he is arrested, his rights will three years hence be vindicated in the Supreme Court.

Professor Emerson's essay (first published in the Yale Law Journal in 1963) is an effort to define general principles of First Amendment interpretation which will allow the greatest degree of freedom consistent with the existence of a structured state, and to formulate those principles in a fashion which can be understood and applied at all levels of government. Obviously, this is not an easy task and complete success can hardly be expected. Not only are the concepts difficult and the passions involved high but our thinking on this subject has been pragmatic rather than theoretical and, in our system, courts pass on issues on a case-by-case basis and elucidate general principles only in passing. Emerson's views are admittedly tentative but they make a long stride forward in the direction of a sound analysis of the problem.

His basic thesis is that under our Constitution the government may regulate only action, not expression, and it may regulate action only directly, not indirectly by regulation of speech, press or association.

If we understand Emerson correctly, advocacy of a change in our form of government, even by force and violence, should not be in itself subject to governmental regulation or restriction. It is time enough for the government to step in if necessary to prevent the force and violence. The same is true of the advocacy of any other doctrine, however objectionable it may be and however subversive of

WAR

The horse left its hoof print on the child's face like a dulled scimitar cutting through a field of swamp grass. Slit eyes, ruptured neck, and terrible crushed teeth; nose ripped from bridge to lips. She grins in razor beneficence at the white, blasted, palace wall.

*The scene: the tree on the hill in place; the well, rim intact, rope curling from the winch.
Wagon on the barn floor, traces rolled around the center pole. The pitchfork prongs warm and bright from work in the hayfields.*

*In the village beneath the guns a child calls from the dust:
"Then something happened
A war has happened
It was called the Trojans war
Men had killed their enemy Killing and death biting and fighting these did for their braveness they did
All but one side has to win
But these men shall try to win"*

*The cannons glide on the smoke like dead fish on the oily surface of a deck. A flower tumbles down the empty street, stem over bud.
A white mare's head is pinned by a spoke in the mud.*

*The soldier who guards the river-bend falls into a dream of house and wife.
Boy child and woman sitting on a stone wall bordering one edge of a courtyard.*

As he dreamed the enemy left to guard the walls of a ruined fort looked up from his trumpet and saw the white plume of the dreaming guard swagger in a down current of sun and wind,

*He moves upon him with a short knife, pulls it down through the plume and eye,
and plunges it into his throat.*

In his dream the knife struck the brain as the child prepared to jump from wall to cobble pavement. Precisely it cut the retina in two when his white sandal touched the cobble, when his toe brushed the first rounded sunlit curve of the pavement.

He swallows in the light and spits it out again.

*The scene: the ruined altar. The door of the ark bent on its silver hinges. Flies on the holy breads.
A woman hit by the descent of the Rose Window is impaled on the altar rail.*

*The wife lays the table
in the shade of the well, in the center of the courtyard:
cool butter,
cream on berries red melon
on the white plate.*

NED O'GORMAN

existing institutions. So too, group libel, the libel of religious, racial or ethnic communities, may not be regulated until it results in action harmful to the state—and then it is the action that should be restricted, not the libel. This position is often hard to take especially when our own ox is being gored, but take it we must if the principles of the First Amendment are to be upheld and consistently applied to provide the freedom of speech we all want to exercise on behalf of our own convictions.

There are times, of course, when words are used not to advocate or provoke action—they are in effect acts which in themselves have undesirable consequences. The Holmesian man who falsely shouts "Fire!" in a crowded theatre provides the classic example. Libel of an individual is another. Such utterances are, in Emerson's view, verbal acts and subject to governmental restriction. Mr. Justice Black would disagree, at least in the case of libel.

Emerson's analysis is detailed and often subtle; various uses of speech and press and their effect on both internal and external security are considered. Differences between public and private interests are explored and the relationship of free speech to each of them. In all, the essay is thorough and provocative.

There are many today who feel that the fabric of our society is threatened by race riots, sit-ins, black power, white backlash, civil disobedience, group libel and bitter, often unrestrained, opposition to the war—all being frequently reflected in expressions of extreme disrespect and even hatred for the Chief Magistrate of the nation and his associates. To such, any extension of First Amendment freedoms threatens law and order in its most fundamental aspects, and the temptation to impose restrictions on speech are almost irresistible.

Emerson's answer is twofold. First, our police force is quite capable of handling any illegal action which may occur, and from the point of view of the safety of the state there is no necessity for restricting expression. Further, and more significant, he urges that when a community seems unable to maintain law and order "the remedy lies in using other measures which will restore a basic consensus rather than in abandoning the system of freedom of expression." A state confronted with internal disorder always has the alternative of suppressing the disorder or addressing itself to the problems which give rise to the trouble. The choice in a democratic society ought to be clear.

There is a valuable appendix of selections from major Supreme Court decisions relating to the First Amendment.

Fluoroscoping the AMA

A SACRED TRUST. By Richard Harris. New American Library. 218 pp. $5.

RICHARD CARTER

Mr. Carter is the author of The Doctor Business (Doubleday) Breakthrough: The Saga of Jonas Salk (Trident) and, currently, Superswine (Trident).

This splendid book expands the series of New Yorker articles in which Richard Harris fluoroscoped the American Medical Association. Because the AMA impinges on the nerves of the body politic like some kind of socio-economic slipped disk, it has been examined repeatedly—seldom, however, with anything close to Harris' intelligence and wit.

I sometimes think that no American journalist of liberal persuasion considers his career official until he has written a book exposing the AMA, or unveiling the secrets of medical economics, or revealing the hideous truth about American health care, or all three. The books come in clusters at intervals which seem to be determined less by developments in medicine than by cyclical impulses in the publishing houses. Having written such a book myself, several clusters ago, I have become a harsh, sour, hypocritical judge of my successors in the chase. The way I figure it, they should work another side of the street and leave me in peace.

It can be assumed therefore that I understate when I call A Sacred Trust superb. It is the only good book in the current outbreak of doctor-AMA-health exposés. Harris is a first-rate researcher and a distinguished craftsman with a fluid, graceful, precise, epigrammatic style. Even more to the point, he is fearless. His politics are adult. He knows what makes the wheels move. He puts things in context. He is too sophisticated to expend his valuable indignation on the misdemeanors of the physician-as-a-person. He knows, and allows the reader to see, that the physician is a creature of the AMA and of the unreliable system of entrepreneur medicine championed by the AMA. (My only complaint is against the book's publisher for an inexcusable failure to supply an index.)

The "sacred trust" of the book's title is the Hippocratic responsibility of the physician to the rest of us. Harris does not belabor the point. He simply shows why the United States took until 1965 to establish a system of governmental health insurance (Medicare), and why it was the last industrial nation to do so. The AMA was why—with assistance from Congressional temporizers.

He tells the story from its beginnings: 1847, when the AMA began, and the years immediately prior to World War I, when the country came very close to adopting a health-insurance plan more serviceable than the anemic compromise which now appears in the statute books.

A Sacred Trust is mostly fresh and non-medical. The story of how Medicare finally got through Congress chills the blood. It has never been told in this detail or at this level of understanding. Even if you think you know all you want to know about the AMA, you undoubtedly will find that certain aspects of the legislative process come as a shock. Indeed, having read Harris, I begin to wonder whether we exposers haven't been wasting our time on the AMA. Somebody really ought to take on Congress. Maybe Harris will.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

Walking Happy is a new musical at the Lunt-Fontanne Theatre (book by Roger Hirson and Ketti Frings, lyrics by Sammy Cahn, music by James Van Heusen) based on Harold Brighouse's charming comedy Hobson's Choice. Despite its modesty, the original play was revived by the British National Theatre in 1964 because in its own winning way it celebrates a woman's role in giving her working-class husband the gumption to defy the old Victorian class system.

I Do! I Do! is another musical (book and lyrics by Tom Jones and music by Harvey Schmidt); it is based on Jan de Hartog's The Fourposter, a cute two-character comedy tracing the course of a marriage which lasts for fifty years.

I juxtapose information on these two shows not only because I saw them one after the other but because there is a little theatrical lesson to learn by contrasting them. Hobson's Choice is an endearing piece which deserves its longevity (it was first produced in 1916); The Fourposter, though pleasant enough, is a long string of clichés which in I Do! I Do! become pretty sticky, not to say "icky." Yet I Do! I Do! provides better entertainment than Walking Happy.

Walking Happy is an agreeable show—at moments it is almost as sweetly affecting ■ the original. (It might do very well in London, particularly if performed in a small house. A smaller house would help here too, but producing it that way would not be practical since hardly any show on Broadway can be staged for less than $75,000, while a musical is considered cheap if it costs no more than $250,000.) The cast is notable for the presence of the Englishman, Norman Wisdom, who has the appeal of a wispy busker (a London street singer), a slightly pathetic little man with great performing grit, and the American, Louise Troy, who really can act and sing.

There are some effective and well-choreographed numbers by Danny Daniels with lyrics to match, but the show's atmosphere is musty, due to the heaviness of Cy Feuer's direction and to Robert Randolph's settings. Randolph is an extremely able designer (How To Succeed in Business Without Really Trying, Sweet Charity) when he renders the hideous functionalism and razzle-dazzle of the modern urban scene, but his skill fails him when he has to convey the dejected intimacy of one of the north English black towns for musical comedy use. The production as a whole plods.

I Do! I Do! triumphs over its platitude through the chic, lightness, unobtrusive ingenuity of Oliver Smith's settings, the inventiveness of Gower Champion's fleet direction, and the immensely gratifying professionalism of Mary Martin and Robert Preston. These two do everything well from the projection of a song (I gagged at the lyrics of What Is a Woman? despite Miss Martin's dignified delivery), the sprightly execution of what are merely outlines of choreographic ideas: the barefoot prance over the bed in which the prop itself appears to dance. Miss Martin knows more about feminine stage make-up than any other American actress except Lynn Fontanne. She has never been better since One Touch of Venus, never more aptly instructed than by her present director.

I must mention that there is no chorus in the show and no one in the cast beside its two stars; the extra paraphernalia is never missed. One hopes that Miss Martin and Mr. Preston can retain their joy in performance throughout the long run I Do! I Do! will surely have.

I should like to say some enthusiastic things about David Westheimer's My Sweet Charlie (Longacre) because of its right thinking and humorously cordial sentiment in regard to personal relations between black and white. But I could only do so if the play were presented in Alabama or Mississippi. It is simplistic to the degree that I cannot make even a good "social" case for it in New York.

It is harmlessly sentimental and I did not mind seeing it (which is something I can't say about many more successful shows), but it contributes very little to anything it deals with. Its best features are the engaging performances of that good actor Louis Gossett and of 18-year-old Bonnie Bedelia, whom Gossett refers to joshingly as "ugly," though I found her singularly attractive. She is a pleasing actress and will get to be much better when she becomes sufficiently experienced not to follow her director as sedulously as she does now.

Arthur Barea in his book on Lorca has said apropos of that dramatist's Yerma (Vivian Beaumont Theater): "To a Spanish public it is a soul-shocking experience." One of the difficulties with Lorca on our stage is that he is a poet and a good part of his value is therefore lost in translation. This is not intended as a criticism of W. S. Merwin's translation in the production by the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center; it is a comment on almost all the Lorca productions I have seen here and in France.

I am convinced that though the play is a "tragic poem," it is not at all without dramatic interest. I can imagine a production which might be thoroughly dramatic and moving. Even in some of the literal translations made by Ilsa Barea for her husband's book, I feel some of the beauty, power and originality which Spaniards claim for Lorca.

Yerma, besides being the name of the central character, is Spanish for "barren." The play's story deals with a woman furiously unhappy because she hasn't borne a child. But it is no more a play about the misfortune of that condition than all Renaissance paintings of the Madonna and the infant Christ are religious. It is a tragedy of modern Spain, which is one reason why Lorca is so profoundly appreciated in Spain not alone by the intelligentsia but by the unlettered public as well. Barea says that in this play Lorca "shows the moral conventions applied with such uncompromising completeness and self-revealing sterility that he provokes rebellion against them. . . ."

Though factually descriptive and psychologically particularized in regard to the woman, the play mirrors the attrition of Spanish life since 1898. The Church (Lorca is explicit about this) and the monarchy had much to do with it. Yerma is barren because her husband is and prefers to be sterile. He is intent only on cultivating his farm, on the sexual possession of the woman he has married, when he is not otherwise engaged, and on protecting his honor. Whatever Yerma's resulting obsession, it is clear that she teems with the passion forever present in the land and in its people, but is frustrated by the ruling masculine order and by her own submission to its code.

Read in even the barest translation, both the prose and verse of this play communicate extraordinary tension and strength, together with a vividly colorful lyricism. But the low-keyed production at the Vivian Beaumont is either tepid or dry in feeling—particularly apparent in so large an auditorium. The décor and movement are uninteresting or bleakly arty. The acting is bloodless even when it aims at being fiery, and the staging absurd.

How, for instance, can we believe that the peasants are coming from the fields when they emerge all too plainly from the recesses of the theatre basement amid subscriber-spectators from whom, except for costume, they are indistinguishable. This, it may be countered, is modern staging: no proscenium arch; scenes are to be played where the first five rows of the orchestra are normally situated, etc., etc. But the new convention in itself creates no more drama or theatricality than was provided by the painted backdrops, borders, returns, footlights of ancient vintage. On a truly naked platform, in a small studio with actors of stirring temperament instead of producers with limp theories, the play might come alive. Lorca would then achieve his proper stature as an intensely dramatic poet.

We regret that by an oversight our contributors booklist failed to include a book published in 1966 by our drama critic, Harold Clurman. It is The Naked Image: Observations on the Modern Theatre (Macmillan, $6.50), a collection of theatre reviews and essays.—Editor

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 1-2-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

STATE ZIP NO.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1182

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 One should see this to the north, but it's fancy work. (11)
- 9 One might on the shoulder, though it probably goes over your head. (4-4)
- 10 The object of 1 going crazy for a drink? (6)
- 11 and 27 The deep south of the U.S.? (3, 4, 2, 6)
- 12 One who countenances help on the rise? (7)
- 14 Possible result of a wound a third person has to dress. (6)
- 15 The military leave finished what some celebrate? (8)
- 17 One of the things that makes vegetables so high? (4, 4)
- 20 Get out of bed, and put on a white coat as the cook does? (6)
- 22 If, perhaps, barely a dress! (7)
- 24 Represent too favorably, but not so round. (7)
- 26 A degree in music from another country? (6)
- 27 See 11 across
- 28 Perceives where peanut shells might get dropped at circuses. (11)

DOWN:

- 2 A little type to set fire to, and a little type to impart knowledge to. (9)
- 3 Dug live material out of it, like a shower might. (7)
- 4 All these for those who pay attention! (4)
- 5 Covering numerous objects in transportation, as they used to say. (7)

- 6 What of the thing the watchman asked? (5)
- 7 This takes several pecks, even for hens. (6)
- 8 A couple of charges with a downward motion getting an encouraging shout. (6)
- 13 One hurried about, as Nathan Hale observed. (5)
- 16 Some of us feel so obvious to get cut down. (9)
- 18 One who leaves before poetically catching a plane? (6)
- 19 It's not true this is how one might hope to catch a runner. (3, 4)
- 20 Might it be somewhat of a problem to get me a mild mixture? (7)
- 21 Was this glory to Poe and others? (6)
- 23 Round in a tournament, perhaps. (5)
- 25 Fuel accounts? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1181

ACROSS: 1 Marched off; 6 Utah; 10 Growler; 11 Oil well; 12 Substantiation; 14 Rocketed; 15 Teaser; 16 Thrust; 18 Circuses; 22 Bulletin boards; 24 Heave to; 25 Thereto; 27 Geodesists. DOWN: 1 Magistrate; 2 Rhombic; 4 Durante; 5 Florid; 7, 8, 26, 23, and 3 The gods help them that help themselves; 9 Clothes closets; 13 Dress shops; 17 Roulade; 19 Ignited; 20 Streets; 21 Stooze.

$2.95
each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

Each file holds a full year's copies.

Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER
UPON REQUEST

PUBLICATIONS

For latest developments in CHINA'S CULTURAL REVOLUTION subscribe now to PEKING REVIEW (in English) airmailed weekly $4. Also China Pictorial, China Reconstructs, and Chinese Literature @ $3 each seamail. Write for our free catalog of 700 imported publications in English from China. CHINA BOOKS & PERIODICALS, 2929 24 St., San Francisco, California 94110.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound." — James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

DOES UNCLE SAM WANT YOU? Escape from "Freedom," a new pamphlet explains Canadian immigration procedures. Send 50c plus handling to SUPA Anti-draft Program, 658 Spadina Avenue, Toronto 4, Canada.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington, D.C. 20036.

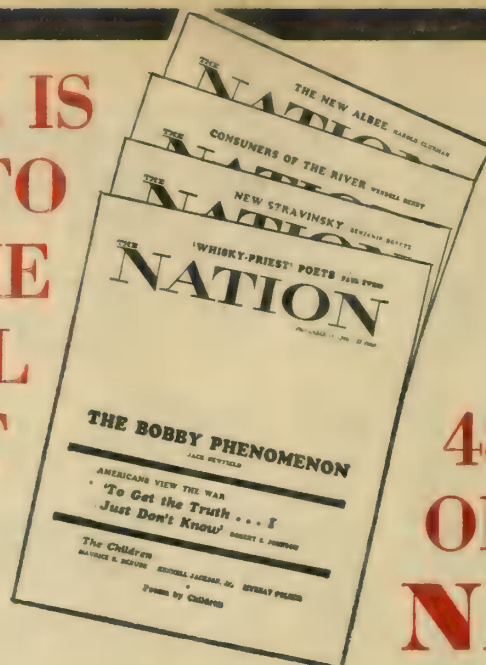

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

THERE IS STILL TIME TO GIVE THE THOUGHTFUL GIFT

48 ISSUES
OF THE
NATION

PLUS FREE BONUS BOOK UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED by Ralph Nader

Here is the perfect gift for a thinking friend. 48 issues of this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion, plus this decade's most controversial book.

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED is the blistering attack on the auto industry that rocked Detroit, Washington and hundreds of thousands of readers from coast to coast. The American Trial Lawyers Assn. Journal called Mr. Nader's book "Pulitzer prize material." Science Magazine said UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED "is likely to be the Silent Spring of traffic safety." For anyone who spends any time at all in a car, this controversial book is "must" reading. And it's a bonus absolutely free, when you enter a holiday subscription to The Nation.

● "A ringing indictment of the industry. . . . Strongly recommended. . . . He has done prodigious research in a field mired in anonymity, and has come up with a book that, hopefully, will change Detroit's ways. . . ."

Eliot Fremont-Smith, New York Times

● "A powerful and persuasive case that Detroit has indeed slighted safety considerations in a headlong pursuit of pleasurable styling. . . ."

Wall Street Journal

● "Deeply disturbing. . . . Exhaustive and persuasive. . . . He cites numerous weaknesses in certain Big Three models of recent years, naming names in each instance and quoting from court proceedings."

John Barkham, Saturday Review Syndicate

SPECIAL HOLIDAY OFFER

THE NATION / 333 SIXTH AVENUE / NEW YORK, N. Y. 10014

Please send The Nation as a Gift for one year at the holiday rate of $10 for the first Gift subscription, and $8 for each additional Gift, to the following friends. I understand they will receive a BONUS of UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED.

Name
Address
City State Zip
Sign Gift Card from

Name
Address
City State Zip
Sign Gift Card from

(For more than two Gift Subscriptions, please use a separate piece of paper.)

Your Own Name
Address
City State Zip

☐ I enclose payment of $
☐ Bill me

Foreign and Canadian: $1 per year extra

LETTER FROM PRAGUE JOSE YGLESIAS

THE NATION

JANUARY 9, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

JAN 9 1967

LIBRARY

Rise of the CIA

HOW FOGGY BOTTOM LOST ITS SPIES

SMITH SIMPSON

Anti-Missiles

New Twist in the Arms Spiral

GEORGE C. WILSON

American Catholicism

The Wind from Rome

GARY MacEOIN

The Violent Scene

CONGRESSION / JOHN PAUL SCOTT on HOSTILITY / MARTIN LEBOWITZ on HOMOSEXUALITY / JACK LEAVITT

NEWSPAPER 1

3-22-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

use of silence

San Gabriel, Calif.

DEAR SIR: In over fifty locations across the nation every Wednesday from 12 noon to 1 P.M., there are held Silent Vigils in protest against the war in Vietnam.

This type of protest is rapidly increasing and is particularly effective in widening the concern and making available a method of dissent to many who would otherwise refrain from overt dissent. The Weekly Silent Vigil for Peace gives such persons an avenue for showing their concern and sorrow over the tragedy of our involvement and, in addition, is a weekly confrontation of the issue and a call to others to get involved. These vigils have varied in size from as few as eight persons to a high of 300 in one location. The Silent Vigil is a visible and continuing protest against the tragedy of our involvement in Vietnam.

The originator of the idea is Charles Hubbell, 1060 Randolph Road, Santa Barbara, Calif.; he has established a clearinghouse for all interested in this form of protest. All indications are that this is a successful and effective means of dissent, especially in the atmosphere of increasing frustration and despair.

Robert H. Simmons

translating Agnon

Cambria Heights, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: I congratulate Curt Leviant for writing—and you for publishing—his perceptive and illuminating essay on Shmuel Yosef Agnon ["Nobel Laureate of Hebrew Literature," Dec. 12]. As a student of Jewish literature, I am sometimes asked why Agnon is so difficult to translate, and Leviant has given the reader an insight into this problem, as well as an intelligent appreciation of his work and stature. Harold U. Ribalow whose speedometer?

San Bernardino, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Just to be sure you don't miss this: "... two photographers driving separate cars said they couldn't keep up with the President despite traveling 80 to 85 miles an hour, and faster in some spurts."

"The White House, using figures from an official log, said Johnson 'drove at a moderate speed' on his way to church along a fog-bound highway Sunday."

Above are excerpts from a news item published in the San Bernardino (Calif.) Evening Telegram, Dec. 5. Clifford M. Turner

sick pay

New York City

DEAR SIR: Selig Greenberg is mostly right in criticizing the philosophy of Medicare: use the present organization of medical care and add a financial mechanism for paying its costs ["The Medicare Bonanza," The Nation, Nov. 14]. This almost guarantees that our major problems of medical economics will remain with us, namely, the inefficient operation of hospitals (Sweden's hospitals give better care than ours with 60 per cent of the personnel we use), the antiquated fee-for-service solo medical practice (where earning his income is at least as important a factor as the proper thing to do for the patient in the doctor's daily decisions), and most sharply, the nursing homes operated for profit. . . .

I foresee years of grappling with the problems of costs and quality of care consequent to the conflict be-

(Continued on page 62)

EDITORIALS

A Break?

A certain amount of distortion and plain lying is essential to waging war as are men and materiel. In this respect the Vietnamese War has been in the standard pattern. On the matter of downed U.S. aircraft, for instance, the official United States and North Vietnamese communiqués have never agreed. The enemy has always claimed more planes than we have been willing to concede. The gap has been equally wide on civilian casualties resulting from U.S. bombing. The bombings of Hanoi on December 13 and 14 were marked by the usual reports of civilian casualties and the usual Pentagon denials. (See editorial, "Peace and the Pentagon," The Nation, January 2.) But then a new element emerged. A short UPI dispatch of December 22 carried a State Department admission that it was "almost certain" U.S. bombings had struck civilian areas of Hanoi, "but if they accidentally did," the United States regretted it.

But more extraordinary developments were in train. As this acknowledgment was put on the wires, Harrison Salisbury, of The New York Times, was flying to Hanoi from Phnom Penh, the capital of Cambodia, aboard an aircraft of the International Control Commission.

Salisbury's first dispatch from Hanoi practically obliterated any area of dispute over the December 13-14 bombings. "Hanoi," he wrote, "is a very large, sprawling city . . . the built-up, densely populated urban area extends for a substantial distance in all directions beyond the heavy-lined city boundaries shown on a map issued by the State Department." He cited the Yenbien rail yard, which on the map seems far out in the country, but actually—as U.S. reconnaissance photographs must have shown—is in an area built up all the way from the city center to beyond the rail yard. Other targets were likewise in populated areas. "It is unlikely," Salisbury concluded, "that any bombing attack on such targets could be carried out without civilian damage and casualties."

Salisbury saw the damage and received on-the-spot reports of the casualties. Particularly impressive was his account, on December 27, of the repeated bombing of Namdinh, a textile center 50 miles south of Hanoi. Namdinh has been systematically attacked since June 28, 1965, by U.S. Seventh Fleet aircraft. "The cathedral tower," Salisbury writes, "looks out on block after block of utter desolation: the city's population of 90,000 has been reduced to less than 20,000 because of evacuation; 13 per cent of the city's houses, including the homes of 12,464 people, have been destroyed; eighty-nine people have been killed and 405 wounded."

Our forces obligingly bombed Hanoi while Salisbury was there. Has there ever been a parallel situation in a modern war? A prominent newsman from one of the belligerents visits the enemy capital, with the permission of both governments. He cables back reports damaging to his own government. His dispatches are printed and widely quoted. The war goes on, but on this one issue the two governments have in effect selected a reliable arbitrator.

Optimism on a resolution of the larger issues of the war would be premature, but the Salisbury mission lends some credence to John M. Hightower's article in the Sunday Washington Star (December 25) remarking on a show of candor by both sides in the matter of the December 13-14 bombings. The State Department is said to be seeking "some basis of mutual credibility," so that the U.S. and North Vietnamese Governments can begin an exchange of views. Hightower thinks the war may be scaled down or even ended in 1967. Salisbury's mission just might be the gleam of light at the end of the tunnel.

The Arms Spiral

In this issue (p. 46) George C. Wilson, Pentagon reporter for The Washington Post, traces the geometry of the new situation—technological, geopolitical, political—that may well give another dangerous twist to the arms spiral. Some cold comfort may be found in the circumstance that the anti-ballistic-missile argument will not be resolved immediately; there is still time for those who oppose the program to make themselves heard. Secretary Rusk reports that every effort is being made to work out some kind of agreement with the Russians that would avert this next, clearly foreseeable, acceleration of the arms race. Llewellyn Thompson is scheduled to resume his old post in Moscow later this month, and no doubt he has been instructed to give priority to the possibility of an agreement not to deploy anti-missile systems. Then, too, the seventeen-nation disarmament conference, slated to reconvene on February 21, will be used by other nations to press for some kind of agreement between the two major powers. Additional slight comfort may be found in the fact that the Nike X missile system is technically suspect and, on the face of it, would be worthless without a complementary shelter program, for which the public has shown a consistent aversion. The anti-missile system, plus the shelters, would be fantastically expensive. It is hard to believe that the cost of this program would be superimposed on the exploding costs of the Vietnamese War but it is by no means unthinkable.

The New York Times (December 25) reports that "American capitalists are extremely intrigued" by the Nike X project, which promises "tremendous profits" for some 3,000 companies directly involved—not to mention those that would be the beneficiaries of a shelter program. In purely political terms, also, the prospects for the program's adoption are not unfavorable. Rep. Gerald Ford has predicted that the Republicans will support the program and, if they do, Johnson will probably follow their lead, or in any case not oppose them. As in all such debates, the factor of secrecy will favor the Pentagon. The intelligence reports on which the military will rely will not be available to press or public. In retrospect, it is conceded that the "missile gap" which the Democrats exploited in 1960 did not exist. The fact that a serious division of opinion is said to exist within the Administration over the extent to which the Soviets have actually deployed an anti-missile system suggests the need for extreme caution and skepticism in assessing reports of this latest security "gap" which, as with the earlier one, is being ballyhooed just as the stage is being set for a Presidential election.

Certainly the public would be well advised to demand

IN THIS ISSUE

January 9, 1967

EDITORIALS

34

ARTICLES

- 38 Rise of the CIA:
How Foggy Bottom Lost Its Spies
Smith Simpson
- 42 American Catholicism:
The Wind from Rome
Gary MacEoin
- 46 Anti-Missiles:
New Twist in the Arms Spiral
George C. Wilson
- 49 Shale Oil: The Sleeping Giant
Roscoe Fleming
- 50 Snap Jobs and Cheap Money:
Uruguay's Double Inflation
Richard O'Mara

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 53 That Old-Time Aggression
John Paul Scott
- 54 The Ordinarity of Sodomy
Jack Leavitt
- 57 Making the Violent Scene
Martin Lebowitz
- 59 Letter from Prague
Jose Yglesias
- 60 Spaces (poem)
Harvey Shapiro
- 61 Films
Robert Hatch
- 63 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor	CAREY McWILLIAMS	Washington	ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Managing Editor	ROBERT HATCH	Paris	ALEXANDER WERTH
Literary Editor	HELEN YGLESIAS	Theatre	HAROLD CLURMAN
Poetry Editor	MICHAEL GOLDMAN	Art	MAX KOZLOFF
Copy Editor	MARION HESS	Music	BENJAMIN BORETZ
Advertising Manager	MARY SIMON	Science	CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Vol. 204
No. 2

that the intelligence reports, and the feasibility studies, on which the program is based, should be examined by a national commission made up of individuals not known as hawks or doves but for their honesty, intelligence and candor. The report of such a commission might help dissuade the Republicans from exploiting a security "gap" which may not exist, and just might encourage the Administration to resist the anti-missile stampede that is shaping up. Few issues on the agenda of the new Congress warrant closer public attention than this one.

Fragile Shelter

Another reason for approaching the anti-missile lap of the arms race with some caution is that—however certain the commercial profits implicit in the system—its ability to throw up a really effective protecting umbrella is a matter of divided opinion. Even within the industry there are not a few skeptics and doubters. One who warns of possible difficulties is Karl Sittel of the Radio Corporation of America. More than a year ago Dr. Sittel wrote a paper on "Effects on Radar of Plasma Produced by High-Altitude Nuclear Detonation." The paper is published currently by the RCA Missile and Surface Radar Division, with the reservation that the effects are discussed only "to the extent allowed by security regulations in an unclassified paper."

At the heart of an ABM system are specialized types of high-speed radar which, in combination with high-speed computers, will (it is hoped) guide rapid-acceleration defensive missiles to the vicinity of incoming ICBMs and deflect or destroy them. Thus, if the radar installations can be thrown into confusion, the entire ABM system, however ingeniously constructed and otherwise effective, becomes useless. It can neither deflect the enemy's missiles nor guide its own.

In simplest terms, radar works by sending out electromagnetic pulses which are then reflected from an object (ship, aircraft, missile, etc.) and come back with an indication of the nature of the object, its course and speed. With this information, the position of the object at a future instant can be calculated for interception. Perturbations in the intervening medium may block or distort the radar return. The medium in the case of an anti-ICBM radar is the ionosphere—the region above the dense portion of the earth's atmosphere. Like 95 per cent of the universe, it is composed of plasma (no connection with blood plasma), which is gas in a state of thermal and electrical excitation. What Sittel investigates, mathematically and physically, are the disturbances in the ionospheric plasma caused by an atomic explosion.

These phenomena are not new. Experiments with high-altitude nuclear explosions made in 1958 showed pronounced effects on radio communication, on a global scale. Sittel evaluates these effects on radar, and his findings have obvious reference to radars associated with ABM systems. "Contrary to a nuclear detonation at or near the ground," he points out, "the tremendous energies released from a single high-altitude nuclear detonation are almost entirely transferred into the ionization of the atmosphere." Electro-magnetic waves encountering the plasmas thus generated are subject to absorption, reflection, refraction, diffraction, scattering and other changes. One of the plasmas, the fireball, "will black out radar frequencies for many minutes," and this is only an example of the deleterious effects produced. "The degradation of radar systems by the combination of all the phenomena . . ." Sittel concludes, "must be seriously considered in all future designs of military systems."

What this means is that a few nuclear-tipped enemy missiles, launched and sequenced as outrunners, can probably paralyze the radars long enough to disable the ABM systems. Picked up on early-warning radars before they explode, these missiles will give notice to the controllers that a salvo of ICBMs will probably follow and can proceed unimpeded to their targets. The controllers will have no choice but to launch their retaliatory ICBMs, likewise with the first ones set to explode where they can disable the enemy ABM systems. Mutual neutralization of ABMs will be the end result of the expenditure of all those billions of dollars and rubles. The risk of an accidental nuclear showdown will be substantially increased. If, as is conceivable, the early warning radars have given a false indication, but the ICBMs have already been loosed, it will be just too bad. Also for Wall Street.

After Apollo, Why?

The National Aeronautics and Space Administration was supposed to report to a Congressional committee by December 1 on its plans for the years following completion of the Project Apollo series, but the deadline passed and no report was issued. Instead, the agency sent a long letter to the President which, with his penchant for secrecy, he has not released.

Not that NASA didn't have any plans in mind; its ambitions are as boundless as outer space. Suggested projects include the development of a re-usable booster rocket, colonizing the moon, putting a manned research laboratory in orbit, and, looking ahead, an expedition to Mars—which Dr. Jerome Wiesner once estimated might take thirty to thirty-five years and cost $100 billion. This year NASA is spending a modest $5.4 billion, which the President—who has always dealt generously with the agency in the past—felt compelled to cut back by a few million because of the high costs of killing in Vietnam (the current estimate is that it now costs $322,000 to kill a single enemy soldier in combat). So in fiscal 1968, NASA may have to make do with $5 billion or thereabouts. But the empire builders of the agency are intrepid and resourceful, and NASA's "growth" prospects are excellent. For one thing, it has a huge organization (some 400,000 people are directly involved in space programs) and is supported by a potent lobby, the American Institute of Aeronautics & Astronautics. Then, too, NASA has built up a vast popular constituency through its brilliantly staged television space spectacles.

The new governmental-industrial hybrids, of which NASA is an outstanding example, are inherently difficult to curb; power is built into the structure of the organization itself. No agency of government, Executive or legislative, knows enough about NASA to control or direct it. In any argument over funds, NASA can always say that without new projects the organization will disintegrate. In terms of pressing social needs, it is easy to agree with William Hines of the Washington Star who says that the proper question should be not "After Apollo, What?" but "After Apollo, Why?" This is, indeed, the right question, but it is too late to raise it. Ours is not to reason why but to appropriate more and more. And behind the real question is the real problem: can the government regulate and control, much less direct, such formidable fusions of government and private power as NASA represents?

No doubt NASA has stimulated American technology and science and it may be assumed that its performance has been first rate. But the problem remains, can NASA be regulated? Can its inexhaustible appetite for power and projects be subjected to any kind of democratic discipline? Who is to determine the magnitude of space appropriations? By what standards and in terms of what priorities? NASA is in orbit—that's the real problem. It circles the governmental universe and from time to time sends back cryptic messages, but it no longer belongs (if it ever did) to the people whose taxes support it.

The 'P.C.' Gimmick

"P.C." is financial jargon for "participating certificate," a hybrid type of government security issued in the past by the Federal National Mortgage Association ("Fanny May"). These securities, which have never come to the attention of the ordinary citizen, are now revealed as a possible means of fiscal legerdemain in the presentation of the federal budget. By substituting P.C.s for conventional treasury obligations, the President could make the budget for fiscal year 1968 look pretty good, when in reality it is badly out of balance. Whether such deception is actually perpetrated, and, if so, whether Congress will go along, remains to be seen.

In the past, Fanny May has floated P.C.s in a ring-around-the-rosy game of mortgage financing in which the federal government and private lending agencies are the players. Almost all small home purchases in the United States are financed with a small down payment and a lifetime of monthly payments on a mortgage. The lender sells the mortgage to Fanny May—often with a prior commitment by the latter to buy—thus getting his money back for further lending. Fanny May gets its money back by the sale of P.C.s which are guaranteed, like government bonds, by "the full faith and credit of the United States." Besides home loans, college housing and academic facilities, farm mortgages and small business loans are refinanced by P.C.s. In effect, the P.C. buyer gets a share in a pool of miscellaneous loans made in the past by the United States Government.

When P.C.s are offered in the open market, they compete with other certificates of debt and affect interest rates and salability of corporate bonds. Since the bond market was in poor shape in 1966, President Johnson announced, in September, that further sales of P.C.s would be postponed until the bond market improved. The gimmick consists not in such sales but in the proposed "sale" of P.C.s to government trust funds, such as social security, which hold about $45 billion in treasury obligations.

By exchanging P.C.s for these securities, which figure in the national debt and hence in the budget deficit, the latter can be lowered by the amount of the exchange. The bond market is not affected: all that has happened is that the trust funds now hold P.C.s in their portfolios, and a like amount in treasury debt is canceled.

Congress must approve P.C. sales, both in the open market and to the trust funds, but there is nothing to prevent the President from putting into the budget proposed P.C. sales to the funds and thus reducing the deficit, which in fiscal 1968 will exceed $10 billion. The Johnson Administration is currently selling $1.1 billion in P.C.s, $600 million to "the public" (mainly banks and large investors) and $500 million to the government trust funds. The latter "sale" may be a trial balloon for furthering substitution of P.C.s for treasury obligations. By judicious application of the P.C. technique the President may be able to dodge an otherwise unavoidable tax hike.

From the standpoint of fiscal responsibility all such maneuvers are to be discouraged, and the more so when the cause of the deficit is the Vietnamese War. The Johnson Administration has succeeded in hiding the true monetary cost of the war from the public by various evasions. The 90th Congress should be on the lookout for this latest artistry in fiscal image improvement. When the Participation Sales Act was rushed through Congress at the President's insistence, we tagged it as a "nifty gimmick" and said of it: "the deficit will appear to be reduced, private investors will be cut in on a nice security market, and an additional burden will be placed on the taxpayer for the sake of improving the President's 'image'" ("Another Johnson Gimmick," The Nation, May 23, 1966). The latest developments amply confirm this judgment.

The Nation Will Miss

Irita Van Doren was an essentially simple woman who loved good books. She became quite naturally a halcyon editor. She had a quick brown eye and she smiled often, delightfully. She sat at her desk, quietly and thoughtfully editing book reviews, during tumultuous decades. For thirty-seven years, from 1926 to 1963, she was editor of "Books," the New York Herald Tribune's weekly review which, for those years, was the most interesting and influential of the newspaper literary supplements. Irita Van Doren went to the Herald Tribune from The Nation. She joined the editorial staff here in 1919 and became literary editor in 1923. She had a sense of newness in life which she imparted to "Books," issue by issue, and her forte was friendship. As editor and friend, her influence on American writing and American writers, particularly in the late 1920s and 1930s, was substantial.

From January, 1930, to July, 1955, Gladys Whiteside was copy editor of The Nation. Copy editors are seldom well known to contributors or readers but are often legendary figures to the staff. Mrs. Whiteside's name will evoke a flood of recollections and stories from all those who knew her during the many years she subjected Nation prose to her severe Wellesley standards. She was a nonsense copy editor who admired clarity and precision and detested frills. From the cubbyhole of an office that she occupied for many years she exuded a frosty austerity that seemed to say, "Don't bother me with any of your silly questions." But she was for all that a thoughtful, kindly person and a fine working colleague. Like many persons who have served on the staff of The Nation, she was, by comparison with the paper's editorial position, a staunch conservative who regularly attended the meetings of the descendants of the original Newport patentees and consistently favored sending in the Fleet, if not the Marines, to cope with any untoward disturbances abroad. At the same time, she reveled in the fact that her association with The Nation was a source of deep concern to her upstate Republican relatives. She is remembered in this office with gratitude and affection.

RISE OF THE CIA

How Foggy Bottom Lost Its Spies

SMITH SIMPSON

Mr. Simpson has occupied many foreign posts for the U.S. State Department and has been active at home in labor affairs. He was associated with the development of the United Nations Charter, has served as Labor Attaché in Brussels, as First Secretary in Athens and Mexico City, as Deputy Principal Officer at the Consulate General in Bombay, and as Consul General in Mozambique. In 1958, Mr. Simpson became adviser on African affairs to the Department of Labor and was Director of the Office of Country Programs in that department. He returned to the State Department, resigned in 1962, but returned as a consultant in 1965.

The article here published will appear as a chapter in Mr. Simpson's Anatomy of the State Department, to be published by Houghton Mifflin in March.

The relations of the State Department with the Central Intelligence Agency are of the most critical sort. They influence the Department's effectiveness, our government's overall management of foreign affairs, and the moral and political principles which we claim to stand for at home and abroad. They are thus crucial to all phases of the leadership we try to exercise in world affairs.

Section 102 (d) of the National Security Act of 1947, which established the CIA, provides that the agency "correlate and evaluate intelligence relating to the national security, and provide for the appropriate dissemination of such intelligence within the Government, using where appropriate existing agencies and facilities." This is a clear statement—as long as one knows what "intelligence" is.

"Intelligence" is simply evaluated information. If we know that a man has landed on the coast of Cuba with a handful of guerrillas and begun hostile operations against the Cuban Government, we have information. Intelligence, on the other hand, tells us who he and his associates are, in terms of background, psychological make-up and political philosophy; what their objectives and chances of success are, and what the results of their success or failure may be.

The CIA is not alone in gathering information pertinent to national defense and converting it into intelligence. It was not intended by the National Security Act to monopolize these functions, nor has it attempted to do so. It specializes in collecting information by surreptitious means, acting as a clearinghouse for all intelligence, and assisting the other members of the intelligence community (primarily State, Defense, the Atomic Energy Commission and the FBI) with some of their special assignments.

Governments—our own included—have from time immemorial engaged in spying. Wherever we have been faced with a serious problem of gaining or preserving our independence we have resorted to espionage and much that goes with it, including the bribery of foreign officials. We have not liked it. It has always been repugnant to us. But we, like everyone else, have had to yield to the dictates of necessity.

It was our good fortune for many years to have little or no need of espionage in our overseas diplomacy. We used it against the Indians at home, for this was a matter of survival, but once our independence was assured we could give it up in overseas dealings, and it is to our credit that we did so. However, our moral compunctions made it hard even for seasoned diplomats to learn the facts about our changing position as we moved into international politics, and World War I found us at a considerable disadvantage.

A perfect illustration of our dilemma began to unfold in 1913 when Herbert O. Yardley joined the State Department as a young code clerk. Imaginative, questioning, ingenious, he began to suspect that the department's code system was unsafe against the intelligence activities of other governments. To test the soundness of his suspicions he applied himself to breaking all the department's codes without reference to any key. He succeeded. He could not get his point across to the diplomats, however, and, finally discouraged, approached the military intelligence division of the War Department with a proposal to develop a cryptographic unit for breaking codes and devising safe ones.

The War Department took Yardley on, and, while his discouragement by no means ended, he was eventually authorized to organize MI-8, the Intelligence Corps' first unit, to invent new military codes and crack those of other governments. The value of his work became apparent when Yardley deciphered a long message of the German Government offering a generous reward to Mexico for remaining neutral in World War I.

After the re-establishment of peace, the War Department and State arranged to support a group of skilled cryptographers with Yardley at its head. Although he knew not a word of the language, Yardley was able to crack the Japanese code during preparations for the 1922 Washington Disarmament Conference. The United States Government therefore knew precisely what the various fallback positions of the Japanese delegation were to be, and bargained accordingly. The diplomatic advantage of such feats was immeasurable, for we had little preparation to buttress our ambition to exercise some influence in postwar international affairs. By 1929, Yardley and the little group which he had trained had broken the codes of some twenty countries, including those of Britain, France, the Soviet Union and Japan. They thereby kept State posted on transactions and decisions of foreign governments as no diplomatic officers could possibly have done.

The climax to this revealing piece of history came in 1929, when Henry L. Stimson became Secretary of State. Stimson was a man seasoned in public and military affairs, but peacetime intelligence was something else. A few days after taking charge of State, he found on his desk several deciphered messages of a diplomatic mission in Washington. Demanding to know where and how such materials had originated, he was apprised of Yardley's operation. Stimson ordered immediate cessation of State's support. "Gentlemen," he as much as said, "do not read each other's mail."

The difficulty was, not everybody engaging in international affairs was a gentleman. There were those who did read others' mail and based their diplomatic moves accordingly. Naive though he was in this matter, Stimson had his way. With funds cut off, Yardley had to disband his staff. But before retiring to write a bitter, fascinating book on his disillusioning experience, he spoke his mind. In a final interview with a State Department official, he repeated that every one of the department's codes could be, and probably had been, broken by foreign governments, just as he had broken theirs. "Our codes," he said bluntly, "are just as cumbersome, just as antiquated as 16th-century communications."

The department's cabled messages to its posts abroad and theirs to it were as tight as sieves. The uneasy official asked what could be done. Yardley pointed out that machines on the market could be adapted to eliminate all possibilities of cracking. The ominous warning was as clear as a bell—and the solution too—but nothing was done about it.

The department—and the government—were to pay heavily. As World War II approached, our efforts to meet its challenges engaged us in all sorts of activity designed not only to assure supplies of strategic materials—rubber, tin, oil and the like—but to stockpile these against the possibility of war. When war came, we used our period of neutrality to sap the power of governments clearly hostile to us by bidding against them for these materials and wangling higher priority for our orders than we were entitled to. It was no time to be squeamish. We matched chicanery with chicanery. This was done through a specially created agency.

The greater such activities became, the greater became our need of information—a more systematic, thorough collection, a more rapid collection, a more accurate evaluation, a more effective distribution to all departments and agencies concerned with our growing effort of survival. The interest and initiative of State in all this were far below requirements, and it was from outside the diplomatic establishment that the urgency of the task was brought to the President's attention. Aware of the deficiencies of State and the military, and realizing the imperative need for a larger, more professional, less orthodox effort, a New York lawyer and Republican leader with military experience went to Washington in 1940 and laid the problem squarely before the White House. Col. William J. Donovan soon found himself on a rapid investigation trip to Europe at the end of which he was made head of an Office of the Coordinator of Information, directly responsible to the President. Later, when this organization was split into the Office of War Information and the Office of Strategic Services, Donovan, heading the latter, was still answerable only to the White House. State was by-passed.

At the same time that Donovan and Roosevelt discussed the critical need for more and prompter information, they reviewed another of Donovan's ideas—the combining of intelligence with support of resistance movements and (if we should become involved in war, as then seemed probable) the harassment of the enemy by guerrilla forces. When war came and the Office of Strategic Services crystallized out of the OCI, this dangerous, semi-military operation was rapidly set in motion.

We must pass over the colorful history of OSS but we should have clearly in mind what it was designed to do, for it led directly to the Central Intelligence Agency. It had five functions: (1) to gather information all over the world by any and all means, open and clandestine, including underground activities in harassment of the enemy; (2) to process all this information, turning it into intelligence; (3) to pass this intelligence on to interested components of the government; (4) to receive, process and distribute intelligence from other government agencies and from foreign governments; (5) to wound the enemy by all possible means short of conventional military operations.

Hastily improvised, the OSS made its share of mistakes. Considering the difficulties, however, Donovan and his associates did an extraordinary job. A factor essential for their success was their insistence upon the meticulous training of their operators. They were able to provide this training because of an arrangement with the military establishment. State could have done this, too, in order better to qualify its own people. But this never occurred to State. Nor has it occurred since.

Like the military, OSS was an action agency. The mass of information it assembled was designed to achieve specific results. Research and investigation were directly related to those results. In other words, the operators carried out what the researchers, strategists and tacticians had decided could and should be done, taking into account the known circumstances.

When World War II came to an end, the need for centralizing so fundamental an activity as intelligence was widely recognized, and a move was made to give the responsibility to State. The Bureau of the Budget so recommended and President Truman, in abolishing the OSS in the fall of 1945, transferred its saboteurs to the military establishment and its experienced intelligence analysts to the diplomatic, notifying the Secretary of State:

I particularly desire that you take the lead in developing a comprehensive and coordinated foreign intelligence program for all Federal agencies concerned with that type of activity. This should be done through the creation of an interdepartmental group, heading up under the State Department.

The President, like the Budget Bureau, overestimated the capacity of State. Had it been simply a matter of creating "an interdepartmental group," State might have muddled through. But the problem was more than organizational and certainly involved more than adding another interagency committee to the federal apparatus.

State went through the motions of carrying out the President's directive. A special assistant to the Secretary was appointed to deal with research and intelligence. An interdepartmental group was created, as directed. Space was found for some 1,600 persons, including a large number of former OSS staffers. Then the effort tapered off. State could not muster the imagination to use its new resources properly. It could not even provide a hospitable environment. Its diplomatic officers were not about to surrender their old status. They wanted their old center of power to continue in the geographic bureaus. The old fraternity sensibilities came into play. The old resistance to new ideas. The old smugness.

One by one OSS staff members dropped away. Dissatisfaction spread in the government's intelligence community. The President stepped in, reversed his earlier order and established an Intelligence Authority independent of State. The operating arm of this authority was a newly formed Central Intelligence Group which a year later became the Central Intelligence Agency, under a director subject to the supervision of the National Security Council. State's removal from the centralizing and coordinating role was thus effected.

So CIA at its birth was something more than a rival of State. It was more than another agency with an "itch to get into the act." It was an agency whose very existence attested to the incompetence of the diplomatic establishment.

CIA now got its own intelligence gatherers—i.e., spies—into each of our missions abroad. They worked independently of the rest of the mission staff. They reported to their headquarters in Washington in their own code, as a foreign government would do. They played their cards close to their vests. Their diplomatic colleagues in the missions to which they were attached rarely knew what information they were ferreting out. Even the ambassador seldom knew—he who was supposed to be in charge of and responsible for a mission's entire activities. CIA was in many ways a secret intelligence operation even with respect to its own government.

These factors introduced a serious psychological problem. They meant that every piece of information CIA got and State didn't was a reflection upon State, a reflection on the effectiveness of its diplomatic officers and their awareness of what was going on. It was a CIA "scoop" and it rankled. It made the diplomats want to downgrade or ignore some of CIA's more alarming news, particularly if it did not corroborate their own. This made difficult not only State-CIA relations but the whole process of putting information and intelligence to accurate and constructive use. The kind of tightly knit intelligence operation needed for our success just was not there. Nor is it today.

It would have done no good to have reminded State that the independence of CIA was due to its own failure. But it might have done some good if State had recognized that there was not only an organizational but a psychological problem in all this: since State had made life miserable for the intelligence officers inherited from OSS, the latter, when transferred to CIA and released from their humiliations in State, rejoiced in the opportunity of thumbing their noses at their erstwhile colleagues. For if State had only seen this aspect of the problem, it could have moved to train its officers to cope with it; once involved with training of that limited sort, it quite possibly might have gone on to deal with other factors, such as its own careless security arrangements, which also were properly viewed with concern by the CIA. But at no point did all this dawn on State.

We come now to a most sensitive item, one that accounts for great, and often serious confusion in our foreign affairs. The National Security Act, in addition to delegating the intelligence function to CIA, authorized it "to perform, for the benefit of the existing intelligence agencies, such additional services of common concern as the National Security Council determines can be most efficiently accomplished centrally." This, if language means anything, authorized CIA to engage in intelligence activities additional to those spelled out in the act—the additional activities to be for the benefit of "the existing intelligence agencies." But the act did not mean that, and wasn't intended to. What the language was intended to cover up was the kind of subversive activity, promotion of guerrilla warfare and the like, which OSS had engaged in and which the National Security Council might decide in a particular situation was necessary for the defense of our interests.

To conduct its "special operations," CIA set up a Plans Division and hired Allen Dulles, a former OSS operator, to be its first director. This was done under President Truman—an interesting point, as we shall see. With the imaginativeness and boldness demonstrated in their earlier OSS operations, Dulles and his associates were off to new ventures, and it became clear that some stronger control was needed than that supplied by the National Security Council, whose members met infrequently and hurriedly and dispersed to pressing duties in their respective departments. A "Special Group" evolved, consisting of the Director of the CIA, the Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs and representatives of the military establishment. The group came late on the scene. It grew out of an OCB (Operations Coordinating Board) "luncheon group," which itself came some time after CIA had got a head start on its secret operations, and thus it inherited a somewhat casual character.

Meeting about once a week, the group carries on its discussions informally, a fact which is an asset to CIA's secrecy, since it enables the agency not only to control the agenda but also to steer discussion away from matters it prefers the others not to know about. And since CIA's representative presides over the group, it can seize the initiative at the outset of a meeting and consume the entire session with a prickly question unrelated to more dubious activities. Moreover, the CIA representative is a Presidential appointee. The State Department member has found it hard to probe deeply, much less to steer or contest, the work of a Presidential appointee directing an autonomous agency. He just doesn't have that status. Moreover (and here we touch a vital point), he is generally a rotated officer. He cannot match the inside knowledge, the political prestige and the weight of continuous experience which the CIA director can muster. Because of the failure of State to dominate the group, the theory that the latter should inform all interested establishments of what CIA is doing, and that all CIA activities should be carried on within the framework of foreign policies set by State, does not work out in practice. State is kept in the dark about many CIA operations abroad and especially about those which run counter to the department's policies.

Somewhere along the line, State should have seen the handwriting on the wall, so visible to others, and moved to train its own officers to lead and control in this area. It should have strengthened the Operations Coordinating Board, which held some promise of developing federal plans and disciplines. But in its fluctuating, fragmentary way, with personnel in today and gone tomorrow, it only grumbled about CIA. Its rotating officers never took time to ask themselves what the agency operations portended for State and the government; never studied the functions and training methods of the agency; never sought to bring the training of its own officers up to a level competitive with CIA, so as to reduce the need of the agency's unorthodox activities; never asked itself what the significance of the OCB was in this connection.

Living with CIA has thus become more and more difficult. The agency supported Indonesian rebels against Sukarno while State was trying to work with Sukarno. It supplied and emboldened the anti-Communist Chinese guerrillas in Burma over the protests of the Burmese Government and the repeated protestations of the State Department in Washington and our ambassador in Burma that we were doing no such thing. In Vietnam, too, CIA and State have worked at cross-purposes.

But the agency has not confined its activities to unstable countries. It has meddled elsewhere, to the consternation of the State Department and friendly governments. In the mid-1950s, its agents intruded awkwardly in Costa Rica, the most stable and democratic country in Latin America. While the agency was trying to oust José Figueres, the moderate Socialist who became the Costa Rican President in a fair election in 1953, the State Department was working with him, and our ambassador was urging President Eisenhower to invite him to the United States to enhance his prestige. So it went the world around.

It was the CIA that negotiated with the Guatemalan Government for the right and facilities to train Cuban refugees to invade their country. It paid the refugees, trained them, arranged for their transportation to the Bay of Pigs, where they sought to overthrow the Castro regime by force of arms supplied by CIA. It was the CIA, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff, which assured two Presidents that the venture was feasible. The State Department hardly knew what was going on. It could not seriously analyze or contest the project.

As part of its "special operations," CIA has done everything from peaceful frustration of Communists to peaceful frustration of the State Department; from deciding whom we would back among various possibilities in a given country to undercutting people the State Department backs, and on to fomenting and conducting undeclared wars. Little by little it has moved into an area of decision and action reserved by the Constitution for the President alone, spreading contradictions and confusion in our foreign policies along the way.

It has been enough to awe ex-President Truman, who soon began to have the gravest misgivings about the agency he had created. He wrote in a syndicated newspaper article in late 1953:

With all the nonsense put out by Communist propaganda . . . in their name-calling assault on the West, the last thing we needed was for the CIA to be seized upon as something akin to a subverting influence in the affairs of other people. . . .

There are now some searching questions that need to be answered. I . . . would like to see the CIA restored to its original assignment as the intelligence arm of the President, and whatever else it can properly perform in that special field—and that its operational duties be terminated or properly used elsewhere.

We have grown up as a nation, respected for our free institutions and for our ability to maintain a free and open society. There is something about the way the CIA has been functioning that is casting a shadow over our historic position and I feel that we need to correct it.

It may be that Mr. Truman as President was not fully aware, when he signed the order establishing the CIA, that he was subscribing to language which carried CIA beyond the intelligence area. He may not have been aware that a Plans Division, to conduct CIA's special operations, was established in 1951 under his Presidency. He may not have known that Allen Dulles came to Washington to be the first director of that division during his own occupancy of the White House. Presidents are busy officials. They cannot keep up with everything. They must go ■ good deal on what their associates tell, or don't tell, them. But by the close of 1953, Mr. Truman was alarmed by the magnitude of CIA operations and by the basic issues these operations were presenting not only to our federal government and to friendly foreign governments but to the form of our society. This was also enough to worry the State Department and many ■ thoughtful citizen.

"Today," Allen Dulles has observed, "the Soviet State Security Service (KOB) is the eyes and ears of the Soviet state abroad, as well as at home. It is a multi-purpose, clandestine arm of power that can in the last analysis carry out almost any act that the Soviet leadership assigns to it. It is more than a secret police organization, more than an intelligence and counter-intelligence organization. It is an instrument for subversion, manipulation and violence, for secret intervention in the affairs of other countries. It is an aggressive arm of Soviet ambitions in the cold war." The CIA may not be a secret police organization but in every other respect it meets Mr. Dulles' description of the KOB. Through its independent agents, who are on the staffs of every one of our diplomatic missions and who report and act secretly, without informing the rest of the mission, including the ambassador, it provides our government with eyes and ears abroad. It is also an arm of our government, a multi-purpose, clandestine arm of power. It is more than an intelligence organization. It is an instrument for secret intervention in the affairs of other countries, even to the point of waging undeclared war. It can be an aggressive arm. It is an untamed arm. Not only does it challenge the political principles and philosophy on which our government was founded: it challenges the clear language of the Constitution itself.

It has been pointed out that the State Department works very much on its own, regardless of who is Secretary of State or President. The CIA is also on its own, only very much more so. While State has secrets, it nevertheless operates as an open rather than a clandestine organization. It is not required, as are other departments and agencies of the government, to submit an annual report to Congress, but it must submit annually a request for appropriations and answer questions about its request in public sessions of Congressional subcommittees. Its representatives must testify frequently before a variety of Congressional committees, hold press conferences, make speeches explaining what the department is doing, and generally preserve an open, aboveboard operation.

None of this is true of CIA. Its budget is buried in the Defense Department budget. No one save a few CIA officials and the Comptroller of the Pentagon knows where it is hidden and how much it amounts to. No one even knows how large a staff CIA has. No one knows CIA's methods of personnel operations, so that, as Congressmen have often observed, no one really knows "whether we have a fine intelligence service or a very poor one." And Sen. Mike Mansfield (D., Mont.) has commented: "Secrecy beclouds everything about the CIA—its cost, its efficiency, its successes and its failures." CIA has so far evaded any close checking by Congress. The Armed Services and Appropriations Committees of both houses do have subcommittees on the CIA but, like the Executive "watchdog" apparatus, they never get below the surface of CIA affairs.

In this crucial area, the State Department cannot meet the situation with its present attitudes of mind, its present operating procedures, and its present inadequate training of officers. Its deficiencies oblige State to deal with CIA as though it were a foreign government, able to extract from it only as much information concerning its activities and only as much compliance with our general policy lines as CIA is willing, gratuitously, to grant—and it is not willing to grant enough. This is an impossible situation. But it will not be rectified until State places itself in a position to operate effectively and command respect because of its greater competence.

AMERICAN CATHOLICISM

THE WIND FROM ROME

GARY MacEOIN

Mr. MacEoin is both a lawyer and a foreign correspondent. He is the author of What Happened at Rome? (Holt), New Challenges to American Catholics (Kenedy) and Colombia and Venezuela (Life World Library).

Most American Protestants do not think that the second Vatican Council has brought any significant change in Catholic attitudes toward them. "No noticeable gain in friendliness," say 54 per cent of respondents to a recent survey by the Christian Herald, largest interdenominational Protestant magazine; and Herald readers would be more likely than the average Protestant to find themselves in ecumenical contexts.

To conclude that nothing has changed would be wrong. My long-time friend, Paul Blanshard, whose vitriolic attacks on the Catholic Church caused the New York City Board of School Superintendents to exclude The Nation from public school libraries in 1948, a ban rescinded only in 1963, now writes for the Catholic World. The Church has produced in the United States during the Council years "a vital Catholic liberalism," he says. "It is clear that Catholicism is no longer intellectually monolithic."

Not everyone would concede that Catholicism was intellectually monolithic before the Council, but it unquestionably created that impression. There is, moreover, a good reason why few Protestants (or others, with or without a capital C) are conscious of a change. The impact so far has been mainly internal. Initiative has come from the ranks rather than the leaders, and juridic institutional forms have scarce begun to reflect the profound evolution of attitudes and practices in the past five years. But change is surfacing rapidly. The space given to Catholic "novelties" by Life, Look, Saturday Evening Post and the rest of the mass media demonstrates that fact.

The climate was long sociologically ripe for a move. Emotionally adult Catholics resented the paternalism of bishops and pastors. Economically independent Catholics were revolted equally by the efforts to maintain a separate subculture on the one hand, and to prove super-patriotism and jingoistic Americanism on the other. Intellectuals rejected theological simplism and obscurantism. It was the Council, however, which precipitated and facilitated the catalysis.

A basic postulate of American life is that leaders do not lead, with rare exceptions like Lincoln and Kennedy (and see what happened to them). They seek a consensus. They follow public opinion. That has certainly been true of the country's 250 Catholic bishops at this juncture. They approached the Council in October, 1962, without a program for updating the Church. As Xavier Rynne pointed out in his first reports from Rome, their education had made most of them creatures of the Roman Curia, had conditioned them to approve uncritically its myopic proposals. They had no suspicion that significant change was just over the horizon. That vision came from Europe (Suenens, Alfrink, for example), from Africa (Rugambwa, Blomjous), from Asia (Maximos IV Saigh, Hakim), from Latin America (Helder Camara, Méndez Arceo).

A relatively small number of North Americans were willing to identify with progress, men like Meyer, Ritter, Hallinan, Primeau and Wright. Some were eclectics, the outstanding example being Cardinal Cushing of Boston, whose pastoral letter of April, 1963, on public opinion in the Church is revolutionary by contrast with the me-tooisms and platitudes of his colleagues. A few were reactionaries like McIntyre or obscurantists like Spellman. But most simply fence-straddled, abdicating their leadership. They still maintain that stance, because there is no consensus today among American Catholics on issues on which the bishops should give them moral leadership, like integrated housing and the napalming of Vietnam.

The leadership has been and is elsewhere. Without discounting the important preparatory work performed in the pre-conciliar darkness by the courageous editors of Commonweal, America, Sign, Jubilee and Ave Maria, I think the first generals to catch the imagination of the intellectuals and form determined currents of opinion were some young and not so young theologians: Courtney Murray, Gustave Weigel, Bernard Cooke, Gerard Sloyan, Godfrey Diekmann, John L. McKenzie, ably abetted by Gregory Baum from Toronto and such visiting European giants as Hans Küng and Barnard Häring. The quarterly Cross Currents played a valuable role by making the European thinking which dominated the Council available to the intellectuals. It helped to rally to the standards of the theologians I have just mentioned many of the younger clergy, a majority of seminarians, and what I suspect is still a rather small, though vocal and vitally important, minority of the more than 180,000 nuns who form the biggest and in many ways the most critical element in the Catholic Church as an institution in the United States. John Cogley, Michael Novak, Dan Callaghan and other lay intellectuals became involved, though the number was never as big as the noise sometimes suggested.

The most obvious change, a previously unknown freedom of expression, is also a crucial one. This is something that the entire American public can see because today Catholics are shooting off their mouths not only in their own theological and intellectual publications, not only in the popular Catholic press, but in other denominational magazines like the Christian Century and Christian Herald, and in the national media, both specialized and mass.

The discussion ranges and rages over practically the entire spectrum of previous taboos. I can think of only one significant exception. There is still (apart from gentle wrist-slapping by Commonweal and the National Catholic Reporter) practically no objective evaluation of the actions of the Pope, little attempt to assess his views on aggiornamento. Although this is an issue of urgent ecumenical importance, the cult of personality is still so strong that Catholic public opinion resents any discussion, condemns even generic references as unacceptable impertinence.

But just about everything else is wheeled to the dissecting table; birth control, celibacy of the clergy, the machinations of the Curia (including the role of the Apostolic delegate in Washington), Church finances, Church-controlled education. And this injection of public opinion into the total life of the Church has produced irreversible changes. The birth-control debate, for example, regardless of what the outcome may be, has brought a re-evaluation of methods and assumptions in a score of areas, a fruitful questioning of the function of religion, the service its institutionalized forms should perform both for members and for society in general, its pertinence to contemporary society. Specialists in many ecclesiastical sciences have received new insights through being forced to recognize finally that the issue of birth control was not an artificial creation of enemies of the Catholic Church, as some simplistically believed, but a vital concern of the body of the faithful. Areas affected include the meaning and scope of papal infallibility, the development of doctrine, the understanding of marriage, of sex, and of the dignity of the human person.

Commonweal, established in 1924, had preceded the Council in a cautious opening up of issues scarcely whispered elsewhere. A weekly magazine of opinion, owned and operated by Catholic laymen, it then provided a safety valve for the liberal intellectuals to whom it spoke by circumspect, middle-of-the-road demurrers against a conservatism which arrogated to itself, and was generally accorded, the exclusive title to orthodoxy. It is far from my intention to criticize what Commonweal did. Survival in that climate required tact as well as courage, and Commonweal excelled in both qualities.

In the late 1950s, the Jesuit-owned America threatened to undercut it by appropriating its formula and applying it with vastly superior capital and manpower. More recently, however, America has backed off, today is floundering in attempts by a conservative editor to apply a liberal formula under the scrutiny of an institution dominated by reaction.

The monthly Ramparts, lay-owned and edited, started in 1962 with the avowed aim of putting everything under its microscope. Its vivisections have exposed some conditions requiring urgent surgery, but its efforts at creating new forms of life have generally ended as abortions or thalidomide births. Not so the weekly National Catholic Reporter (NCR), also independently owned and lay-edited, established in October, 1964, and reaching a popular public in popular language.

Superbly professional in its techniques, NCR has been daring without alienating any broad segment of Catholic public opinion. It broke the story that Apostolic Delegate Vagnozzi had informed the American bishops that "the Holy See" did not want them to implement the Council decree on ecumenism until Rome first spelled out the ground rules. Time, Newsweek, The New York Times and others took up the story, were unable to find in Rome any order to justify Vagnozzi's claim, left the public with the conviction that Vagnozzi and his reactionary friends in the Curia were the Holy See he had been brandishing.

NCR was also first to air clerical celibacy in a substantial way. It features the views of the most advanced Catholic theologians on the morality of contraceptive techniques, ran a series on intrauterine devices which drew many requests for reprints. A recent "scoop" was that Archbishop Karl Alter of Cincinnati, acting with Cardinal Antoniutti (head of the curial body which keeps nuns in their place), has cracked down on a group of nuns who work among the poor of the Appalachia for interpreting too literally the Vatican Council's call to nuns to get with the 20th century. They may not open new houses or accept members for a year, must be in bed by 10 P.M., must send no more members to study at a catechetical center run by Cardinal Suenens of Brussels.

Not a few bishops are outraged by the newsmen who observe the Vatican Council's admonition that their "special knowledge, competence or ability may sometimes oblige them to express their opinions on things which concern the good of the church." Bishop Bernard Topel of Spokane, Wash., has charged that some Catholic publications should not be found in Catholic homes; Archbishop Joseph Hurley of St. Augustine, Fla., that "a coterie of Catholic writers specialize in vilifying priests"; Cardinal Shehan of Baltimore, that almost wholesale negative criticism has been the stock in trade of some Catholic journalists; Archbishop John Krol of Philadelphia, that they are undermining the authority of the hierarchy.

Such bishops are fighting a lost battle. A recent poll of the editors of the 120 Catholic weeklies rated NCR second best (topped only by the St. Louis Review). As one editor said, "it is free of the institutionalism that plagues the Catholic press as a whole . . . uses its liberty constructively and aggressively." The existence of NCR, and the willingness of editors like Don Quinn of the St. Louis Review and John O'Connor of the Delmarva Dialog (Wilmington, Del.) to apply the same techniques make it progressively harder for bishops and religious superiors to get away with arbitrary abuses of authority. When, last April, the Philadelphia Catholic Standard and Times denounced as distorted the Philadelphia Bulletin story about criticisms of the seminary regime submitted to the archbishop by seminarians, without offering its readers the facts, O'Connor quickly remedied the deficiency in the Dialog. His authoritative summary of the document, in addition, vindicated the Bulletin.

Some of the mass monthlies, also institutionally owned, have moved vigorously into the Council spirit, led by Ave Maria, Sign, U.S. Catholic and Extension. The sixty-year-old Extension is remarkable. Formerly, it sold 400,000 copies monthly on the basis of a plaster-saint-with-electric-eyes piety, supported by advertising of remedies for baldness. Today it applies the same virtuosity and sophisticated techniques to moving its mass readership into the new swing. A few diocesan publications, led by the Brooklyn Tablet, as well as the lay-owned Wanderer (St. Paul, Minn.) and L. Brent Bozell's just started Triumph, fight a valiant rear-guard action for De Pauw and those who call themselves traditionalists. Many of the institutional monthlies and weeklies meanwhile continue to smoke their opium pipes and smother their readers in billowing clouds of non-thought.

If I have dealt at length on the press, it is because here one sees most clearly the ebb and flow of battle. Institutional changes are few and hesitant, though they must come. The National Conference of Bishops (NCWC) will soon be able to make decisions binding on its members. This will, of course, help; but it will not alter the fact that bishops are elderly men whose minds are set in rigid molds. The best intentioned find it hard to treat the faithful as adults. Their attempts to implement the Council are top-heavy with bureaucracy, new words to the old music.

Nevertheless, they are trying. Many bishops have organized the council of priests ordered by the Council to permit methodic exchange of information and discussion of problems. A few are bringing laymen cautiously into the consultative and even the decision-making processes. More of this will come, and it will among other things serve an ecumenical function by narrowing the gap between Catholic and Protestant forms of Church organization in the country. But it will come sporadically and with major local variations. This should rejoice rather than disturb Protestants, for it will be living evidence that this is no monolith. The very variety of institutionalism spells the death of one of the divisive factors.

Initiative for institutional change is coming and will come from below more than from above, another reflection of the new dispersal of authority. Typical is the creation in September, 1966, of the Institute for Freedom in the Church by a group of laymen, priests and nuns, as a nonofficial organization to deal with problems of personal freedom within the institutional structures of the Church. Its founders have drafted a program similar to that of the Civil Liberties Union in the civil area. They propose to examine claims of violations of freedom in the Church and use available means to determine the facts and achieve justice. Also like the ACLU, they plan to review existing structures and work to eliminate features not consonant with contemporary concepts of human dignity and freedom.

Individual witness has also become an important instrument of change. Participation by priests and nuns in civil rights protests has become commonplace overnight, often without the consent and sometimes against the expressed opposition of their superiors. Jesuit Daniel Berrigan's reputation has risen because of his superiors' ineffectual attempts to silence his pacifist preachings. Father DuBay is to many a hero for denouncing Cardinal McIntyre's ignoring of the moral challenge of Watts. Seminarians have widely taken the initiative, as in Philadelphia, in developing freer regimes, more contact with contemporary thought, more association with the people they are preparing to serve. Both they and the younger priests have a new concept of law as an aid to ordered living, not as the chain of a slave gang. They shed their clerical garb when it becomes an embarrassment or a hindrance. They participate in worship with other Christians, in experimental ways of celebrating the Eucharist, in dialogue sermons in Church, far beyond the changes authorized by the Roman authorities. "Canon law is dead," one highly respected theologian of my acquaintance assures his friends.

These new attitudes reflect important shifts in theological thinking. In place of ghettoism and legalism, we have a stress on charity, an affirmation of secular values, a recognition of the positive religious values found outside Catholicism, and specifically of the greater historical fidelity of Protestants than Catholics to important elements of Christ's teaching. In place of individualistic piety, we have greater emphasis on the notion of the people of God involved in a common effort that embraces their whole life, bringing an awareness of the importance of social action and of involvement.

Chicago had a recent example of the practical consequences. Cardinal Meyer and his predecessors had created a tradition of decentralization and personal responsibility, which Archbishop Cody set out on his appointment in 1965 to reverse. He quickly ran into 400 young priests organized into what Time called "the closest thing yet to a union of priests," soon decided that if you can't lick 'em you'd better join 'em, ended up by taking credit for the prompt implementation by the archdiocese of the Vatican Council call for a council of priests.

In spite of efforts to hold back aggiornamento of the nation's 180,000 nuns, they are being seen, and will be seen increasingly, where the problems are in our society. They are in civil rights, in poverty programs. They are leaving middle-class schools to man community facilities. They are working on staffs of neighborhood centers, serving on the boards of state and local human rights commissions, the Urban League, the NAACP. They are thinking less of the good of their own particular group, seeking ways to join other groups of nuns and lay people for more effective action. Chicago's Urban Apostolate of Sisters, started in 1961, has 800 nuns working in myriad activities, a center for teenage Spanish speakers, contacts with youth gangs. Some live in one of the apartments of the public-housing complex where they work. Others live in tenements, work in factories, carry union cards.

They have to pay the price of change. With some, the clash between ardent youth and stratified authority ends in separation. With others, the formalism of community life persuades them that they can achieve the goal to which they are dedicated by leaving the convent. Unaccustomed freedom causes others to jump over the traces. Recruits are fewer, in part because the medieval dress and manners suggest irrelevance to many, in part because the dedicated have the alternatives of the youth corps, the poverty corps, the papal volunteers for Latin America and a host of other service organizations.

One area which feels the pinch is Catholic education. But the decline in teaching nuns is only part of its problem. While the system is here to stay, it is both due to change and to become less important in relation to the entire educational system. Increasing costs, for example, are raising the percentage of Catholics in public schools, especially at the university level. The new recognition of the importance of social research and the approach to self-criticism of the Greely-Rossi report and the University of Notre Dame report are clearing the air of prejudices. While they take much steam out of criticisms of the system as religiously divisive and intellectually schizophrenic, they question the value received by the Church for the money. As Catholics de-escalate, they will become more conscious of the values of public education. The rest of the community will become more conscious of the Catholic contribution, look more assiduously for constitutional ways to ease the burden.

Many Catholics are asking out loud if academic freedom and Church control of universities are compatible. The issue has erupted most explosively in the still unresolved clash between St. John's University, Brooklyn, and a group of professors led by a priest, but it is bubbling on many other campuses. A practical solution is being tested in Canada, though the incentive has been primarily economic. To qualify for public funds, several Church-related universities have been transferred to a community board of management, setting up their schools of philosophy and theology as an affiliated college still Church-controlled. I anticipate similar experiments in the United States, both to qualify for public funds and to meet the academic freedom criticisms.

Another significant development is the growing Catholic involvement in the peace movement. The bishops are still back in the traditional pattern of proving their patriotism, which in that context means blind support of current Administration policy. Recognizing the clear absence of consensus, only fifteen have spoken, but all who spoke backed the Administration, Cardinal Spellman quoting with approval Stephen Decatur's blasphemous "my country right or wrong," and only one (Cardinal Shehan) dwelling on the danger of vitiating a moral purpose by the use of immoral means. A recent Gallup poll showed that the percentage of Catholics who approve the President's stand in Vietnam is significantly higher than that of Protestants or Jews. What I think is significant is that it is only 54 per cent. I suspect it would have been 90 or 95 per cent, that is, monolithic, if we hadn't had the Council. Perhaps even more important is the willingness of priests and nuns to be arrested, as in Selma, or spat on by fellow Catholics, as in Chicago. The public witness, the prophetic role of Christianity vis-à-vis society, was previously unknown in American Catholicism.

Both Catholics and others will, accordingly, have to stop asking what is the Catholic position on this, that or the other. I am confident that when the smoke clears away, there will still be clear Catholic positions on a number of basic matters; for example, on the proposition that it is every man's duty to love all other men and to help them according to their need and his means. But we no longer have and won't have reflex reactions on divorce laws, birth control measures, aid to education. We will have to think of Catholics, as we think of other Americans, as people—people with a set of beliefs and moral principles which influence their actions, but not a Pavlovianly conditioned herd responding undiscerningly to stimuli of which they are unconscious.

ANTI-MISSILES

NEW TWIST IN THE ARMS SPIRAL

GEORGE C. WILSON

Mr. Wilson is the Pentagon reporter for The Washington Post, and formerly a military writer for Aviation Week & Space Technology.

Lyndon Johnson, leader of the most powerful nation in the world, is up against the painful limits of his power as he faces one of the most consequential decisions of his Presidency—how to respond to Soviet and Chinese progress in weaponry.

The facts are plain enough. Russia is putting an anti-ballistic-missile (ABM) system in place to protect its cities and its citizens; the United States is not. Red China is bent on making nuclear weapons of world range; the United States has not decided what to do about it. The President can find no easy answer to these moves, and yet faces obvious political risks if he does nothing about them.

Russia, Pentagon experts insist, is deploying a sophisticated ABM system—not a few smoky missiles its technicians have built in the cellar to scare the West. Pentagon leaders credit the Soviet with a long-range anti-missile almost as good as our own and believe the ABM system is an "area" defense—not just protection for a few cities or military bases.

An area defense depends on missiles of 400-mile range or more which, like a boxer's left, fends off the enemy's punch before it gets near the vitals. The nuclear warhead of the defending missile incapacitates the enemy's incoming missiles. The name of the U.S. missile for this role is the Nike Zeus. The long reach of an ABM system is backed up by deployment of a close-in missile, designed to intercept any stray rockets which escaped the long-range network. The United States has the Sprint for close-in defense.

Both types of missiles are guided by a bewilderingly complex radar hooked into a versatile computer. The electronic systems both aim the defending missiles at the incoming ICBMs and distinguish between real live warheads and decoys. The United States believes it excels the Soviets in radar technology, but weapons experts hastily add that the Russian equipment appears good enough to do the job.

In two previous false starts, Russia appeared to be ringing the key cities of Moscow and Leningrad with Sprint-type ABMs. This did not especially worry U.S. policy makers because such a defense could not neutralize our nuclear deterrent. U.S. ICBMs, it was clear to Russia and the rest of the world, would still be able to destroy Soviet military bases and most of its society. But the area defense the Soviets have now embarked upon is something else again. If the Russians can protect their whole country from U.S. missiles, why should they not contemplate attacking first and relying on their anti-missiles to protect them from unacceptable retaliation? It does not follow necessarily that they would, but military planners work on the assumption that they might.

Defense Secretary Robert S. McNamara has a ready answer for this drastic prediction: keep the U.S. offense so far ahead of the Russian defense that it will remain perfectly clear to the Soviet leadership that a first strike would trigger an unbearable response.

McNamara's position involves constant improvement of the U.S. offensive missiles now standing in concrete silos and being pushed around the world under water by Polaris submarines. The Pentagon is spending millions to make it harder for an enemy to destroy U.S. missiles.

The Poseidon missile is the leading example. It will be carried in submarines now loaded with Polaris missiles. Being under water and on the move, the Poseidon cannot readily be destroyed by an enemy first strike. Also, the Poseidon's nuclear warhead would break up into several little ones when it reached the enemy's defense. This shotgun blast, the theory goes, could not be entirely stopped by any ABM system now within reach of the technology.

If President Johnson were to accept the argument that the best defense is a good offense, he could indeed save the nation billions of dollars. The cost of an ABM system for the United States is a minimum of $3 billion for a "thin defense" and $40 billion for a much better (though by no means perfect) one, including fallout shelters. But uncomfortable technical and political arguments are being raised against this option. Some of Secretary McNamara's own civilian weapons experts believe it would be dangerous to rely solely on the potential of retaliation; that the United States must follow Russia's lead and start putting a defense in place. The Joint Chiefs of Staff—although they would be expected to err on the side of too much offensive weaponry—also favor an ABM defense for the United States. And several Senators and Representatives of both parties are already demanding that President Johnson do as much to protect his people as Russian leaders are doing to protect theirs.

Congress, after listening to both McNamara and the Joint Chiefs, lined up on the side of the ABM. An overwhelming majority of the Congress voted $167.9 million more for the Nike X than the $446 million McNamara requested for this fiscal year (ending June 30). The extra money was to be used to gear up for actually producing the Nike X—the step prior to installing the system.

Conceivably, President Johnson could announce to the Congress this month that he has decided to go along and spend this extra money for Nike X. But that would not really settle the issue. The new Congress (now that McNamara has announced what the lawmakers were told in secret last year about Soviet ABM progress) will demand a commitment from the President on whether he intends to take the plunge and actually deploy Nike X. Many Republicans in Congress, fresh from their November victories, will exploit the political capital in the anti-missile gap, as the Democrats once did with the "missile gap."

While President Johnson and Secretary McNamara were able to put off the day of reckoning during this past Congressional session, by declaring there was still time to do more research on Nike X, the 1967 political climate here and abroad all but rules out another postponement. The go-or-no-go-decision moment is here. By committing himself to Nike X production and deployment in his January State of the Union Message, President Johnson could mute the cries of the hawks. But such a statement would also doom much of his domestic program, for the lawmakers would react by making budget cuts in the Great Society to compensate for the anti-missile defense.

Abroad, a statement by the country with the most missiles at its command that it was installing an anti-missile defense would prompt "how about us?" questions from our allies. For example, West Germany on the NATO front line is staring at 750 Soviet intermediate range ballistic missiles. West German leaders might be expected to demand some kind of Nike X umbrella.

The President could resist the military and political pressures and flatly state that the United States was going to sit out the anti-missile race. But the notion that Russia is building something the United States does not have is likely to eclipse any arguments the President could muster against going ahead with Nike X deployment.

These painful options underscore the desirability of making some kind of diplomatic breakthrough with the Russians on the arms race. But our intelligence information indicates the precious moment for such an agreement has passed. Russia appears to be committed to both an extensive ABM system and faster ICBM production. Not that the diplomatic route will not be tried. But even if this approach should show promise, how could either the United States or Russia draw China into an agreement? China is making fast progress on nuclear missiles; the Pentagon specialists who know most about nuclear weapons are the very ones who take that progress most seriously.

For example, Washington has evidence that in the last test, Mao's technicians definitely put an advanced type of warhead on a medium-range missile and fired it successfully at supersonic speed. Also, the warhead was made of enriched Uranium 235, the same tricky material the United States uses for its most sophisticated warheads. Such scientific prowess makes a big Chinese hydrogen bomb only a matter of time.

How many warheads and how many missiles for carrying them China has today is the subject of a wide range of guesses. The pattern of China's nuclear test program, however, shows it is not embarked on a deliberate, science-oriented weapons effort. Instead, Western arms specialists see the military running the program with the aim of getting nuclear weapons ready to use as quickly as possible.

China's neighbors are clearly aware of this. That is why India talks of building nuclear weapons of its own, even though its people do not have enough to eat; and Japan—the only nation to know the horror of being hit by an atomic bomb—considers the same course. How would India and Japan feel if the United States, thousands of miles away from either China or Russia, spent billions on an anti-missile defense while they stood naked to missile attack?

China's nuclear prowess also decreases what little chance there may be of reaching an accommodation with the Russians on the anti-missile. The Kremlin could well argue that it needed an ABM system for the threat at its back.

Secretary McNamara's timetable calls for Red China to have a medium-range ballistic missile as early as 1967, and an intercontinental ballistic missile as early as 1975. China's ICBM, McNamara believes, could be effectively stopped—at least the first ones developed before they carried sophisticated penetration aids—by a thin anti-missile defense. But since it takes about six years to install an anti-missile system, the time for doing this is growing short.

Besides the missile races now threatening the peace of the world, the nations involved still could resort to bombers if missile defenses appeared effective. A Nike X missile defense would not stop modern bombers, like the ones Russia has developed and China may develop eventually. Modern bombers fly under defending radar warning systems, zooming over the nap of the earth at speeds of 1,200 to 1,800 miles per hour. Pentagon strategists hold that it would be senseless to build a defense against missiles unless U.S. bomber defenses were upgraded at the same time.

With this latest twist in the arms spiral—missiles, anti-missiles, supersonic bombers—we have actually reached the point where a Secretary of Defense declares that a nuclear attack would kill 130 million Americans if there were no anti-missile defense or 60 million if there were one costing $30 to $40 billion. President Johnson's challenge, then, as he makes his Nike X decision is to find the road leading away from Armageddon. The world seems to have lost its way.

SHALE OIL: THE SLEEPING GIANT

ROSCOE FLEMING

Mr. Fleming is a columnist for the Denver Post and other publications.

Denver

Except for coal, America's greatest reserve source of energy lies like a sleeping giant in the oil shale of western Colorado, Utah and Wyoming. Here, in the bed of a fossil lake covering some 20,000 square miles, is enough energy to supply the nation for hundreds of years. It is estimated by the Geological Survey at 4,000 billion barrels of oil. (See Fleming, "Shale Oil: The Cartel's Ace in the Hole," The Nation, March 15, 1965.)

Most of the deposit is too lean for economic recovery by the standard method of mining the shale and then burning some of it to drive the oil out of the rest as vapor, which condenses into liquid. But the richest shales, even now competitive with petroleum, alone contain 80 billion barrels, enough to supply the nation for twenty years.

Development of the shale resource will increase as our liquid reserves dwindle. Hans H. Landsberg of Resources for the Future estimates that by 2000 A.D., only thirty-four years away, the nation will be consuming oil at three times the present rate, with allied nations using five times as much. We shall have consumed 250 billion barrels by then—if we can find and buy it—and he sees no way our known reserves can supply this, since the rosier estimate of the yield from known reserves is less than 100 billion barrels.

Luckily, most of the shale area is still in public hands. Private claimants got title to about 15 per cent in the 1920s, but in 1931 the shale lands were withdrawn from entry and the public retained much of the richer reserves. Overall, this is a treasure sufficient to pay off the national debt from royalties alone (at the usual one-eighth to the landowner), and Sen. Paul Douglas of Illinois has suggested that it be reserved by law for this purpose. Rep. Wayne Aspinall of Colorado, chairman of the powerful House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee, also favors leasing, not selling, the shale lands. He recently led a tour of the area by members and advisers of the Public Land Law Review Commission, charged by Congress with offering a unified public land policy by 1968.

Private claimants have filed many lawsuits seeking to acquire some of these lands. The public won a test case in Colorado. Claimants contended that agricultural entries under the Homestead Act—the historic 160-acre allotments—carried title to the underlying minerals, even though the law required the claimant to waive such title. The federal district court held in this case that shale under about 200,000 acres belongs to the government.

In another group of cases yet to be tried, claimants challenge the government's contention that denial of claims went for so many years unchallenged that the claims have lapsed for want of action. All such cases will probably reach the Supreme Court. Several thousand claims have also been filed for dawsonite, in the shale area. Dawsonite is a mixture of sodium and alumina, subject to claim under the mining laws. The implication is that miners might take out oil shale along with the dawsonite. But the Interior Department notes that a 1954 law vetoes this.

State officials naturally seek development. Colorado's legislature quietly exempted shale oil from the 5 per cent state severance tax on minerals; and exempted 27.5 per cent of shale-oil income from the state income tax. The latter provision parallels the traditional federal exemption on income from oil and gas, ostensibly to finance exploration for new resources. But it is anomalous here, since the oil shales are highly visible, ribboning 1,000-foot cliffs horizontally like the leaves of a book (hence the name "Book Cliffs").

Economists J. J. Ryan and John G. Welles of the University of Denver have made a study pointing to the imperative need for the state to prepare adequately for a "shale rush" larger than the historic gold rushes. They say that a shale industry producing 1 million barrels daily by traditional methods would provide 42,000 new jobs, bring 112,000 people into the area, create a yearly payroll from shale alone of $300 million, attract capital investment of $2 billion, and stimulate the purchase of $200 million of industrial supplies. They strongly advise federal and state cooperation to avoid the growth of a vast rural slum. So far the state has ignored their recommendations, although Gov. John A. Love (R.) is criticizing the federal government for what he calls procrastination and delay in throwing open the shale lands for private development.

Secretary of Interior Stewart Udall in 1962 named a six-person advisory board headed by Joseph L. Fisher of Resources for the Future. In 1964, this body recommended a unified policy of development, but split hopelessly over what such a policy should include. However, Dr. John Kenneth Galbraith, who was a board member, continues to insist that an economical and efficient method of getting out the oil must precede any major decisions upon policy.

The present extraction process actually began in an emergency project adopted during World War II, when Hitler's submarines were sinking our oil tankers. For many years it has been continued in a minimal way, ostensibly under direction of the Bureau of Mines, but with the actual work done by an industry group. Galbraith advocates appropriating much more money—"some tens of millions perhaps; the cost of an atomic weapon"—for a real attempt to find the best process. He also notes that surface development by burning would stain the nation's skies with shale smoke and that millions of tons of ashes would have to be piled somewhere, and he thinks the nation would balk at such destruction of nature.

Today there is increasing discussion of an exceedingly modern solution: to explode hydrogen bombs deep in or under the shale. The explosions would create huge cisterns of broken shale; the residual heat would gasify the oil, which could then be brought up through shafts drilled from the surface. It is estimated that this technique would cost less than methods presently used; it would sacrifice much oil, but no more than the present procedure, which uses half the oil to drive out the remainder.

The overall need, after an economic process has been found, is for a government policy that will insure the public a fair return on its own possessions.

SNAP JOBS AND CHEAP MONEY

URUGUAY'S DOUBLE INFLATION

RICHARD O'MARA

Mr. O'Mara writes regularly from Buenos Aires for The Christian Science Monitor and the Baltimore Sun.

Montevideo

The color and flamboyance of Uruguay's November 27 election faded quickly after the returns were counted and retired air force General Oscar Daniel Gestido was confirmed as the first man in fifteen years to occupy the Presidency as a single office. The inhabitants of this small River Plata country are satisfied that they have again proved themselves among the world's most adept practitioners of practical democracy. A sense of expectation has replaced the electoral enthusiasm, and Uruguayans look to next March, when Gestido takes office and his new reform program goes into effect.

The 1.2 million people who went to the polls that hot, bright Sunday took a big step. They threaded through a labyrinth of political programs and candidates, and elected to change from the Swiss-style governing council of nine men to one chief executive. (The collegiate government was resorted to in 1952 to mitigate the bitterness of political contests for the Presidency.) They also threw out the conservative Blanco (white) Party, which had been in control for eight years, and returned the more liberal Colorado (red) Party to power. The deeper, substantive change that now remains is to restore Uruguay from near-economic chaos and social unrest. This will be a formidable task, for it demands of the people harsh retrenchment and a virtual readjustment of moral attitude.

The Uruguayan writer, Mario Benedetti, in a fit of exasperation, once described his country as "the only office in the world to be accorded the status of a republic." It was a wry but apt description, for Uruguay is glutted with bureaucracy. Of the 2.5 million population, more than 200,000 are public employees; the ratio is approximately one in thirteen. More than three-fourths of the national budget is allocated to the salaries of these government workers, who with their families constitute more than 20 per cent of the population.

Uruguay's present economic situation is alarming. Its foreign debt is well over $500 million; its yearly income from exports is about $170 million. The country has lost the confidence of the international financial community, and in 1965 the Blanco government was forced to melt down large quantities of gold coins for deposit in United States banks as a guarantee on a renegotiation of debts. Payments due in 1966 and 1967 will require half the income from this year's exports.

Domestically, the budgetary deficit in 1965 was more than $40 million. The inflation has depressed the peso on the free market from eleven to the dollar in 1963 to today's eighty-one. Inflation in 1965 reached 80 per cent, and was above 31 per cent for the first nine months of 1966. The gross national product is dropping, and some 200,000 people are out of work.

But Uruguay suffers a more pernicious inflation than the deterioration of its money; it is the inflation of unproductive people. In this welfare state, only fourteen people out of a hundred work in any sort of productive industry, and most of these are in the rural areas. Adding to the economic drag of the bureaucratic army are some 300,000 persons on pension. The passive population—including children, nonworking women, pensioners, et al.—is around 35 per cent.

Uruguay is an example of what can happen to a country when an effective two-party system goes to seed. By tradition here, the Colorados govern and the Blancos provide opposition. The Colorados ruled for ninety-three years before being ousted in the 1958 elections. Unaccustomed to playing the foil to the administration, Colorado politicians in recent years found that individual collusion across party lines could be more rewarding in terms of personal gain than united opposition. Numerous inter-party deals were made, and before long the Uruguayan congress became ■ mass of factions. Laws were passed to provide outrageous privileges for politicians, and corruption spread to every branch of government and into the state industries. "Coima," the bribe, became a way of life.

The fragmentation of Uruguay's two traditional parties was never more evident than in the November elections. Both parties ran three Presidential candidates each, and the constitutional reform plan that gained the majority was drafted jointly by factions within the Blanco and Colorado Parties. It was opposed by many Colorados and Blancos, and by the Communists, who offered their own plan. In all, four plans for constitutional reform were offered to the voters, and ten Presidential candidates.

One of the more blatant abuses of power in recent years was the passage of a law which allowed legislators to import automobiles free of duty and tax—a profitable business in a country where import restrictions have driven the price of vehicles through the ceiling. Nor do the Solons of Uruguay's Legislative Palace scorn ostentation. One politician recently drove down Montevideo's 18th of July Avenue in ■ car equipped with a bar, refrigerator, television, hi-fi, phone and various other accouterments. Only four of Uruguay's thirty-one senators and ninety-nine deputies opposed the "auto law." Congress also passed a law allowing its members to borrow from government banks at 1 per cent interest. There are politicians in Uruguay who owe the government more than ■ million pesos.

The general attitude of permissiveness allowed smuggling to grow into the primary industry, thereby robbing the state of needed revenue. One disgusted Uruguayan complained not long ago: "We have imported enough Swiss watches to provide for twenty countries the size of our own. We imported insulin for 20 million diabetics. It is now in Argentina, Paraguay, Bolivia and Brazil, exported by contrabandists."

As corruption in government became chronic, politicians turned to patronage and demagoguery to hold on to their sinecures. The ranks of the bureaucrats swelled; the nation's wealth was squandered; prices started to climb. With the onset of rapid inflation, labor insisted upon massive pay raises to keep up with the cost of living, and the politicians were forced to grant the demands.

Except for Argentina, Uruguay has the most militant labor movement in Latin America. Former Interior Minister Adolfo Tejera said: "Syndical power is incommensurate with the reality of the country and is producing a deep fissure in the social fabric." There were more than 600 strikes in 1966. The country's financial machinery was crippled in October and November by a three-week strike of state bank employees. Strikes and sudden stoppages in critical industries are common: longshoremen, postal and power workers, transport, have all been out.

The Blanco government blamed labor intransigence on the Communists. The small, legal and bombastic Communist party (Frente Izquierdista de Liberación, FIDEL) does wield power in the labor movement, though not as much as many Blanco and Colorado leaders like to believe. The Communist party finished third in the November elections, slightly ahead of the diminutive Christian Democratic party, but well behind the Blancos and Colorados. It has only one seat in the senate and three in the chamber of deputies.

In Uruguay, blue-collar workers usually earn more than white-collar workers, which is not too surprising since most of the latter are unskilled government clerks. It probably should be that way, too, since the former are engaged in more productive labor than the bureaucrats. But in some areas labor costs have risen beyond reason.

It was against this dismal panorama that incumbent national governing council President Alberto Heber (Blanco) early in 1966 first seriously called into question the practicability of the collegiate government system. "This is a small country with a lot of problems," he said. "It is not necessary to have nine men instead of one President."

Gestido, who had recently resigned from the council, endorsed Heber's view: "The republic is facing a crisis situation, and we must have organs responsible and flexible enough for unity of action." Both men, of course, had Presidential ambitions.

Most experts concede that the overriding motive for making the changeover was to provide a political and administrative machinery capable of putting the country back into shape economically. It seems to some of them that the November election offered Uruguay a last chance to resolve its problems with order and liberty.

A military coup has been rumored now for more than a year. To most Uruguayans the idea is shocking: the country enjoys its reputation as a free, democratic state primarily because it is not afflicted with the militarism that plagues its neighbors. It has no conscription and only a small professional armed force.

Fear is also widespread that the hysterically anti-Communist military governments in Brazil and Argentina have already made secret plans to intervene in Uruguay if it reverts to chaos or allows an extreme leftist regime to take over. Not long ago, Marcha, Montevideo's influential leftist weekly, reminded Uruguayans that "independence for Uruguay was not a gift, and the principal enemy was not Spain."

This cryptic message was well understood here, for in a sense, Uruguay won its independence twice: first from Spain, and then from Argentina and Brazil. It wasn't until 1870—forty-two years after Uruguay proclaimed its independence from Spain—that it finally struggled free from the influence of its two largest neighbors and became sovereign in more than name only. It has followed since then an independent foreign policy, the pillar of which is nonintervention. But in the Eastern Republic, as Uruguay is often called, fear remains of the two giants that hem it in on three sides. And because Uruguay is a haven for political refugees from these countries, pressure from Brasilia and Buenos Aires is fairly constant.

Colorado President-elect Oscar Gestido has already distinguished himself as an effective administrator. In the 1950s he made far-reaching improvements in the sluggish national railroad system. He served usefully as chairman of the Welfare Commission during the floods of 1959. He was elected to join the Colorado minority in the governing council in 1962.

The new constitution under which he will govern gives him power to send "emergency laws" to congress; these, if not approved, automatically become law. He will have the right to dissolve congress if it obstructs his reforms, and call elections within ninety days. While congress is out he can rule by decree. His term of office is for five years, and he cannot succeed himself.

Gestido sums up his administrative and governing theory in three words: "reordering, recuperation and dynamism." Though he has never discussed details, sources close to him say that he intends to freeze wages, spur exports, and reduce imports to stem the flight of capital.

One problem which he indicates he intends to tackle is the growing imbalance between the rural and urban populations. In a way, this is basically what is wrong with Uruguay. Montevideo now contains more than a third of the nation's inhabitants. It was called by one scholar "the suction pump" whose "castles have been built and streets paved with the beef, wool and hides of the provinces." Funds from the export of these products finance the country's welfare and social services, and the benefits go mainly to the city dwellers.

Continued neglect of the farming industry has caused ranchers to stop expanding production, and the failure to extend social legislation equitably to the countryside has driven peons and workers into the city. The United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization estimates that Uruguay's farms and breeding ranches are producing only about one-third of their potential. The country has almost no other natural resources.

This diminution in production—therefore in national income—has seriously affected the social services themselves. Pensioners often get paid months late; some don't get paid at all, and salaries are often in arrears. Still, the rush to the cities continues. Uruguay, "the world's first welfare state," is caught in an uncontrolled race between prices and wages.

At this point, the only certainty about the future is that neither Gestido, nor any man alone, will be able to set Uruguay on its feet without widespread popular support. The new constitution gives him the power to buck the old-line political cliques, if he is willing to use it. But if he cannot make labor withhold its incessant demands, if he cannot curtail wholesale smuggling and bribery in government; if he cannot, in short, draw out of the people a new moral attitude, he will fail. And Uruguay will fail in its attempt to prove that truly representative democracy can be the alternative to militarism in Latin America.

But the Uruguayans are an intelligent people, and they demonstrated in the November elections that they understood the need for change—that, indeed, the fate of their country may depend on it. This understanding can be Gestido's greatest asset.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

That Old-Time Aggression

ON AGGRESSION. By Konrad Lorenz. Translated by Marjorie Kerr Wilson. Harcourt, Brace & World. 306 pp. $5.75.

THE TERRITORIAL IMPERATIVE: A Personal Inquiry into the Animal Origins of Property and Nations. By Robert Ardrey. Atheneum Publishers. 390 pp. $6.95.

JOHN PAUL SCOTT

Mr. Scott, research professor of psychology at Bowling Green (Ohio) University, is the author of Animal Behavior, Aggression, and with John L. Fuller Genetics and the Development of Social Behavior in the Dog (all University of Chicago Press).

The control of destructive violence between individuals and nations is one of the important practical problems of our times. Its consequences are so great that it deserves a major scientific effort directed toward its solution; and its causes are so many and so various that almost every discipline, from mathematics through physiology and biology, to the social sciences, have something to contribute. On Aggression is such a contribution by the distinguished European ethologist, Konrad Lorenz.

It is a beautifully written and translated book, and follows a line of argument which almost anyone can understand. Lorenz apparently began it in reaction against Freud's interpretation of aggression as an impulse of destruction directed toward others and oneself. He points out that fighting behavior in the animal kingdom had evolved in many different ways and usually serves some useful function, such as the dispersal of animals throughout their living space, and the division of land into breeding territories for adequate food for the young. And he describes human aggressive impulses as probably having had some such constructive function in primitive man. Aggression is therefore not necessarily an evil, but is evil because it has been distorted from its original function.

Though no modern student of the evolution of animal behavior would quarrel with this viewpoint, the book is disappointing nevertheless, both from a scientific and a practical point of view. Lorenz explains aggressive behavior on the basis of instinct, an idea which was popular around the turn of the century, and his solution for the problem, sublimation, was presented with equal eloquence and greater practicality by William James in his essay on "The Moral Equivalent of War" in 1910.

To understand why a modern biologist would publish a book which leaves out of consideration most of the scientific discoveries of the past fifty years requires some knowledge of Lorenz. He is a very intelligent person who picks up ideas quickly and who has a great deal of verbal and written fluency. He also has the ability to make friends quickly and to communicate a sense of excitement, and by these personal qualities he has been able to inspire a great many people to enter the field of animal behavior. He is also kindly and humanitarian, and this comes through in both his personal contacts and his writing.

But he is a very narrow specialist, who primarily knows the behavior of birds, and particularly that of ducks and geese, on which his book has an excellent chapter. He evidently reads very little other than material which is directly related to his own specialty. Consequently, when he began observing the behavior of birds from the viewpoint of native behavior, or instinct, he went back to the writings of other students of bird life, Wallace Craig and Whitman, for his theoretical concepts. Lorenz quotes articles published in 1918, before modern geneticists had begun to work out the consequences of the facts of Mendelian genetics in relation to evolution, and before publication of much of the modern work on the physiology of the emotions and appetites. These ideas of instinct are thus pre-Mendelian and pre-physiological, and in this day such a classical theory of instinct forms a very incomplete and inadequate explanation of behavior.

One of the major points in Lorenz's theory is the spontaneity of aggression. But for a physiologist there must be a demonstration of chemical and physical changes within the body which would lead to such "spontaneous" aggressive behavior. A series of these changes are well known in the case of hunger. The situation with respect to the emotion of anger is quite different. Beginning with the studies of the American physiologist, Walter B. Cannon, whose book on "Bodily Changes in Pain, Hunger, Fear, and Rage" was published in 1929, it has been shown that the emotion of anger originates in one portion of the brain, the hypothalamus, and the stimulation of this area with electrodes in an animal will produce reactions very similar to anger. Without such stimulation the animal is quiet. Evidence obtained from the removal of parts of the brain indicates that certain other areas have a stimulating effect on anger, and that these are balanced by other portions which inhibit it. Stimulation from the outside, as the pain of a blow, will upset the balance and cause anger. Thus we have a mechanism which prolongs and magnifies the effects of external stimulation, but no mechanism for building up the first stimulation from within. There is no internal change corresponding to the change in blood sugar which results in hunger.

This may appear to be a fine technical point, but it has one important result. If Lorenz is right, then man cannot lead a happy, peaceful existence, but must continually be sublimating the spontaneous "drive" which accumulates within him. If the physiologists are correct, then it is theoretically possible for man to lead a happy and peaceful existence, provided he is not continually stimulated to violence. Sublimation will have its uses because in any practical situation there will always be some accidental stimulation toward violence, but it is only one of the many techniques provided by modern scientific knowledge for the control of aggression.

As for other major causes of aggression, such as heredity or training, Lorenz simply omits them. But we know that through appropriate training methods a mouse, for example, will attack females and even infant mice, something which mice normally never do. A male mouse, by other methods, can be trained to be completely peaceful. Lorenz has also missed one of the major recent findings of research on animal behavior (and this may be because of his lack of acquaintance with research done on mammals). Social organization is not something born into an animal but something which is developed; and if social organization is disturbed, harmless or even beneficial aggressive behavior can be transformed into destructive violence. The violent baboons in the London zoo studied by Zuckerman were a group of individuals strange to one another and hence a disorganized society. The undisturbed societies of baboons studied by Washburn and DeVore on the South African plains present an entirely different picture. Fighting is present but controlled by a dominance order, and chiefly directed against predators, and one sees the baboons risking their lives for the benefit of a group. Thus a baboon may develop destructive violence under conditions of social disorganization, whereas under conditions of social organization he may develop peaceful and cooperative behavior, direct fighting into useful channels, and may act in a manner which might well be described as altruistic. One wonders whether the same might not be said of man.

There is an element in human behavior, however, which goes beyond this simple formulation. Men have discovered that they can organize for the purpose of destruction and violence, and that such trained groups will overcome any individual or untrained group. This presents a problem which can be solved only on the level of human social organization.

In brief, fighting is a complex phenomenon, taking many forms, and is stimulated and controlled by many different factors. Any "single-factor" explanation, such as that of instinct, is necessarily incomplete. To give Lorenz proper credit, he would probably write a different book if he were to write it today, since in a more recent volume he has begun to incorporate the phenomenon of learning into his theories of the evolution of behavior.

The Territorial Imperative is a very different kind of book, although Konrad Lorenz is one of Ardrey's heroes. Briefly stated, Ardrey's thesis, carried over from his earlier book, African Genesis, is that human aggression has an even simpler basis than that postulated by Lorenz, namely "man's instinct for territoriality." This is presented so naively that even an unscientific reader is unlikely to take the book seriously, and Ardrey himself realizes that the evidence from field studies of primates goes against his ideas.

Ardrey's book also can be better understood in terms of the history of its author. Ardrey began his career as a dramatist, with little or no formal training in science. Territorial Imperative is better theatre than it is science reporting: full of entertainment and wild analogies.

In the early 1940s I published a scientific paper demonstrating that there were inherited differences between the fighting capacities of two pure strains of mice. Males of the gray strain were irritable and quick to start a fight, whereas those of the black strain were slow to start, but once the fighting began almost always won over the grays. After its publication,

I was interviewed by a newspaper reporter who wanted me to say that this situation was "just like ourselves and the Germans." It was some minutes before I could persuade him that the resemblance was purely superficial: that the differences between the behavior of Germans and ourselves was mostly due to culture rather than to any profound biological difference.

This level of science reporting is demonstrated in full strength in Ardrey's book. To him, a band of lemurs in Madagascar is just like a modern human nation.

Ardrey has read widely in the scientific literature on territoriality, but his ideas, if not as wildly unsophisticated as my reporter's, are equally uncritical. He has written these down as they came to him while reading, and the result is a sort of intellectual pizza pie, with tasty tidbits of information embedded in a mass of partially baked ideas. This is too bad, because a good popular account of territoriality could be written.

The popularization of scientific information in our society is a very important task, as the ultimate usefulness of science depends upon its getting into the minds of as many people as possible. But this must be done in both a readable and scientifically authentic way. The reader who wishes to know about territoriality may be attracted by the title of Ardrey's book, but what he will get is entertainment. For authentic information he will have to go to original sources.

The Ordinariness of Sodomy

ONE IN TWENTY: A Study of Homosexuality in Men and Women. By Bryan Magee. Stein & Day. 192 pp. $5.95.

THE BOYS OF BOISE. By John Gerassi. The Macmillan Company. 328 pp. $5.95.

JACK LEAVITT

Mr. Leavitt is a member of the bar in California and Illinois, and is a practicing attorney in the San Francisco Bay Area.

Homosexuality is a fact. So real is this condition that Jehovah denounced it as an abomination whose practitioners should "surely be put to death"; so real that an estimated 4 per cent to 16 per cent of our population is homosexual and, according to Dr. Alfred Kinsey, 37 per cent of the American male population has at least some overt homosexual experience to the point of orgasm between adolescence and old age; and so real that the designers of the newest transportation system in the United States, a multi-million-dollar project linking several counties in the San Francisco Bay area, have blueprinted stations without rest rooms to frustrate "undesirable elements."

Whether homosexuality can most accurately be described as a benefit, a disease or a crime, however, depends less on what we observe than on the way we interpret our knowledge. For Donald Webster Cory, an American homosexual:

... in my knowledge that our number is legion, I raise my head high and proclaim that we, the voiceless millions, are human beings, entitled to breathe the fresh air and enjoy, with all humanity, the pleasures of life and love on God's green earth.

For Peter Wildeblood, a British homosexual:

I am no more proud of my condition than I would be of having a glass-eye or a hare-lip. On the other hand, I am no more ashamed of it than I would be of being colour-blind or of writing with my left hand.

For the Oregon Supreme Court, some fifty years ago:

In the order of nature the nourishment of the human body is accomplished by the operation of the alimentary canal, beginning with the mouth and ending with the rectum. In this process food enters the first opening, the mouth, and residuum and waste are discharged through the nether opening of the rectum. The natural functions of the organs for the reproduction of the species are entirely different from those of the nutritive system. It is self-evident that the use of either opening of the alimentary canal for the purpose of sexual copulation is against the natural design of the human body. In other words, it is an offense against nature.

As competing philosophies, these different viewpoints operate on vastly unequal terms. When a state government insists that homosexual acts are evil, the ultimate leverage for its argument is the number of years for which it can imprison those individuals who actively disagree with its statutory notions. When homosexual practitioners urge clemency for their way of life, they do so as an afflicted minority, asking much and offering little. And yet, homosexuality flourishes—and the state survives.

Focusing on this subject, two recent authors—Bryan Magee and John Gerassi—have presented independent briefs for understanding and tolerance as they have tried to show the ordinariness of sodomy, an activity which historically was "not to be named among Christians." Magee is a British television performer who realized that his thirty-minute programs on male and female homosexuality were inadequate for the complexity of his findings; Gerassi is a former editor of Time magazine who found his medium equally deficient. By such deficiencies are cloth-bound authors born.

Both writers are compassionate, intelligent and perceptive, though their works have unequal merit. By far the more poised narrator and craftsman, Magee writes from the perspective of an individual who might be (but is not) a homosexual seeking meaning for himself. Gerassi writes as a reporter who observes and disapproves of a series of criminal trials that upset a middle-class community which prided itself on respectability. For Magee, the measure is the individual man or woman; for Gerassi, it is social justice.

Magee writes—and writes well—about the English and European experience with men and women who are, or have an ordinary chance to be, normal in every respect but a libidinous attraction to persons of their own sex. He relies intelligently on Dr. Kinsey's identification of a sexual continuum where (in Kinsey's words) "only the human mind invents categories and tries to force facts into separate pigeon holes."

In what might be his most effective point, Magee notes: "If we were relaxed and a hand in the dark caressed our sex organs our physical response would be automatic despite the fact that we had no way of knowing whether it was a man's hand or a woman's hand." While many of us would probably protect our genitals from all strangers (and many friends), once we yielded our assent to affectionate manipulation we would react in the same way to the person of our choice or to anyone else who secretly knew how to please us.

Gerassi writes—and writes with disorganized sincerity—about the attempt in Boise, Ida., during 1955-57 to "Crush the Monster" of "moral perversion" that had teen-age boys allegedly being seduced by adult males, and adult males unquestionably enjoying sexual relations with other adult males. Possibly inaugurated as a political attack on the city administration, the Boise prosecutions soon became a vengeful onslaught that ultimately "made a mockery of Idahoan justice and revealed that such an investigation, once unchained, could turn up homosexuals in every sector of the community."

(While Magee records that, "the very first homosexual couple I got to know met each other in church," Gerassi observes that, as a result of the scandal,

"you never saw so many men going out to the bars at night with their wives and girl friends.")

The authors concede that homosexual adults should be prohibited from molesting other individuals, particularly minors, but indicate that an adult male who entices a youthful male should be classified and dealt with like the adult male who entices a youthful female. Corruption of the young, while often fashionable, need not be made a constitutional prerogative, regardless of the sex or sexes involved.

What, then, shall we do about consenting adults of the same sex who, in private, make love to each other? Given an opportunity to establish rules of conduct, Magee would say, "I hold it as a principle of fundamental importance that people should not necessarily be prevented from doing things that I find disgusting." Gerassi would add: "Consenting adult homosexuals do no harm—why should so many of them be discriminated against?"

Studying Magee's credo, we can readily agree that his personal inclinations should not "necessarily" inspire a penal law. But when other considerations exist, we might not care to sponsor an activity just because Magee finds it "disgusting." As for Gerassi's premise that consenting adult homosexuals "do no harm," we ought to be shy of such self-contained reasoning. By arguing from a "harmless" assumption, he reaches the only conclusion he leaves available; dispute the assumption and the conclusion fails. For example, consent, standing alone, is not the key to harmlessness in legal contemplation. We have long-established laws against other consensual activities between men, like dueling, bookmaking and sales of narcotics.

We cannot say of a homosexual, as we can of a hunchback, that such an individual must not be punished because he has no personal guilt even though he might terrify children by his appearance. The hunchback's imperfections are hereditary, the result of a genetic cataclysm that stamped him in the womb. He never had a chance. But homosexuality is not hereditary. Except for an inconsequential number of cases, persons whose attitudes demonstrate that they are mislabeled "men" are not equipped with subcutaneous female organs, awaiting the surgeon's knife to bring them happiness. Instead, homosexuality is an outgrowth of environmental tensions, believed by many to be triggered by a defective relationship between a son and his father.

We would be foolish to claim that a homosexual "chose" his way of life because, as a child, he selected a socially objectionable behavior pattern with full knowledge of the consequences. Yet we

Huge in scope, urgent in its meaning,
this great novel has already been acclaimed as "the first big bestseller of 1967"

"FIVE SMOOTH STONES is a big, moving, blockbuster of a book with a hero born into a time when questions cannot be begged any longer...Technically, Mrs. Fairbairn is flawless...No matter how large her audience is, it won't be large enough."—Denver Post

Two large printings before publication
A Literary Guild Selection
$6.95, now at your bookstore

FREE! With every new subscription to THE NATION

RUSSIA AT WAR

by Alexander Werth. 1,100 pp. Avon Publications.

Paperback Edition, list price $1.65

A classic of war reporting by the distinguished European correspondent of The Nation which was on the bestseller list for weeks on first publication.

"... no nation in the history of battle ever suffered more than the Russians suffered in the course of the Second World War. At least 20 million lost their lives. ... A third of the nation's territory, including nearly two-thirds of its industrial base, was turned into a wasteland—a loss equivalent to the devastation of all this country east of Chicago. ..."

—President John F. Kennedy, June 10, 1963

"... an extraordinary book, one of the most important books yet written about World War II and certainly the most important yet written about the Russian-German War."

—Orville Prescott, New York Times

"There is no book in any language with which to compare Alexander Werth's monumental but exceedingly readable and controversial history of the Nazi-Soviet war, that four-year struggle in the East which, in the words of Churchill, 'tore the guts out of the German Army.'"

—Joseph Barnes, Life

"The best book we probably shall ever have in English on Russia at war."

—William L. Shirer

For your FREE copy of RUSSIA AT WAR, fill out the subscription coupon below and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of RUSSIA AT WAR.

☐ One year, $10 ☐ Two years, $18 ☐ 6 months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP No.

1-9-67

would be hard pressed to excuse him for his conduct (assuming our clemency is requested) on no other ground than his inability to control and overcome his youthful surroundings. Each of us, when confronted with a breach of legal duty, might shrug, "I can't help it. That's just the way I am."

To limit such claims of innocence or irresponsibility, the law makes distinctions between the sane and the insane. The distinctions are often absurd but in their ideal form would divide the perpetrators of criminal acts into two groups: those who had the ability to avoid the crime by making a little more effort, and those whose intellect and emotions were so defective they could not help themselves. Those who "voluntarily" committed crimes are punished; those who could do nothing else but act as they did are treated for their anti-social weaknesses.

Our well-intentioned citizens who hope to find some compromise solution for the homosexual problem often suggest that homosexuals, being sick, should routinely be treated instead of punished. In justifying this course, we show contempt for earlier societies that jeered at their lunatics and, instead, readily institutionalize and force cures on all sorts of people whose conduct we dislike, assuring them that medical and psychiatric help is nothing to be ashamed of. Unfortunately for these aspirations, some homosexuals are as content with their own lives as heterosexuals are with their affairs, a mutually smug arrangement which overlooks the fact that half the hospital beds in the United States are occupied by psychiatric patients.

In our search for answers, then, we must ultimately ask ourselves the irksome question: is homosexuality really a problem? If so, should it be considered as a never-ending emergency, or might it be dealt with by such mutual enlightenment as the Christian good fellowship which modified the historical exchange of massacres between Catholics and Protestants?

For those who believe that God's words must be obeyed literally, homosexuals are evil and should be destroyed. The only compromise to take place should be between the criminal's body and some avenging stones.

For those who accept the moral precepts of the Bible but shy at massacres, homosexuals must somehow be prevented from harming socially valuable institutions, like the family, by enjoying and advocating an evil course of conduct. The moment even one of us becomes degenerate, these logicians believe, all mankind will be in danger. By a categorical imperative, a Kantian infection, millions of honorable men, lured they know not how, will take to one another's mattresses and commit race suicide. Such a view, it seems, exists with greatest fury when men are wary of their own virtue. "Unless sodomists are punished for their lewd, contemptible, depraved, disgusting habits," they ask, "what will keep me from joining them?"

For those of us who doubt that our own ways are perfect, who fear that vice is less attractive than moralists advertise it to be, who resent electronically armed police agents at our keyholes, homosexuality between consenting adults is just something else that people do. Few of us would have spent yesterday exactly as we did spend it if we knew we were going to die today. If, on any eternal accounting, each of us is likely to be depressed that his life eroded away through perfectly virtuous stages, we can afford to let others blunder in whatever private fashion they choose. Their pleasures in no way corrupt us.

Regardless of which justification we use in choosing a social response to homosexual activity, our alternatives for everyday procedures are quite limited. We could execute some 10 million Americans, a prospect that might benefit no one but quarry workers. More reasonably, we either can confine all the practicing homosexuals we catch in a prison or hospital-prison where they will serve their time as homosexuals and, if released at all, will be released as homosexuals; or, we can declare that homosexual acts between consenting adults, in private, are the participants' concern and nobody else's business. In any case, we can be certain that our children will have homosexuals as their friends and neighbors. Our neighbors' children will face the same prospect.

Making the Violent Scene

A SIGN FOR CAIN. An Exploration of Human Violence. By Fredric Wertham, M.D. The Macmillan Co. 391 pp. $6.95.
THE BOSTON STRANGLER. By Gerold Frank. The New American Library. 364 pp. $5.95.

MARTIN LEBOWITZ

Mr. Lebowitz has contributed to The Journal of Philosophy, The Kenyon Review and other publications, and to two anthologies: The Critics' Notebook (University of Minnesota) and The Kenyon Critics (World).

For Fredric Wertham, this is "the age of violence." His interpretation of violence is socio-economic rather than Freudian; and he confidently anticipates the ultimate goal of nonviolence, although he is hardly explicit about the means of achieving it. While praising Thoreau, Gandhi and Martin Luther King, he observes: "Elevating nonviolence in our time to a universal principle may give the oppressor the assurance that he can practice violence with impunity. . . . Would it have helped the people in Auschwitz . . . if they had marched in peaceful demonstrations?" Wertham's familiar antagonists—the arsenal of contemporary violence—are all present: comic books, movies, television, literature, painting, journalism, advertising, alcohol, the toy industry, automobiles, fascism, colonialism, race prejudice and, to a degree, science and technology. He even permits himself a mild reference to "private enterprise," and he quotes Henry James on American business: "its boundless ferocity of battle." The American city is by far the most criminally violent community in the world, and growing worse; yet American society has outwardly appeared, until recently, to be the most benign. Are these two circumstances related?

Wertham quotes a text edited by a Harvard professor: "Necessary to the concept of self-actualization is . . . a certain promise of necessary violence, even of ferocity." I suspect that this statement must be understood in a context of sexuality, but it is high time that someone seriously inquired what constitutes self-actualization and why it appears so desirable. Clearly, from the standpoint of Wertham's sociology, it isn't. It is evident that self-actualization meant something to Aristotle and no doubt to Hegel that it no longer means to us, for their view of reality was profoundly teleological.

Wertham is convinced that there are no inborn traits of hostility, cruelty or aggression; they differ, in this sense, from sexuality. Rather, "we have to learn . . . that [violence] is linked by a thousand threads to the present fabric of our social and institutional life." He criticizes psychiatry itself for disseminating the ostensibly enlightened view that aggression is a necessary "outlet." No less a practitioner than the late Gregory Zilboorg is quoted to the effect that Hitler's Germany must be allowed to live out its malevolence. Soldiers fight, says Wertham, not because they have sadistic trends but because they are drafted. Concerning the re-education of the delinquent, Wertham notes: "The main problem here is that

The De-Romanization of the American Catholic Church

by Edward Wakin
Father Joseph F. Scheuer

This is the first book to pull together and interpret all the relevant data about the Roman Catholic Church in the U.S. Should you read it?

Yes! John T. Elson, religion editor of Time, calls it "bright, challenging": the authors' "definition of the American church today is an impressive blend of fact and aphorism, criticism and judgment."

No! The Brooklyn Tablet claims it is a literary gripe session: "If accusations, name-calling, labeling and clichés are all your run-down antipathies need, then this is the book to recharge them, and it's well written, too."

Yes! Pitirim A. Sorokin, Harvard sociologist, finds it "not only interesting but revealing . . . a scientific anatomy of the structure and dynamic life of this great church."

No! Rev. Andrew M. Greeley, sociologist and columnist, says "It would be easy to assume the authors are professional anti-Catholics. . . . Their book is disguised as a scholarly report."

Yes! Nicholas S. Timasheff, author of Sociological Theory, Its Nature and Growth, praises this "magnificent work which not only gives an excellent picture of the present day state of Catholicism in the U.S. but may also serve as a model of the application of sociological concepts."

Yes! Joseph H. Fichter, S.J., of Harvard, says the book is "cramped with facts, deals with every significant aspect of contemporary American Catholicism and is the best popular description available up to now."

Should you read The De-Romanization of the American Catholic Church? The Journal for the Scientific Study of Religion thinks so, and calls it "the intellectual progeny" of "Herberg's Catholic-Protestant-Jew."

published by The Macmillan Company
----- Order from -----

The Florham Park Press
200 Park Avenue $6.95
Suite 347 East postpaid
New York, N. Y. 10017

Enclosed is $6.95 for my copy of
The De-Romanization of the American Catholic Church.

Name _____
Address _____
Zip _____

in a violence-saturated society, it may be necessary also to re-educate the re-educators." He speaks at length of the high profits made by German industrialists on the slave labor obtained from concentration camps. Wertham is clearly of the opinion that most crimes are committed in the name of law and order; and he cogently quotes C. P. Snow to that effect.

But Wertham's main example of the violence of respectability is his chapter on the German "euthanasia" murders of nearly all the inmates of its mental institutions; it is estimated that half these victims could have recovered. For the murderers in this instance were not bureaucrats or highly appointed Nazis but the psychiatric profession, acting, by and large, on its own initiative. He points out that the idea did not originate with the Nazis but in a book published in Leipzig in 1920, written by Binding and Hoche, a jurist and a psychiatrist. Wertham also observes that a recent work called Euthanasia and Destruction of Life Devoid of Value, by a Marburg professor, is highly recommended in an American psychiatric journal.

Much or most of the violence Wertham discusses—particularly juvenile delinquency—is due, no doubt, to the "passivity" that society undertakes to induce in the individual—stringent patterns of experience, sociability and endeavor which intensify, distort or suppress the natural—and seminal—diversity of character. When Wertham speaks of "social conditions," "socioeconomic factors" and cultural history in relation to modern violence, he is writing in part of the mystique of the American frontier, but mostly of the "dynamics" of capitalism. The irony is that a sufficiently affluent society can approximate and at least make tangible to the imagination not only the Jeffersonian ideal of governmental nonviolence but also the ultimate ideal of Marx.

On the question of mental or legal competence in criminal cases, Wertham is strongly opposed to such innovations as the Durham rule advocated by Judge Bazelon, the irresistible-impulse doctrine, and the new law enacted in New York State in 1965, a revision of the original McNaughton rule. The McNaughton rule, pronounced in England in 1843, maintains that "to establish a defense on the ground of insanity, it must be . . . proved that . . . the party accused . . . (did not) know . . . the nature and quality of the act . . . (or) that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong." The Durham rule bases legal insanity on a demonstration, merely, that the crime was a product of mental disease. As Wertham says, it is a principle which, though not widely accepted, has been the subject of fruitful discussion and intelligent praise. Wertham also points out that a principle comparable to the Durham rule has been adopted in the Soviet Union.

But the trouble with the Durham rule, and perhaps ultimately with the McNaughton rule, though to a lesser degree, is that the tendency of reflection (or speculation) in this field is to establish and to identify the determinism, presumably pathological, of all violence. Wertham writes, for example, of violence as the "cancer of society." Indeed, speaking of enlightenment, if one accepts the hypothesis of psychic or behavioral determinism, as most psychologists do, it might well appear that, at least in some instances, crime resulting from "disease" (crimes of sadism, essentially) is especially flagrant and punishable.

But the legal and moral difficulty of defining a rational attitude toward crime is complicated by the practical question of what, if anything, constitutes a proper deterrent. Wertham notes that "in our society, as Warden Lewis E. Lawes of Sing Sing used to point out, capital punishment is applied mostly to the underprivileged and friendless. . . . If you abrogate capital punishment and do not change the conditions that lead to violence, it can always be reinstated. Ten American states have abolished capital punishment and reintroduced it. Chile gave it up and then introduced it again. Soviet Russia has prohibited it three times and restored it three times."

Our modern sense of reality as "dynamic" and "relativistic" is largely due, perhaps, to the emergence of politics in the 19th century as the paradigm of social and indeed of moral objectivity. Lenin wrote that law is politics, and Peirce, the father of pragmatism, said much the same of natural science: ". . . the opinion which is fated to be ultimately agreed to by all who investigate, is what we mean by the truth." Santayana noted years ago the relation between egoism and aggression, and schizophrenia is certainly, if anything, subjectivistic. It is not the exaggerated and excessively maligned nihilism or absence of values in modern life that accounts for violence but the seeming necessity of egoism or activism—the compulsive morality of systematic subjectivism implicit in the emotional and intellectual intensity of romanticism. And the confusion incident to this morality is also frequently responsible for violence. As in the case of Raskolnikov, it is a phenomenon which, even when "nonpolitical," is nonetheless a political parable or pantomime.

I have endeavored to indicate that A Sign for Cain is an exceptionally cultivated book, humane, sensitive, intelligent and remarkably well informed. It merits the attention of everyone. The Boston Strangler, however, is the sort of book one recommends with trepidation after reading Wertham. Indeed, Wertham might say that there are overtones of misogyny in Gerold Frank's choice of subject matter, which has in earlier books included a succession of prominent women, Zsa Zsa Gabor, Lillian Roth, Diana Barrymore, Sheila Graham. But the book is surely noteworthy. It has a novelistic quality—superior, in one sense, to that of detective fiction and journalism—to the extent that it generates an intensely physical and moral atmosphere: the tangible and precise details of suspense are translatable into moral anger and physical curiosity. A profound consciousness of pathology is created not only by the crimes and the extreme psychiatric preoccupation of the investigators (together with their occasional oddity and possible criminality) but also by the inevitable aberrance of the numerous suspects, the "medical" status of some of them, and the recurrent association of the victims themselves with nursing, institutions, mental and sexual abnormality, promiscuity, etc., along with the foreseeable variety of crackbrained confessions and efforts to help the police, one of which culminated in suicide. We experience, in short, the reality of a sick society.

And the story is amazing. It concerns the three-year hunt, commencing in 1962, for the "maniacal" murderer of thirteen women, the most intensive criminal investigation on record, and surely one of the most notorious criminals. Gerold Frank reports it as:

. . . the greatest manhunt in the history of modern crime, using every technique of detection, natural and supernatural: computers, clairvoyants, "sensitives," men and women claiming ESP powers, psychiatrists armed with hypnotic drugs, hallucinating agents, and truth serums, specialists in anthropology, graphology, forensic law. . . .

The search would involve the Attorney General of Massachusetts and the FBI . . . through it would run local political jealousies and national political hopes. It would set wives against husbands, neighbor against neighbor, translating the sexual frustrations of men and women into acts astonishing and bizarre . . . an entire city would be stripped bare.

Is the purported killer, Albert De Salvo, really psychotic? The crimes, if he committed them, were apparently due to his excessive sexual need and the hostility of his wife, who scorned and repuddled his advances, especially since the birth of a crippled daughter had made her fearful of further pregnancy.

Indeed, it is worse than ironic that De Salvo's crimes can be taken to express his flamboyant, rather than his maniacal, emotionality. The evidence that he is the Strangler exists in his confession—accurate enough to be corroborated by facts known to the police but withheld from the newspapers—but is legally invalid because of recent Supreme Court rulings. Thus, there is no way to dispose of him safely except to detain him for life in a mental hospital. Wertham doubtless wonders about a society whose guilt is such as to create an anomalous immunity for its criminals. Some years from now it might well appear anomalous that "society" was considered sacrosanct.

Letter from Prague

JOSE YGLESIAS

Mr. Yglesias recently spent three weeks in Prague.

Every writer you meet in Prague will tell you that at the 13th Party Congress held last year not one word was said about Socialist realism in its long statement on the development of Socialist culture. I obtained an English translation—or, rather, an English approximation—of all the resolutions of the congress, and did not find the phrase used once in the 23 pages devoted to culture. The congress was somewhat worried about "liberalism," but every attack on it is carefully balanced by as strong a criticism of sectarian and dogmatic views—to the point that it blames "liberalism" for the revival among some critics of "harmful conservative views." "It was those who had a direct share in the faults of the fifties," the resolution states candidly in its wayward English, "trying more than once later, following the 20th Congress of the CPSU, to prove that their reversal is permanent and convincing, who adopted in their argumentation the vocabulary of, and with it, the standpoint of bourgeois propaganda and of various doctrines fighting against socialism and communism."

For the party there is a fundamental conflict between democracy and liberalism. "Democratization, for which the party endeavors—in accordance with Leninist ideas—means to expand the organized participation of the many in power, and in management and administration," says the cultural resolution; "liberalism, on the contrary, means only equalization of conflicting views, regardless of their value, legalization of nonobligatory opinions and political irresponsibility."

Classical Marxist ideas in the field of culture are stated almost defensively. "It happened lately that certain individuals considered any mention of ideology or ethics to be an expression of dogmatism. . . . An evaluation of art from an ideological and ethical point of view . . . is inherent in art and turns up again in history with new forms. A world outlook or philosophical system has a basic inimitable importance for art. It determines the content and structure of artistic expression and thus also its aesthetic influence. Without a world outlook no work of art which is of service to life can be created."

Having done its duty to theory, the resolution goes on to considerations that account for the extraordinary amount of activity visible in Prague in the theatre, films, books, art galleries. It talks about the exploratory nature of art, the need to develop what it calls "aesthetic perceptibility" among the people, to encourage conditions favorable to artistic creations of "multiform variety of forms"; it asks the different artists' unions to insure "that artistic competition is really free"; and even asserts that "difficult, unusual, revealing works can achieve wide popularity"; though it adds "if they carry the answer to questions of great social significance . . . and are created in a way allowing them to become the property of broad society strata." And, given the new economic law to go into effect this month that attempts to put all enterprises on a self-sustaining basis, the resolution defends the allocations to education and culture as ones which "cannot simply be looked upon as unnecessary, unproductive expenditures."

All these are, of course, formal pronouncements, and I cannot say whether intellectuals pointed out the absence of the phrase "Socialist realism" because this would have special significance for me or because it did for them. Probably for both reasons. The Czechs, who are not given to tooting their own horn or to bursts of enthusiasm, also informed me that no other Socialist country had yet made a statement to compare with it; that is, one with so wide a latitude for artists.

If to Czechs the resolution means relaxation, to Western intellectuals the balanced statements will seem a hedge against experimentation. The only way to verify it, then, is to look at the activity going on in Prague. The art galleries show the work of abstract expressionists and figurative painters; even when naturalistic they are by no means the illustrated stories dear to Soviet art; I saw no Pop art, however, and Op seemed confined to two or three shopping bags; yet there were many Picasso-like ceramics in the crowded art shops. Of the dozens of plays being produced last November the repertory ran to classical plays (Lope de Vega, Shakespeare, Machiavelli), turn of the century (Gorki, Shaw, Turgenev, Strindberg, Ibsen), moderns of all types (Miller, Pirandello, Dürrenmatt, Albee, Giraudoux, Tennessee Williams, O'Neill, Schisgal, Ionesco); there were Viennese operettas, Cole Porter musicals, Agatha Christie mysteries, Lonsdale comedies and, of course, My Fair Lady.

In the windows of the bookstores—there seem to be as many as newsstands in New York—are Czech translations of Sarraute, Robbe-Grillet, de Beauvoir, Camus; and Czechs, in their diffident manner, modify their advice that their language is impenetrable with the recommendation that it is worth learning Czech for the interesting experimental verse be-

SCHOOL SEGREGATION ON OUR DOORSTEP

The Los Angeles Story

by JOHN AND LARÉE CAUGHEY

$1.95 paperback

Documented account of the five year drive to eliminate segregation in the Los Angeles schools. A case study of frustrations, delays, evasion. Factually compelling — lucidly written. Order your copy from your bookseller or

QUAIL BOOKS

3044 RIVERSIDE DR., LOS ANGELES 90039

Buy Your Books through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to:

THE NATION

Reader's Service Division

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

ing written by their young poets. A current, long-playing record of verses by four Czech poets, translated into Spanish and read by Cuban actors, shows that they are not startling in their idiom; but it is surprising that their work is contemporary—in the best sense—with our own poets. Czechs complain that the tourists are crowding them out of the Lanterna Magica theatre: ■ fascinating amalgam of film, music, mime and dance, which did not do well in New York three years ago, probably because it requires the kind of specialized small house cleverly designed for it in Prague. The Czechs are mad for jazz—one magazine is entirely devoted to it—and you can hear The New Thing on radio and records.

The amount of foreign literature translated in this country of only 14 million people is extraordinary: for last summer's P.E.N. International Congress, the Writers' Union published a 77-page book, listing translations of American writers since the end of the war. Despite some vagaries (due to the Stalin period and to the three-year period before the 1948 revolution canceled commercial houses) the list is admirably catholic. The various publishers now have a more orderly program for publication of foreign fiction, I was told; but when I looked into it, there seemed to be considerable scrambling by the different houses for favorite authors. Mlada Fronta, the publishing house of the youth organizations, published, for example, Carlos Fuentes' Death of Artemio Cruz; one of its editors informed me that they felt its experimental style should be of particular interest to young people. What about its purple passages? I asked. She laughed.

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 1-9-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

SPACES

1. *Quickening his step, my father
Came into the room.
"Now I will tell you about myself,"
He said.
When I write these words,
A torpor comes over me.
I can hardly hold the pen.*
2. *If you want to become a wall,
Work at it. More plaster, I mean,
And more paint.
Get the job done.*
3. *To be summoned like that Startles me.
I put on the light
At two AM
And stand
At the edge of a field.*
4. *Putting words
To these sounds,
You have your own Victory.
But to recognize it.*

HARVEY SHAPIRO

When I suggested that perhaps, like our editors, they too take the agents out to lunch to put in their bids (in Czechoslovakia one central agency, DILIA, handles all rights to foreign writers and the foreign rights of Czech writers), they insisted that the date of a letter asking for the translation rights settles any clashes among publishing houses.

At the State Publishing House, which is directly responsible to the Central Committee of the Communist Party, I said that I assumed their staff all belonged to the party, and was told by one of its top men that he believed that should be the case but that when an opening occurs they are quite willing to take, as the Russians used to say, a nonparty Bolshevik. I had also assumed that this house published only Marxist studies and political propaganda, but found that their 1966 booklist included John Galbraith, Sartre, Arthur Miller, Alan Sillitoe. "In his book, Sartre explains the Hungarian events of 1956 as ■ case of Soviet military intervention," said the editor, "and we are publishing that without comment."

In November, every bookstore was sure to carry Josef Skvorecky's The Cowards, ■ novel first published in 1958 and withdrawn the same year because of the many attacks it inspired from the party. The story of a town in northern Bohemia during the last days of the war, it was not kind to patriots who strutted when the town was liberated from tired and scared German troops, but who scurried for cover when an elite S.S. marched into Czechoslovakia for ■ last-ditch stand; it was the hooligan elements of the town who, ironically, fought the S.S. then. The novel outraged those still longing for Zhdanov's positive literature, and even army officers went on the air to denounce it. Today, Skvorecky, who is not ■ member of the party, has been apologized to by everyone, there is a large new printing of the book, and everybody is proud of the fact that in 1958 the publishing house for which he worked was courageous enough to keep him on its staff.

Having talked to young people at the Viola, a night club whose specialty is avant-garde poetry read aloud, and having heard in the course of their complaints that people got "into trouble" for their work or views, I decided to look into it. I asked about Jan Zabрана, a poet who is the translator of Allen Ginsberg, Corso, Ferlinghetti, as well as of Warren Miller's The Cool World. I had been told he had been in trouble about Ginsberg's stay in Prague in 1965. Ginsberg's diary was stolen, passages were quoted in the newspapers, and he was questioned by the police and asked to leave the country. I asked two Czech intellectuals whom I completely trusted just what being "in trouble" meant in Zabрана's case. They happened to be friends of Zabрана, and laughed at my notion that he might be under house arrest;

Zabrana was holed up in a new apartment with so much work that he was probably making more money than most Czech writers.

They explained that the Ginsberg case was even more interesting than the kid's at the Viola imagined. They reported Ginsberg's visit as a two-act affair. When he arrived from Cuba, he got a visa at the airport within an hour, called DILIA and found he had royalties coming to him from a forthcoming book, and his first evening in Prague wandered into the Viola where his work was being read that night. The Writers' Union tendered him, after a few days, an official invitation, which means they picked up his hotel tab; and the newspapers were full of admiring articles, the first one published appearing in Rude Pravo, the official organ of the party. It was on his return from a trip to the Soviet Union a little later that Ginsberg became unpopular with the Czech authorities, who professed themselves annoyed with his alleged demands for narcotics and his behavior with young men who were technically minors. In the aftermath, the party asked leaders of the Writers' Union to discuss the case with those who had been close to Ginsberg or had written uncritically praising articles about him.

"That was the extent of the trouble people got into," the Czech intellectual assured me, himself the author of one of the articles. "I have been in New York and know the dark thoughts you have when you hear the phrase, but there is a great difference between the dry phrasing of a party resolution and the way it works out in life."

Another Czech artist told me about a friend, an editor of an important magazine, who has been in trouble with the ideological section of the party all year. They had been criticizing various articles he had published for what they considered was a shallow appraisal of "the faults of the fifties," and the discussions finally reached an impasse. The editor was relieved of his position for six months and given a grant to replace his salary; he will be doing his own work and is not prevented from publishing elsewhere. "What does the party hope to accomplish by that?" I asked. The artist smiled wryly and said: "Sometimes they just hope the issue will blow over by the time the editor returns to his job."

More ominous is the censorship law scheduled to take effect this year, one which my Czech friends do not like to call a censorship law if only because it also provides a legal definition for libel that they tell me was much needed. Nevertheless, in the future, publications will submit all copy in galleys to the ideological section of the party and, when there is political disagreement, the party can ask for postponement of the particular article's publication. The law calls for discussions with the editors and for appeal by the editors, when they do not agree, all the way up, I was told, to the Central Committee. I could imagine a war of attrition being waged against a particular publication or writer, but my Czech friends would not agree.

"The law gives us the right to engage the party in a dialogue," they said. "They will have to defend their position."

I appealed to them as writers: Weren't editors bad enough? Why should someone else also pass on their copy? They laughed, but their tone indicated that was a frivolous objection. I then asked: "Did you ask for this law? Did you want it?"

They shook their heads. "We did not ask for it, but we are going to use it. The de-Stalinization came slowly here, but we are geared to gaining more and more freedoms. Always, of course, within the framework of socialism."

A foreigner who has been living in Prague for ten years confirmed that the gains—most evident in the cultural life—cannot be canceled. "The dismantling of Stalin's statue—they had to dynamite his head, it was so hard—was a trauma and a kind of liberation. It brought bad things—the apathy and anti-political attitudes of the youth, their skepticism about socialism's claims, all sorts of problems. But good things too: the party may not function in what you think is a more democratic manner, but it now really listens to the people and is trying to do something about what it hears."

Meanwhile writers and editors, party and nonparty, complain as much as any ordinary citizen. If you praise their book designing, they tell you they have to be good because the printing is bad. If you tell them how good it is that they publish so many foreign writers, they tell you the paper shortage frequently forces them to keep first editions of foreign works down to 10,000. If you say that the bookstores are more than adequately stocked, they complain that publication of a book takes as much as ten months to a year.

"Sometimes I wish there weren't so much discussion about all the shortcomings and problems," a housewife said to me. "Every day you read in the newspapers that the bread at such and such a bakery is not up to standard, that service at a department store is inefficient, that the renovation of the old buildings is too slow. You get to feel that everything is wrong. In Stalin's time, life was simpler in a way: you heard only one thing—that everything was going well—and you went about your work."

"It was simpler," said the husband, "but the economy was almost run into the ground."

Like good Czechs, they worried about that for a while. Then the husband smiled and said that a foreign visitor had told him that the truest image of a Czech was of a man in one of the fine old taverns of the city drinking a large mug of superb Pilsener and saying with a sad face: "Yes, we have problems."

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Contemporary London has won a name for being the most sophisticated of the European capital cities. It appears to occupy the position, roughly, of Berlin in the period of the Isherwood stories. Absolved of power, its rising generations have discovered again the flamboyance that always gave a hint of scarlet and lace to the gray serge of dominion. London today is gyrating to a Restoration clad in vinyl.

That, in any case, is the temper Michelangelo Antonioni has caught in Blow-Up, his first English-language picture and very possibly his most alluring work to date. It is a witty interweaving of dream and reality with the expectations reversed—dream being the ground on which the picture operates, reality the elusive substance for which it grasps in vain. Blow-Up is Gothic romance—violently picturesque and innocently wicked—recited in the Mod vernacular.

The picture proclaims Vanessa Redgrave its star, but with all respect for the attractions of her enigmatic candor and strained beauty, the billing seems more an acknowledgment of her name than of her weight on the movie. She

MOVIES THAT MATTER

for school, church, community

meaningful — timely — important

For free catalogue of 16mm feature films on

ETHICS • CIVIL RIGHTS • WAR • PEACE • SOCIAL ACTION
THE GREAT SOCIETY • ACADEMIC FREEDOM • POLITICS

write for: MOVIES THAT MATTER, Dept. N

Brandon Films Inc. 721 W. 47 St.
NEW YORK 10019

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to triggers the plot, but the style, scope and mounting pressure of the film reside entirely in a young man named David Hemmings. He and Antonioni have created between them the mint image of a current Anglo-American type who makes the languorous fascinations of a Mastroianni seem country stuff. It is the con man of "in" society, the fellow who works the angles of the avant-garde.

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

The hero in this case is a fashion photographer, long-haired, tight-trousered, running on keyed-up exhaustion, coining money out of contemptuous virtuosity and a cynical instinct for what will turn the squares on. If you can imagine an Andy Warhol with sufficient vitamins, that is close.

Antonioni has devised a superb lair for this deceptive cat to prow. His photo studio and laboratories seem to be hung as a maze of boxes and gangways on the walls of some enormous, abandoned refrigerator plant or slaughterhouse. The colors are acrylic creamy, but the angles are intimidating, and the design seems premeditated to make lay figures of everyone who works or strays within these walls except the blond, ex-slum-boy master of the place. He uses it as a huge machine, his command of its gadgetry giving him a kind of demigod's advantage over the "birds" he photographs and the females who smell him out. Part of the brilliance of Hemmings' characterization is his physical dexterity. He makes a dance of taking pictures, when he doesn't make a rape of it, and he uses cameras as though he had spent his life with them. With a camera in his hands, he is a kind of intoxicated faun; without it, he becomes a mere athlete, adept at the game of taking people by surprise.

Photography is the avocation as well as the livelihood of this aesthetic hipster. He is putting together a city picture book—one of those dissections of civic malignity—and one day in a high and windy park he finds Vanessa Redgrave with a graying lover. The sequence he shoots is to provide a conclusion to the book; but when he develops the film, far, far back in one of the frames is a pinpoint of reality which he blows up, enlargement upon enlargement (the dark-room scenes are a solo suspense ballet), into a wall-sized explosive tableau. The young man goes out to run down the facts of his discovery—but that takes him away from the studio, where he manipulates the fantasy, into streets over whose logic he has no control. What he saw in the negative is gone, if it was ever there. The jeepload of mimes who careened through the opening sequences of the picture catch up with Hemmings again at the end, and draw him into their conspiracy of the invisible event.

The film comes a clean full circle through a coolly logical extravagance of invention. The trickster is baffled, the dream prevails, and the last laugh belongs to whoever feels bold enough to utter it. Blow-Up is a work of wit and caustic intelligence, superbly disciplined, elegantly styled, visually astonishing and, for all that, turned out with the deceptive simplicity of perfect craftsmanship.

LETTERS (continued from page 34)

tween the necessary and rational solutions to our health problems and the private enterprise methods of dispensing medical care.

Hyman M. Gold, M.D.

Stamford, Conn.

DEAR SIR: Selig Greenberg is using a purely propaganda technique when he says that there are "reliable reports" that fees for the elderly have been boosted in some cases by 300 per cent by physicians because of Medicare. "What greedy physicians!", he is telling you. The 300 per cent rise, it has been shown, was when physicians stopped their voluntary one-third charity fee to some of their elderly patients because the government was going to now pay the regular fee.

Joel M. Berns, D.M.D.

Providence, R.I.

DEAR SIR: As I understand his letter, Dr. Berns does not deny that physicians are making much more money under Medicare than ever before. His claim merely is that some doctors who formerly were treating their needy, elderly patients at reduced fees or gratis are now collecting regular fees. There is ample evidence that such fees have been boosted by many physicians throughout the country to take advantage of the federal government's decision to pay the doctors whatever they say their "reasonable charges" are. The end result is that physicians are now not only being paid fully for what they previously did for nothing or for token fees but are charging their other patients more as well.

Selig Greenberg

down with Percy

Park Ridge, Ill.

DEAR SIR: "On balance, the liberal-moderate element in the (Republican) Party has been strengthened . . . most particularly, by the victories of . . . Charles Percy . . ." [Nation editorial, Nov. 21].

In my opinion The Nation grossly errs in complacently accepting the election of Percy as anything less than a disaster to the hopes of human dignity, economic opportunity and equitable social justice. . . .

While I have been totally disillusioned by the inept Senator Douglas' position on foreign relations issues, I believe his great reputation as a servant of his constituency was deserved. Percy has not at any time in his political life demonstrated the depth or the competence that would merit that kind of recognition. . . .

This "liberal-moderate" Republican, Percy, will be, predictably, a cheap imitation Dirksen—without, of course, Dirksen's ability or his macabre personality or his relatively honest and open dedication to reactionary principles.

Henry J. Dillon

Sunset caper

Encino, Calif.

DEAR SIR: Really at issue in the Sunset Strip caper is a struggle for economic survival. One set of entrepreneurs—office buildings, banks, restaurants, shops and night clubs—catering to one kind of patron, is fighting for ground space against another type of entrepreneur—the new clubs and shops—catering to another type of patron. Unfortunately, the former are part of the established adult community, whereas the latter, and the young people whom they serve, are both outside the power structure and an implicit threat to it.

Instead of encouraging the free enterprise system to operate so that one or the other group of entrepreneurs will eventually stand, fall, or adapt to the new business situation . . . the power of the state has yielded, with apparent enthusiasm, to the pressure from the older group and has taken sides on the pretext of controlling rowdiness and anti-social behavior among the young longhairs. . . . The police have become a party to this travesty of American capitalism by seizing on a minor incident of youthful exuberance to manhandle children in the name of an archaic curfew law. The effect is restraint of trade. . . .

Leon Levitt

Crossword Puzzle No. 1183

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 One could get a great star clean out of it, but it flies. (7, 7)
- 8 The ones called this way are never home. (8, 4)
- 10 Possibly uncle gets false coins for preparing the new field. (10)
- 11 Certainly nothing to damage the poet's make-up! (4)
- 13 Bodies of bees hold blood temperature in the same point. (6)
- 14 Only red's blended by the painter, obviously! (8)
- 16 In an altered form, therefore all right for fabric. (8)
- 17 Achromous, but our country isn't disturbed about the picture. (6)
- 19 Want something to be drawn out? (4)
- 20 Stuck-up pig inside, but in the vernacular, a card! (10)
- 22 The sort of list in an expansion of how spirit is obtained. (12)
- 23 Strictly speaking, the domestic swiss would not qualify. (8, 6)

DOWN:

- 1 and 2 You might have one with a nest-egg, and the other with a speech of Polonius, but they could hold your interest for a time. (7, 3, 4, 12)

- 3 Such terms total a very recent product. (10)
- 4 A pitching technique? (6)
- 5 Set about, or upon. (8)
- 6 A barrier reputedly at the first of the race? (4)
- 7 Letters of agreement? (14)
- 9 Aerial? Move it for improving the results. (12)
- 12 Novel shells might be found here. (2, 3, 5)
- 15 Not classical — rather a type of Latin contraction. (8)
- 18 Lets on such things aren't paid for? (6)
- 21 Does one fix things in the bank? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1183

ACROSS: 1 Needlepoint; 9 Pull-over; 10 Noggin; 11 and 27 The Gulf of Mexico; 12 Abettor; 14 Clothe; 15 Passover; 17 Bean pole; 20 Dredge; 22 Midriff; 24 Flatter; 26 Arabia; 28 Understands. DOWN: 2 Enlighten; 3 Divulge; 4 Ears; 5 Omnibus; 6 Night; 7 Bushel; 8 Dipole; 13 Spied; 16 Overtaxed; 18 Emigre; 19 Off base; 20 Dilemma; 21 Greece; 23 Robin; 25 Logs.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

LITTLE MAGAZINE DIRECTORY (annual)—800 listings ($3.50/four editions; $1.00/single); also: THE SMALL PRESS REVIEW (quarterly)—news, features, reviews, quarterly "record" of small press/little magazine scene worldwide ($3.50/year). DUSTbooks, Box 123, El Cerrito, California.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

* Each file holds a full year's copies.

* Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

* Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts. $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington, D.C. 20036.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

233 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

Passenger-Carrying FREIGHTERS Are the Secret of Low Cost Travel

Yes, for no more than you'd spend at a resort, you can take a never-to-be-forgotten cruise to Rio and Buenos Aires. Or through the West Indies or along the St. Lawrence River to French Canada. In fact, trips to almost everywhere are within your means.

And what accommodations you get: large rooms with beds (not bunks), probably a private bath, lots of good food and plenty of relaxation as you speed from port to port.

Depending upon how fast you want to go, a round the world trip can show you every continent on earth. And there are shorter trips. Fast, uncrowded voyages to England, France, the Mediterranean; two or three week vacations up and down the Pacific Coast or elsewhere. Name the port and the chances are you can find it listed in TRAVEL ROUTES AROUND THE WORLD. This is the book that names the lines, tells where they go, how much they charge, briefly describes accommodations. Hundreds of thousands of travelers all over the world swear by it. Travel editors and travel writers say "To learn how to travel for as little as you'd spend at a resort get TRAVEL ROUTES AROUND THE WORLD."

It's yours for just $1, and the big 108-page 1967 edition includes practically every passenger-carrying service starting from or going to New York, Canada, New Orleans, the Pacific Coast, Mexico, South America, England, France, the Mediterranean, Africa, the Indies, Australia, the South Seas, Japan, Hawaii, etc. There's a whole section called "How to See the World at Low Cost."

A big $1 worth, especially as it can open the way to more travel than you ever thought possible. For your copy, simply fill out coupon.

FABULOUS MEXICO

WHERE EVERYTHING COSTS LESS

The land of retirement and vacation bargains—that's Mexico

Where you can build a modern home for $4500 and an American retirement income looks like a fortune. It's the land where your vacation money can buy double or more what it might back home—provided you know where to go for Mexico's best values.

Norman Ford's big book FABULOUS MEXICO—WHERE EVERYTHING COSTS LESS tells you exactly where to get all of this country's best vacation and retirement values, where you can live like a prince on what you might just get along with in the U.S.A.

Norman Ford knows Mexico from north to south, from east to west, and he takes you to vacation and retirement areas that look more like the South Seas than Tahiti itself; to whole sections of just perfect weather where it's like June all year round; plus resort after resort, towns, cities, spas and what not else where you'll have a vacation to remember at a cost as low it could seem unbelievable.

If you want a delightful retirement area with plenty of Americans around to talk to, he leads you to all the principal retirement towns, as well as dozens of little known, perhaps even more delightful areas, where costs are way far down, there's plenty to do and meeting people is easy. Always, he shows you modern, flower-bedecked hotels and inns that charge hardly half of what you might expect to spend in even such a land of vacation and retirement bargains as Mexico.

There's a great deal more besides; everything from exploring ancient pyramids as old as Egypt's to finding fabulous hunting and fishing. If you might want to share in the high interest rates Mexican banks pay or to buy equally high-earning real estate or start a business of your own, this detailed guide to a fabulous land tells you what you must do to start your money earning as much more than in the United States.

FABULOUS MEXICO—WHERE EVERYTHING COSTS LESS opens up Mexico to you. It's a big book, yet it costs only $1.50. So send for yours today.

HOW TO TRAVEL

—and get paid for it

There's a job waiting for you somewhere: on a ship, with an airline. In overseas branches of American firms, in foreign firms overseas—even exploring if you're adventurous.

The full story of what job you can fill is in Norman Ford's big book HOW TO TRAVEL—AND GET PAID FOR IT. Whether you're male or female, young or old, whether you want a life-time of paid traveling or just banker to roam the world for a short year or so, here are the facts you want, complete with names and addresses and full details about the preparations to make, the cautions to observe, the countries to head for.

You learn about jobs in travel agencies (and as tour-conductors), in importing and exporting concerns, with mining and construction companies. Here's the story of jobs in the Red Cross and the UN organizations, how doctors get jobs on ships, the almost-sure way for a young girl to land a job as airline hostess, the wonderful travel opportunities if you will teach English to foreigners, and the fabulous travel possibilities for those who know stenography.

"Can a man or woman still work his or her way around the world today?" Norman Ford asks in this book as you might ask today. And he replies in 75,000 words of facts. "The answer is still a definite Yes."

To travel and get paid for it, send today for HOW TO TRAVEL—AND GET PAID FOR IT on a money-back guarantee if not satisfied. Price, $1.50.

Where to Retire or Vacation at what look like prewar prices—and where one ever heard of nerves or worries

In OFF-THE-BEATEN PATH, the big book by Norman Ford, you read of island paradises aplenty in the United States and Canada, of art colonies (artists search for picturesque locations where costs are low), of areas with almost perfect climate or with flowers on every side.

Here are the real U.S.A.-brand Shangri-Las made for the man or woman who's had enough of crowds. Here, too, are unspoiled seashore villages, tropic-like islands, and dozens of other spots just about perfect for your retirement or vacation at some of the lowest prices you've heard of since the gone-for-ever prewar days. And for good measure you also read about the low-cost paradises in Hawaii, the Virgin Islands and Puerto Rico.

You can be sure that OFF-THE-BEATEN PATH names the low-cost Florida retirement and vacationing towns, the best values in Texas, the Southwest, California, the South and East, Canada—and a dozen other areas which the crowds have not yet discovered:

- That undiscovered region where winters are warm as Miami Beach's, yet costs can be two-thirds less.
 - That island that looks like Hawaii yet is 2,000 miles nearer (no expensive sea or air trip to get there).
 - France's only remaining outposts in this part of the world—completely surrounded by Canadian territory... or a village more Scottish than Scotland or age-old Spanish hamlets right in our own U.S. where no one ever heard of nervous tension or the worries of modern day life.
 - That remarkable town where a fee of a few cents a day gives you almost endless round of barbecues, musicals, concerts, picnics, pot luck suppers, smorgasbord dinners, and a fine arts program.
- OFF-THE-BEATEN PATH is a big book filled with facts that open the way to a different kind of retirement or vacation made all the more attractive by the rock bottom prices. About 100,000 words and plenty of pictures. Yet it costs only $2.

The Island Paradises You Can Drive to Right here in the U.S. there's many a transplanted Tahiti to which you can drive:

- many a coral island bordered by a powdery beach and shaded by coconut palms.
- many another hideaway set in a sparkling bay, many another lush island gem for an out-of-the-ordinary vacation or tempting low-cost retirement.

And nearby are others to which you can drive most of the way: incredible Cozumel off Mexico, that country where your dollar buys so much more. Or other off-beat gems in the brilliant Bahamas, some just a $15 ride from Florida.

In UTOPIA IS AN ISLAND, Norman Ford, America's leading travel expert, takes you to those islands which the world has found so attractive in all respects they are known as Island Paradises—the closest thing today to a real Utopia, where you leave behind the noise and the rush of the world for a remarkable vacation or to stay a while or retire, often at fantastically low prices.

You learn about the popular islands—Barbados, Tobago, Jamaica, Puerto Rico, the Virgins; Ibiza, Majorca, Madeira, Capri, the Canaries, plus many an unknown one of equal or greater charm and less expensive. Even in the popular islands Norman Ford shows you sections which the crowds have not discovered. If your eyes are upon Hawaii but you fear it might be too expensive, wait until you read about the corners which he has found. See, too, whether you can resist those islands off in another direction where $60 a week means you and your wife live like kings and queens. Altogether, you learn about 169 Island Paradises, more than fifty of which you can drive to.

Norman Ford is always practical: he tells you how to reach the islands, gives dollar and cents costs for hotels, meals, for renting your own bungalow if you stay a while, for food in the stores, entertainment, etc. If you're interested in a second income, he tells where to start a small hotel or guest house, where to find low cost beachfront, even where to buy your own tropical plantation for only $20,000.

But let your first introduction to a modern-day Utopia be one of the many island paradises you can drive to. Find yours in UTOPIA IS AN ISLAND. Over 100,000 words long, it costs only $2. Why not send for it now?

Mail to HARIAN PUBLICATIONS, 133 Shore Drive
Greenlawn (Long Island), New York 11740

I have enclosed $_____ (cash, check or money order). Please send me the books checked below. YOU WILL REFUND MY MONEY IF I AM NOT SATISFIED.

- ☐ TRAVEL ROUTES AROUND THE WORLD—(the traveler's directory of passenger-carrying freighters). $1.
- ☐ FABULOUS MEXICO—WHERE EVERYTHING COSTS LESS. $1.50.
- ☐ HOW TO TRAVEL—AND GET PAID FOR IT. $1.50.
- ☐ UTOPIA IS AN ISLAND—the island paradises you can drive to. $2.
- ☐ OFF-THE-BEATEN PATH... America's own Bargain Paradises. $2.

☐ SAVE $3: All five books above for $5

Print Name _____

Street Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip Code _____

WORLD OF DOS PASSOS ROBERT BRILL

THE NATION

JANUARY 16, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME
JAN 17 1967
LIBRARY

VIETNAM

THE IMPORTANCE OF JANUARY

PETER DALE SCOTT

Schools in the South

Guidelines to Frustration

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Lovestone, Meany & State

American Labor Overseas HENRY W. BERGER

Letters of Wallace Stevens / A. WALTON LITE

REVIEWS

Spanish Civil War Writing / ALLEN GUTTMANN

Inner World of Childhood / GEORGE DANGERFIELD

3-22-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME

NEWSPAPER

LETTERS

like us

Perth Amboy, N. J.

DEAR SIR: No negotiations with the Vietcong is the condition in Johnson's peace offers. He wants to negotiate from the North permission to eliminate the Vietcong separately in return for ending the bombing.

He may obliterate Hanoi, but Vietnamese are like Americans. They will die rather than sell out their fellow countrymen in the South to the foreigner who seeks to bomb them into this betrayal. . . . David Mandel

the bedfellows

New York City

DEAR SIR: I wouldn't dream of attempting, in a mere letter, to correct all of the misrepresentations in Francis Pollock's article ["Junkets to Apartheid: America's Press on Safari," The Nation, Nov. 7]. I note, however, that according to him "some of [the] enemies" of the American-African Affairs Association "find suspicious" the fact that it and a Rhodesian organization once used the same postage meter.

At the risk of spoiling everybody's fun, I must advise you that the innocent explanation of this sinister coincidence may be found on page 496 of the public record of the hearings on South Africa conducted this last spring by the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa. . . . William A. Rusher

Mr. Rusher refers to a letter he had written to the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Africa. In it, he explained that the American-African Affairs Association, of which he is co-chairman, had employed a public relations firm which had also done work for the Rhodesian Government. The postage meter belonged to that firm.

From another source we learn that the agency in question is that of Marvin Liebman, whose antics were described in a recent editorial, "Liebman on the Burning Deck," The Nation, Jan. 2.—Editors.

ideas at New Town

New York City

DEAR SIR: Herbert Gans has written me to challenge the following statement made in my article on Columbia, Md. [The Nation, Dec. 26]: ". . . in meeting with his academic advisers it was generally Rouse who advanced brilliant and adventurous ideas while his consultants were more cautious."

Mr. Gans states: "Having been one of the academic advisers, I'd say it wasn't so. The ideas, brilliant and mediocre, adventurous and cautious, were well distributed between Rouse and staff and the advisers. More important, the advisers were just that: they did not plan the town. The neighborhood and village concepts are Jim Rouse's, and they are essentially conservative, anti-urban concepts which reflect both his values and his judgment of the market." Ervin Galantay

false prophets

Mesquite, Tex.

DEAR SIR: Our leading Elmer Gantry, Billy Graham, has given his Christian blessing to genocide, and his Catholic counterpart, Cardinal Spellman, has gone him one better and advocated all-out U.S. victory, which probably means the destruction of the Vietnamese nation—North and South—along with the majority of its people. . . . No one—especially anyone who wrote the Bible—ever predicted that there would be many Christians, but they did say that there would be many false prophets. Mrs. Lee Dresh

EDITORIALS

When Will China Intervene?

American policy in Vietnam is based on the assumption that Communist China will not allow itself to become militarily involved unless the United States sends troops or shells across its borders. The reasoning runs that the crushing superiority of U.S. air power, and the near certainty that in the event of war the Chinese atomic plants would be bombed out of existence, insure that the Chinese will submit to any provocation, any loss of prestige, short of direct attack. Since our military planners have no intention of opening fire on China, they feel confident that China will confine itself to supplying North Vietnam—fighting, as the saying goes, to the last Vietnamese.

An article by Robert Guillain, "Are China and the United States Heading Toward War?" in Le Monde, shows how dangerously sanguine the American policy is. True, China's military posture is defensive. It has tolerated a good deal in the way of overflights and hostile acts, mainly by the Nationalist Chinese, and will no doubt continue to limit itself to verbal protests in response to aggression at this level. But if American blows threaten the collapse of the North Vietnamese regime, the Chinese will react forcibly. They may do so reluctantly, but neither national interest nor the dynamics of communism leaves them much choice. If the impending collapse of the South Vietnamese regime were to impel the Administration to throw 500,000 troops and a major part of the U.S. Navy against the Vietcong and North Vietnam, what makes the strategists in the Pentagon imagine that the Chinese, with Vietnam on their borders, would watch their ally go down? It is an incredible hypothesis, and no doubt McGeorge Bundy, in his warning that the defeat of North Vietnam would be a disaster for us, had exactly that danger in mind.

To ignore the danger of Chinese intervention is to ignore the whole trend of Chinese foreign policy and the geographical situation which is one of the determinants of that policy. Guillain calls Vietnam "the southern outpost protecting communism." He contends that Peking cannot allow Vietnam to become an American outpost, or to be controlled by a hostile regime, or even a neutral one. Another Taiwan, this one on the mainland, cannot be tolerated. North Vietnam certainly, and all of Vietnam preferably, must be Communist and pro-Chinese.

Reinforcing these considerations are the internal stresses of the Chinese state, not only those manifested by the "cultural revolution" but potential disaffection in south China. It must not be forgotten that China has only recently been unified, under Communist auspices. Before and during World War II, it was the stamping ground of regional warlords, of whom Chiang Kai-shek was merely the most powerful. If North Vietnam fell, serious political ferment could be set off in the Chinese south, and against that possibility Peking will take all necessary steps and brave any risk.

While our Vietnamese adventure was still in an early stage, Chen Yi, the Chinese minister of foreign affairs, issued a direct warning to the United States. "As far as you go in the extension of the war," he said, "and as high as the price must be, we will support without failure and up to the hilt the struggle of our brothers in Vietnam." If we continue to pursue the strategy of bombing the North Vietnamese to the conference table, we may have cause to remember these words.

Death of Learning

The multiracial University College of Rhodesia may well become the next casualty of Ian Smith's prolonged rebellion. Two British universities are thought to be reconsidering their special relationships with the college. If they decide to sever them, British and American sources of funds supporting the Rhodesian university are likely to dry up. And it cannot hope to continue without them.

"We have not yet reached an official decision," a spokesman for the University of London has said. "And of course we cannot speak for the University of Birmingham in any way."

It is believed, however, that both universities are reluctant to continue recognizing the examination standards of University College because of the grave shortage of staff at the Salisbury university and its inevitable consequence in a decline of academic achievements.

The staff shortage, in turn, is the result of last summer's arrest and deportation of nine lecturers by the illegal Rhodesian regime. A mass resignation by lecturers followed. It is understood that out of a faculty of 140 about sixty have either quit the university during the last few months or have handed in their letters of resignation. Senior officials have been visiting Britain and the United States in an attempt to make up for the lost staff.

The authoritative Times Educational Supplement (London) has commented editorially:

"Hopes that the University College will survive in the long term are undermined by doubts whether the ruling Rhodesia Front party believe in higher education at all.

"Why should they? They are trying to put about, for example, that anyone who is not for the regime must be a Communist and that, on specially summoned 'scientific' evidence, Africans are less than human. Clearly, for such notions to become accepted currency, sources of ideas must either be suppressed or discredited. . . ."

Some academics in Britain believe that University College ought to be supported as long as it retains its quality of multiracialism.

Sir Robert Aitken, Vice Chancellor of Birmingham University, points out: "We have taken the view that the multiracial university education which we sponsor is immensely important to the future of Rhodesia. Eventually, there will be some solution to the present political impasse. If that solution is on South African lines, we presume the college will cease to be multiracial, and in that event one of the conditions of our sponsorship will be lacking.

"But if the political solution takes any other shape, there is likely to be scope for a multiracial university. It is therefore important to keep the existing one in being, for if it goes out of action now it will take many years to restart it and to rebuild its staff."

However, the shortage of staff at University College has

IN THIS ISSUE

January 16, 1967

EDITORIALS

66

ARTICLES

69 Schools in the South:

Guidelines to Frustration

Robert G. Sherrill

74 Vietnam:

The Importance of January

Peter Dale Scott

78 Sharing the Revenue:

National Taxes and Local Needs

R. A. Musgrave

80 Lovestone, Meany & State:

American Labor Overseas

Henry W. Berger

BOOKS & THE ARTS

85 Wallace Stevens: Business and a Sonnet

A. Walton Litz

86 Hospital (poem)

John N. Morris

87 Dos Passos' Restless Times

Robert Sklar

88 The Infection of the World

Sol Yurick

90 Body Testing the Slogans

Allen Guttmann

91 The Gift of Grace

George Dangerfield

92 Theatre

Harold Clurman

92 Crowns and Garlands (poem)

Langston Hughes

94 Films

Robert Hatch

95 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Science
CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 204
No. 3

rendered the controversy almost irrelevant. The university is thus fighting for its life, and the odds are heavily against it. If the teaching standards sink below a minimum level, no other university—regardless of its location or political principles—will be able to afford the luxury of supporting it by recognizing its degrees.

CB—Entering Wedge

Two Harvard professors, Matthew S. Meselson in biology and John T. Edsall in biological chemistry, have collected the signatures of more than 5,000 U.S. scientists in support of a letter to President Johnson, asking him to stop using chemical-biological weapons in Vietnam and "to categorically declare the intention of the U.S. to refrain from initiating" such use in the future. With the 5,000 signatures, the petition will be forwarded to the President during January. Signed by only twenty plant physiologists, the same document was submitted to the President last fall and drew a brief reply from an assistant secretary of the State Department. "Civilians or non-combatants are warned of such action (destruction of food crops) in advance," this functionary wrote soothingly. "They are asked to leave the area and are provided food and good treatment by the Government of Vietnam in resettlement areas." That the military governors of South Vietnam are solicitous of civilians will be news to the U.S. correspondents in the country, but the letter is of a piece with the Administration's policy of escalation, concealment and misrepresentation. It is doubtful that the increased pressure of 5,000 signatures will have any effect, and even the resolution of the council of the 105,000-member Association for the Advancement of Science, expressing concern over the long-range consequences of CB warfare, may be brushed aside.

The use of chemical herbicides for destruction of food crops and defoliation is one of the milder forms of CB warfare, but it does fall into that category, and if more drastic forms come into use it will be due, Professor Meselson believes, primarily to American initiative. Meselson's views are presented in an article by Joel R. Kramer in the December 21, 1966, Harvard Crimson. CB weapons, he adds, are militarily inconvenient and socially disastrous. The drawbacks are that the effects of spreading disease agents are much less calculable than the range and destructive power of nuclear weapons, and that CB is primarily a weapon against civilian populations. Yet these and other defects are no guarantee against the spread of this type of warfare.

In the nature of war and the men who conduct it, any new type of weapon is almost certain to be tested operationally at least once. Poison gas was used extensively in World War I and would have been used in World War II if one of the belligerents had concluded that advantages outweighed disadvantages in its particular situation. Every major military power is fully prepared to use gas defensively and offensively in a future war, and the gases now available are far more deadly than any previously known. Here, again, the use of tear gas by our forces in Vietnam may be the entering wedge for lethal applications, whether by the United States or other powers.

A frequent selling point for CB is that, like tear gas, it incorporates a variety of "humane" forms which incapacitate without killing. But if CB is introduced in this guise, Meselson fears a gradual movement in the direction of kill. Also important is a menace peculiar to CB—the danger of private or semi-private use. Once cheap, easily manufactured CB weapons become understood, an insane man could wipe out New York City. A group of desperate plotters, driven by hatred and impotence, might resort to spreading the germs of infectious, incurable disease. The prospect is ominous enough to reinforce the objections of the scientists, but our frustrations in Vietnam have made it all too easy to brush off such remonstrances.

The Property Tax Scandal

The West Coast has been booming since World War II. Millions of people have poured into the area, and hundreds of thousands of dwellings were built to house them. Real estate values zoomed—naturally. The values go up first, then the schools must be built, then the bad news comes from the tax collector. That lag is important. For a time, the property owners are not too much concerned about what the boom may cost. The rising young executive who trades in his modest $20,000 house and finds that he has lived in it for nothing for five years is not concerned about the taxes on his next house, which is financed with a $30,000 mortgage. But unless he is rising very fast, a future tax bill may give him pause. Such escalations were a significant factor in Governor Brown's defeat in California, where people get their real property tax statements just a few weeks before election.

Another aspect of the realty boom involves corruption. Tax assessment scandals have resulted in conviction of assessors in San Francisco, Oakland, Seattle and San Diego. Early in December, Los Angeles joined the procession, at least to the extent of an indictment. Philip E. Watson, who had been overwhelmingly re-elected to a second four-year term as tax assessor of Los Angeles County, was indicted on charges of receiving bribes. Allegedly he received $15,000 from the J. J. Newberry Co. not long after that company was the beneficiary of a tax ruling that saved it about $400,000.

Many California taxpayers are now convinced that they have been paying too much because others have been paying too little. This is a common situation in almost any neighborhood, but in California the accusation is leveled not only against neighbors: taxpayer suits have been brought against great corporations like American Can, Corn Products, U.S. Plywood and Crucible Steel, in an effort to collect back taxes allegedly owed the city of San Francisco. State officials estimate that at least $200 million in potential tax revenues have been lost through underassessments, some of them obtained by bribery. In Los Angeles, General Foods, Eastman Kodak and Charles Pfizer are among thirty-nine corporations that have allegedly benefited from sharp reductions in the assessed value of their properties.

After viewing the West Coast spectacle, The Christian Science Monitor looked closer to home and concluded that the scandal was nation-wide, with only occasional areas in which property was assessed without fear or favor, by objective standards. In some cases the assessors are not corrupt, but favor old-timers against newcomers. This is easily done, since the tax is the assessed valuation multiplied by the tax rate, and the assessed valuation often has little to do with actual value. The assessment of the long-time resident (or his children) remains constant, regardless of the rising real estate market. The newcomer's assessment is jacked up. If he protests loudly enough, an adjustment may be made. If he pays, it is assumed that he is able to afford the tax and therefore should pay.

The big boys in the big cities get their benefits more subtly. They engage so-called tax consultants, who know how to fix the assessors. The range of misassessment in San Francisco was well-nigh incredible. Nearly 90 per cent of the property was under- or over-assessed.

The basis for this nation-wide assessment disgrace is an absence of standards and professional esprit among assessors, the low salaries in many cases, and the domination of local taxation by politics. The federal government has power to raise money on a larger scale than the state and local governments. Congress will be considering a variety of tax-sharing plans and proposals in the session now under way. (See article by R. A. Musgrave, this issue, p. 78.)

Before local governments come, hat in hand, to receive their share of revenue from the federal treasury, they should first put their own tax affairs in order. And high on the agenda should be a thorough examination of the ways in which property taxes are assessed and collected.

The Cardinal's Mistake

"This war," Cardinal Spellman said on his Christmas visit to the troops in Vietnam, "is, I believe, a war for civilization." With civilization, including religion, thus at stake, the conclusion of the Cardinal's address was predictable. He called for "the victory for which all of us in Vietnam and all over the world are praying and hoping; for less than victory is inconceivable." (Italics added.)

Cardinal Spellman has been saying this to the troops for sixteen consecutive years, and before that he was saying it to the laity. The Cardinal is not a simple man; he is quite the equal in managerial ability of any corporate administrator, and numbers many big industrialists among his friends—Jews and Protestants as well as Catholics. In his evaluation of our wars, however, his views have had the virtue, and the defects, of extreme simplicity; and heretofore the great majority of the faithful, as well as his colleagues in the Church, have voiced no dissent.

But the reaction this time was different. The Vietnamese War is not like World War I or World War II or even the Korean War. Pope Paul recognized this from the start, and has striven for peace at almost any cost. Victory for either side has been the last outcome he desired; in this respect his views have coincided with those of U Thant. When Izvestia argued that such militancy as Cardinal Spellman expressed was "in sharp dissonance with recent statements of Pope Paul, who appealed for an end to the bloody killing," it was only stating a fact, which the perplexity and irritation of the Vatican confirmed.

The difficulty is that Cardinal Spellman (unlike Cardinal Cushing, for example) does not realize that in respect to war, views have changed and will continue to change. Time was when, as a matter of course, the Catholic bishops in warring countries automatically took the side of their own countries, inveighing against the enemy with fury even exceeding that of the statesmen.

It is hard for an old man, Cardinal or any other, to change his views; it is hard even for a young man. Nor is Cardinal Spellman alone in his inflexibility. On the contrary, as a pillar of the Establishment he has most of the other pillars with him. The same mistake is being made in varying degrees by the military, by the Congress and by the President. Yet, strive as they may, war will no longer fire the popular idealism; as John Cogley points out in The New York Times, Cardinal Spellman's addiction to "my country right or wrong" sounds morally irresponsible to ears attuned to contemporary religious thought. One has only to read the remonstrance addressed to the President by 100 student leaders to sense the moral dissonance between their views and those of Cardinal Spellman.

SCHOOLS IN THE SOUTH

GUIDELINES TO FRUSTRATION

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington, D. C.

The furor over the school guidelines, which undoubtedly will be renewed and brought to new peaks of bitterness in the next Congress, shows that if a government buries itself in a make-believe situation too long it may begin to accept its own fantasies as real.

It is happening today. Apparently many government officials of good will actually believe that the school desegregation guidelines are aimed at doing away with the old "separate but equal" doctrine of the South. Most newspapers seem to suffer from the same delusion. Of organizations watching Dixie affairs, the Southern Regional Council is, as far as I can discover, the only one that has cut through the rhetorical fluff and described the situation as it is: "By building gradualism into its guidelines by the use of minimum percentages, the U.S. Office of Education perhaps unwittingly allowed attention to shift from the illegitimacy of dual schools and the need to end them. Instead, Southern officials haggle over whether '10 per cent is too much,' while continuing segregated patterns. . . . The guidelines still presuppose a dual system of schools, drawn as they are from the prevailing notion of allowing Negro children to attend white schools."

At his December 31 news conference, Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare John Gardner, proudly announcing the 1967-68 guidelines (basically the same as for last year), said nothing about doing away with the black school-white school operation in the South; he talked merely of juggling enrollments within the dual system. That's the reality: the guidelines perpetuate segregation and will for the foreseeable future. It is a reform comparable to leading a bank robber away from a life of crime by inducing him to steal a little less each year.

After meeting with eight other governors and the President in late December, Gov. Mills E. Godwin, Jr., of Virginia, reported that Johnson told of a survey of governors which indicated the guidelines are acceptable everywhere in the nation except in the South. Is even the President confused? While the Civil Rights Act of 1964 applies to the whole nation, of course, the guidelines have never applied to any section but the South and border states. The guidelines were set up for states that have dual school systems, and the South is the only place that has dual school systems. Why would anybody, much less the President, bother to survey governors elsewhere about their acceptance of the guidelines, which have nothing to do with busing school children, nothing to do with aiding the racial balance in schools, and in short nothing to do with the needs of the North, East, Midwest or West?

The Civil Rights Act decreed that there could be no discrimination "under any program or activity receiving federal financial assistance." Theoretically, about 1,900 of the South's 2,200 school districts could right then have been deprived of federal funds. But Congress and the U.S. Office of Education—having learned nothing from the many occasions when the South, if allowed any leeway, would not budge—got snookered into gradualism, in violation of the law just passed.

Southern school superintendents said they were helpless to change from a dual school system overnight, and they pretended to be too bewildered even to work out a program of gradualism. So would the USOE help them by ordering a procedure? Why, of course.

Thus the guidelines were born at the South's request. Strategically, it was a brilliant move. Now, in place of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, there was a surrogate demon—the guidelines—to curse, to accuse of "going too far," to damn as "illegal" and "unconstitutional"—terms commonly heard in the South and in Congress, but which would have sounded rather silly if applied to the Civil Rights Act itself.

In wording the first guidelines (handed down in April, 1965) to accommodate a South allegedly moving off dead center, the USOE made one critical mistake. Its provisions allowed three types of compliance: a school district would be counted in the clear if it was already operating under a federal court order to integrate; or it could submit proof that it had abandoned the dual school system; or it could submit a plan for desegregation. One acceptable method of voluntary compliance was to offer students "freedom of choice." That was the mistake, and 75 per cent of the South's school districts were quick to take advantage of it. It put the burden of integrating on the Negro students and their parents. The dual school system would remain as it had always been—unless Negroes individually, against tremendous community pressures, petitioned to be let into the white schools. And since this would be viewed as "troublemaking" in the Deep South, most Negroes were afraid to use it.

As for faculty desegregation, the original guidelines called for none at all the first year, but did suggest that the black and white faculties meet together once in a while to get used to each other's color. The original guidelines were, in short, a farce: a blank map to nowhere.

That was the situation inherited by Secretary Gardner, and also inherited by Harold Howe II, who came in as Commissioner of Education six months later.

"We were plunged into a situation where we had no experience," Gardner recalled recently. "My predecessors vastly underestimated what it took to cope with 2,000 districts. They provided a set of guidelines that did not prove to be strong. So when I came in, we reorganized."

Gardner insists that subsequent events, if no reason for cheers, at least do not deserve the criticism they have been receiving. He gets a bit hot when it is suggested that the federal government has done little to require integration since the Brown decision of 1954. "It isn't a matter of having done so little in twelve years," he says. "It is a matter of having done nothing for ten years. We have made progress in the last two years. In the first year of the weak guidelines, Negro enrollment in integrated schools tripled. This is the first year we have tried the stiffer guidelines, and we'll double the 1965 integrated enrollment."

In all the South in 1963 only 1.8 per cent of the Negro pupils went to integrated schools. With the leverage of the Civil Rights Act, this was pushed up to 5.8 per cent in 1965. The USOE claims that in 1966 integration has gone to 12 per cent. But in a sense these are padded figures. Take out the relatively moderate states like Tennessee and Texas and the percentage for the Deep South plummets back to where it has always been.

The reason is simply that the revamped guidelines, issued in March, 1966, have been a washout as an enforcement device. They still accommodate a sluggish South and are really no more than an extension of the original guidelines, spruced up with more vigorous phraseology, calling for vague things like "substantial progress." Included as part of the new stipulations are percentage illustrations of what the USOE means by substantial. These figures were immediately attacked by Southern Congressmen, newspapers and school superintendents as a move to "balance" the races in the classroom—a rather extravagant interpretation inasmuch as the guidelines suggested that systems which ended the 1965 school year with 8 or 9 per cent integration should try to double that this year, systems with 4 or 5 per cent integration should try to triple it, and those with less than 4 per cent integration (which means Mississippi, Louisiana, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina and Arkansas) should at least try to get a dash of coloration into each white school this year.

The new guidelines also call for "some" faculty integration. One teacher per school? That might do for a start. In short, the guidelines are loose, ambiguous and often confusing even to Office of Education officials, largely because they have scrambled toleration with toughness and nobody, not even Commissioner Howe, is quite sure if the mixture has a chance of working. Southern superintendents aren't sure either, although they are beginning to have some happy suspicions. Recently the Birmingham News quoted an Alabama superintendent as saying that he had submitted a compliance plan because he thought the Office of Education had the power and the will to enforce the law. "If it turns out they don't," he said laughing, "we can always renege."

There are three major obstacles to overcoming the inertia of the school integration program:

First, President Johnson is, to say the least, lukewarm. When Commissioner Howe's predecessor held up $30 million in aid to Chicago schools because he didn't think they were complying with the Civil Rights Act, Chicago Mayor Richard Daley leaned on Johnson, and Johnson told Keppel—according to the story that has permanent circulation in the Office of Education—"if you don't run that office like I want you to run it," he might have to do something unpleasant.

Howe has had a better chance to get tough, but right now only thirty-one districts in the South are cut off from federal funds. A well-entrenched Congressman whose information is customarily accurate told The Nation last September that when the Southern Congressmen began their heaviest assault on Howe, he was summoned to the White House and advised to stop popping off so much about integrating the schools. Howe concedes that he was facing "the reality that I might become a political burden," but he denies that there were any signs from the White House that it in fact looked upon him as a burden. Secretary Gardner flatly stated at the close of the year, "certainly Harold isn't going to be fired. He is getting solid support from the White House. There was a wave, a kind of outburst of opposition, vocal opposition to the guidelines—but it is very important to make clear that this has not altered in any way our basic position. We still have the same obligations."

Nevertheless, the Office of Education has never offered a convincing explanation of why 52,000 booklets, containing four of Howe's firmest integration speeches and prepared for distribution in September and October, are still sitting in a Washington warehouse.

Also, on October 7, in response to a reporter's question about how hard the government should push the integration program, Johnson said he wanted the law "fully enforced at all times." Then he added, "I realize that in some instances there has been some harassment, some mistakes perhaps have been made, some people have been enthusiastic, and differences have developed." After which he said again it was his policy to carry out the law.

Was he supporting Howe or apologizing for Howe's actions? Howe and Gardner said Johnson was supporting them, but many Southerners said they had squeezed an apology from the President. Some Northerners thought so too. Tom Littlewood of the Chicago Sun-Times wrote: "Coming on top of his other woes, Education Commissioner Howe must have been dismayed at hearing the President concede in his press conference that some federal harassment had occurred during Southern desegregation efforts."

The second obstacle to integration, perhaps following from the first, is the fact that the Justice Department lacks zeal in these matters. Although there have been flamboyant violations of the Civil Rights Act throughout the school systems of the South, the Justice Department has filed or joined only ninety-three lawsuits to desegregate since the act was passed. There are 100 attorneys in its civil rights division, and of these, fifty or sixty are assigned primarily to cases in the South. That's fifty or sixty attorneys for all kinds of litigation—voting disputes, school disputes, job disputes, threats and intimidations that could jeopardize civil rights of various kinds—which is far too small a staff to do the job.

No school board in the South has yet been cited for contempt. Since 1965, Gov. George Wallace and the Alabama Board of Education have been under federal injunction not to interfere with the integration of schools in that state, yet Wallace induced the Alabama legislature to pass a law forbidding obedience to the guidelines, and threw his own considerable political weight against local superintendents who wanted to comply. State Superintendent of Education Austin R. Meadows has sent out letters advising local school officials that it is right and proper to continue segregating pupils because "it has been practiced down through the ages for good results. Redbirds mate with redbirds, bluebirds mate with bluebirds." Since the guidelines are nothing other than a Congressionally authorized extension of the Civil Rights Act which Wallace and Meadows are enjoined against opposing, one might think those two Dixie stalwarts to be ripe for a contempt citation. The NAACP has asked that they be cited, but the Justice Department has been noticeably cool to the idea.

The third obstacle is delay. The Justice Department customarily waits until the Office of Education gets through trying to coax, wheedle and beg the districts into compliance before it makes its own pitch. And the USOE's efforts to be reasonable with an unreasonable district can be a miserably time-consuming operation.

For example, Indianola—the seat of Eastland's Sunflower County—was obviously not going to cooperate, but the USOE spent an entire year horsing around with it. In May, 1965, the Indianola school system voluntarily filed a plan for desegregation, combining freedom of choice for children coming in from the country and a geographical scheme for distributing those who lived in the city. The geographical scheme was an obvious fraud (and of course to talk about freedom of choice in Mississippi is bitter comedy). As the lines were drawn, only two Negro children would have been going to the previously all-white school, and only four white youngsters to the previously all-Negro school (and the families of these four pupils quickly changed residence to the right side of the line).

So the plan was turned down, and the talk began. USOE representatives met with the Indianola superintendent in June, 1965. They got together again in September. In October, a USOE emissary flew down from Washington to dicker. In December, the USOE came up with another suggested plan that would ease Indianola into the money. All of this went for nothing. Four times the school system submitted a plan—and every time it was essentially the same old unyielding scheme.

On June 23, 1966—a little more than a year after the useless persuasion began—Howe signed an order cutting off Indianola from federal funds. Its effectiveness was short. Two months later, on August 26, a federal court ordered Indianola to integrate, thus removing the school system from the supervision of the USOE and making it eligible for its federal funds anyway.

Southern courts, in this way, worked at odds with the USOE for two years. Schools operating under court orders had it comparatively easy, for a court's order seldom spelled out how or how much to integrate. Many school districts, especially the tougher ones, preferred court orders.

In an effort to get rid of this tempting court alternative, the U.S. Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals was asked in April, 1966, to upgrade all court orders within its jurisdiction (Texas, Louisiana, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi) to the strictness of the USOE's guidelines. Howe expected the court to hand down its ruling before school opened in September. Instead, the appeals court was silent for eight months—while officials of the USOE, especially Howe, were catching unshirted hell from the segregationists in Congress who claimed the guidelines were illegal.

At last, on December 29, a strong ruling came down. It not only supports the guidelines but adopts them for all court orders past and future, and states that the appeals bench expects all grades to be fully integrated by next fall. This will considerably strengthen Howe's hand and will, as The New York Times editorialized, "help dispel the smoke-screen which the Southern segregationists who so vehemently attacked Mr. Howe have been employing in the effort to hide their true objective. . . ."

But it would be dangerous to put too much hope in the court's action. This isn't the first time the courts have upheld the constitutionality of the guidelines, nor is it the first time the courts have used the USOE desegregation formula as their own. If one can predict from the past, this court action will fall far, far short of effecting full desegregation by next year. (Three days after the ruling, Secretary Gardner talked only of "doubling" integration next year.) The die-hards can be heard throwing up new ramparts. Governor McKeithen of Louisiana said he expects the decision to be taken to the U.S. Supreme Court. Florida Superintendent of Schools Floyd Christian said "it would be as easy to fly to the moon as to desegregate by next fall." Others elsewhere have also begun the resistance of "helplessness."

Nor has the USOE yet figured out a way to deal with schools which integrate numerically to some extent but make brutal war upon the spirit of the Negroes they admit. What kind of legality can the USOE stamp upon the integration that permits the white students to beat the Negro "intruders" daily without interference from the white faculty? It's happening all over the South. What kind of integration is it that permits white teachers systematically and as a matter of policy to fail all the Negro students in school? The USOE knows where this strategy is being applied. As for the integration of faculties, that poses its own problems. Of Mississippi's 21,810 teachers, twenty-three are Negroes working in predominantly white schools. It used to be twenty-four, but last month Klan activities in Perry County became so boisterous that one Negro teacher—quite talented, too, her white principal admitted—decided she would go back to the old black payroll for safety. How does the USOE cope with that kind of intimidation?

In its December report, "School Desegregation 1966: The Slow Undoing," the Southern Regional Council vividly describes the nature of this harassment:

In one rural Alabama county, Negro children, beaten by whites on the first day of school, refused to get off a school bus until school authorities granted them protection. Denied this protection, they remained on the bus and were suspended for staging a sit-in demonstration. A rural county system suspends for three days any student involved in a fight, regardless of who starts the fight. Four suspensions constitute expulsion and the student may not return to any school for one year. A certain faction of the student body agrees to take three-day suspensions in rotation: Four students start four fights with one Negro student. Each will be suspended for three days. The Negro gets four suspensions and is expelled, whether or not he defends himself. The Negro students, none of whom have ever been involved in a fight in ten school years, realizing what was happening after receiving three suspensions would sign a "lost and gain slip." The "lost" status withdraws the student permanently from the school but allows him to attend a Negro school with permission of the school board. To date that permission has not been granted. The persistence of the various forms of terror against school desegregation raises in stark form the question of the adequacy of the entire guidelines approach.

These are matters for the Justice Department to correct with relentless prosecution; for Congress to attack with new safeguards and penalties; and for a Chief Executive to eradicate at whatever political price—but Justice, Congress and Johnson seem to have no stomach for the fight.

That throws the problem squarely back in the lap of USOE Commissioner Harold Howe. It is an almost pitiful situation. Howe has only forty-one field workers to "police" 2,000 school districts. For sanctions, he can cut off only special funds which, ordinarily, would be spent for the teaching of underprivileged pupils, and that is not exactly the kind of revenge Howe likes to effect.

Nevertheless, things could be worse. At least the USOE is headed by a man of courage. When he first became commissioner, Howe was pretty green about Dixie warfare. I sat in on one session he had with Southern superintendents early in 1966 and it was appalling. In effect he told them: "Now, we don't want to be pushy about this, and I know you chaps will do the decent thing, so let's all just pitch in and work it out together." The superintendents came into the session glum and defensive; they left the room happy and skipping. This guy Howe was a pigeon!

Old hands in the USOE noticed the same characteristic in other matters. Howe came to the office from a background mostly of private schools and posh experimental schools. He hadn't had much to do with the seamy side of life. One USOE official commented: "He makes too much over the idea of service. He doesn't know what the world is all about. He thinks all teachers are high-class people because most of the teachers he has worked with personally were high class. Scarsdale and Phillips Academy! He doesn't realize that most teachers, like most of everybody, are clods, and there's no use expecting them to get worked up over the service idea."

Howe comes by his idealism naturally. It is a family tradition. His maternal grandmother, a New Hampshire schoolmarm, went South to educate the Negroes and wound up marrying a General Armstrong of the Union Army. Together they helped found Hampton Institute, one of the first Negro schools of quality in the South. His father, Arthur Howe, an all-American quarterback at Yale, after studying at Union Theological Seminary and teaching at Dartmouth, became president of Hampton Institute; and there Harold Howe spent his teen years.

Howe deliberately chose to be an educational burr: "The people must and should control education just as they control other facets of our national life. But when that control is exercised in a way to provide less than excellence or to restrict excellence to the privileged, those who exercise it should be made uncomfortable."

He made many educators uncomfortable and many Congressmen downright fidgety when, in a speech to the School Administrators' Conference in New York on June 18, after announcing his puzzlement "over which is worse, honest bigotry, or well-intentioned timidity," he came right out and said it: "gradualism has failed." It was time, he said, "for school officials to form a third front for racial equality" even if it means getting fired. "Unless all of us are willing to put our jobs and our integrity on the line, we should admit that American educators are no longer prepared to be prime movers in American education."

Judging from the Congressional blast that followed, Howe was the first to take the risk. From Secretary Gardner he has had loyalty. After one of Howe's usual controversial speeches, Presidential aide Douglass Cater asked if it had been cleared with the White House. "He didn't have to clear it with the White House," Gardner answered with what for Washington was an unusual show of independence. "He cleared it with me."

Howe is not awed by Johnson either. He blue-penciled from one of his staff-written speeches a reference to Johnson's teaching career with the remark: "Well, now, I've heard about that episode once too often, and besides, I'm not wearing my uniform tonight."

So if the guidelines are almost worthless—as Howe privately admits them to be—at least they are in the hands of a man with perspective. Some of the top officials around USOE feel he could be a great commissioner, if he were freed from the role of policing civil rights and allowed to concentrate on ways to bring U.S. education into the 20th century. Whether or not he will last long enough to try out his ideas is questionable. The Administration, faced with a less Democratic Congress and, as always, confronted with key committees chaired by Southerners, may have to do some dirty horse trading. Howe, who has come to personify the guidelines in the minds of most Southerners, may be auctioned off for Johnson-favored legislation, just as Adam Yarmolinsky was sold out to ease the way for the anti-poverty program. That would be too bad, but inasmuch as there are already several hundred thousand victims of the guidelines fiasco, at least he would have company.

VIETNAM

THE IMPORTANCE OF JANUARY

PETER DALE SCOTT

Mr. Scott, formerly a member of the Canadian Foreign Service at the UN and in Eastern Europe, now teaches English at the University of California. He is co-author of The Politics of Escalation in Vietnam and Education at Berkeley (the Report of Berkeley's Special Select Committee on Education).

Every New Year since the assassination of Ngo Dinh Diem in 1963 has brought a period of particular uncertainty with regard to the future prosecution of the war in Vietnam. In January, 1964, the NLF were calling openly for negotiations with the Saigon junta, and in January, 1965, Hanoi was waiting for secret talks with U.S. representatives in Rangoon. Both months saw a marked resurgence of neutralist demonstrations in Saigon, and also the emergence of new and untried military juntas which were suspected by American reporters of an interest in negotiations. Both of these critical periods were closed off by right-wing coups that were increasingly controlled by officers of North Vietnamese origin, like Premier Ky; and both times the United States was accused of complicity in these coups. The role of the United States in snuffing out the chance of peace was much clearer in 1965: after calling off the Rangoon talks, the Americans suddenly bombed Hanoi, just when Kosygin's arrival there had aroused press speculations of an impending offer of negotiations. The best explanation for this bombing may well prove to be the one given at the time by Sen. Everett Dirksen, who suggested that the determining question was to avoid giving "the impression we might pull out."

By January, 1966, the war was clearly an American affair, and the focus of significant opposition to its continuation had passed from Saigon to Washington itself. Intense pressure from most other governments, including Britain, France and Japan, had persuaded the United States to accept a temporary pause in the bombing of North Vietnam; and on January 20, Secretary General U Thant had publicly suggested that the United States could now obtain its professed goal of negotiations by assuring the NLF of a role in any postwar government. But recognition of the NLF, even as "full partners" in a conference, was almost immediately rejected by Secretary Dean Rusk as tantamount to a defeat.

Washington's refusal to recognize the de facto rulers of most of South Vietnam might seem hopelessly incompatible with its stated desire for peace and a political settlement. Apparently Washington was refusing to recognize the NLF until it was sure that a U.S. withdrawal would "leave behind a sovereign and independent South Vietnam with a government chosen by 'free elections'" (The New York Times, January 1, 1966). (If that is so, events in Saigon since January, 1966, have changed the status quo a little, but not very much: there is still no independent regime that could compete politically with the NLF.) In any case, the United States chose the last week of the bombing pause to mount the largest military offensive of the war, and was ultimately successful in regaining contact with North Vietnamese regular forces for the first time in two months. Almost as soon as this contact was made, and despite the express opposition of many U.S. Senators and citizens, the United States resumed its bombing of North Vietnam.

A study of these critical periods, and others like them, suggests that (had it not been for stubborn resistance in Washington) the war might have ended by itself at almost any point in the last three years. "Support for neutralism," which Premier Ky in July, 1965, made punishable by death, remains endemic in Saigon; those who wish the war to continue are increasingly opposed in the civilian bureaucracy and even within the military. There have been repeated domestic, third-party initiatives for peace; and increasingly the developments which have frustrated these moves have been U.S. military escalations of the war. Even in January, 1964, there was an escalation—allegedly the "greatest heliborne assault" to that date; but it was repulsed ignominiously. This pattern is explored in The Politics of Escalation in Vietnam,* in which my co-authors and I suggest that most of the major escalations by the United States have followed significant moves toward peace, and have closed off the chances for a serious political settlement.

I write this article on Christmas Eve, at the threshold of the Christmas and New Year's truces. It would seem that we are also on the threshold of another critical period. U Thant and the Pope have made serious proposals for disengagement and their words have found support around the world. Here at home, they have been endorsed by, among others, the prominent Sens. Mike Mansfield and J. William Fulbright. The proposals have been reinforced by the hope that the Russians, who are showing more and more concern over China, might be able—if the bombing of North Vietnam were stopped—to reinterest Hanoi in some form of negotiations. This is the role which the Russians played in 1954, at the time of the Geneva Conference, and they were at it again in February of 1965, precisely when the United States chose dramatically to commence bombing North Vietnam. That escalation frustrated the Russian initiative, and until recently they have refused to intercede again. But observers in Great Britain have pointed out,

*Franz Schurmann, Peter Dale Scott, Reginald Zelnik: The Politics of Escalation in Vietnam. Foreword by Arthur Schlesinger, Jr. Beacon. $3.95. Fawcett Premier Books. 60¢.

... after stony refusal even to discuss that conflict, the Russians now are actively talking with U.S. diplomats and hinting that the Soviets might try to influence Hanoi to negotiate if the U. S. stops bombing North Vietnam (U. S. News & World Report, November 7, 1966).

In this context one must understand that both the Ky regime and the American authorities in Saigon are generally afraid of any form of cease-fire or political settlement at this time, since even after a year of major U.S.

fighting, the Ky regime has still no prospects of winning by itself against the native insurgency in South Vietnam. They make no bones about this. A South Vietnamese official recently told The New York Times: "Frankly, we are not strong enough now to compete with the Communists on a purely political basis."

We should not forget that the Ky regime owes its existence neither to popular support, nor even to military power, but rather to an American initiative. On June 9, 1965, two days before Ky replaced Saigon's last civilian Premier, The New York Times reported the U.S. Embassy's concern about Premier Quat's interest in "a neutralist solution," and added that "The United States mission's efforts have now begun to shift . . . to paving the way for an orderly transfer of power to someone else." Six months later, Richard Critchfield reported (in what David Bell assured the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was "a very good series" of articles) that:

Only one of the ten generals now sharing power has any rapport with the masses. He is central Vietnam's erratic Maj. Gen. Nguyen Chanh Thi, who also is the only one of peasant origin. (Washington Star, January 24, 1966.)

On March 10, 1966, Ky dismissed Thi, and the ensuing months of conflict effectively destroyed any chance that a popular Buddhist movement might mediate between the alternatives of military dictatorship and a Communist take-over. Before the Buddhists were put down, however, they won from Ky the concession of elections for a Constituent Assembly in September. These elections took place under conditions of press censorship, with hand-picked candidates, active military participation, and a rigorous attempt to exclude all elements suspected of neutralism and, of course, Communist sympathies. Nevertheless, the Constituent Assembly became almost immediately a focus for civilian resentment against a military regime dominated by refugees from the North, and explicitly dedicated to a military conquest of the North.

Scarfe, London Daily Mail: Ben Roth

The cabinet crisis of late October showed how deep-rooted was the resentment among Southern civilian elements in Saigon. In the end, Ky chose to keep General Loan, the military security chief who had stirred up the controversy, and accepted the resignations of four Southern civilian cabinet ministers. (He also reassigned Gen. Dang Van Quang, the Mekong Delta's IV Army Corps Commander who like Thi was relatively independent, enjoyed good relations with regional groupings in his area, and was opposed to direct U.S. intervention there.) Yet these superficial victories for the Northern military only increased the rebelliousness within the Constituent Assembly, which on November 30 voted to exclude all active military personnel from the future constitutional government and parties. The leader of this renewed civilian opposition was Tran Van Van, an aristocratic absentee landlord. In September, he had told Richard Critchfield that he hoped to appeal to the "middle-class wing" in the NLF, with a view to creating a truly peaceful and independent South Vietnam, linked economically with Japan. Its government would be purged of all Northern influence, whether militarist or Communist:

The Liberation Front is a front of Southerners while Hanoi runs things from behind, just as the Northerners do in Saigon. . . . With some of the Catholics, we are working to get these [middle-class] people in the NLF to come back on condition no neo-colonialist is elected as President. (Washington Star, September 25, 1966.)

By December, Tran Van Van had emerged as the leading Presidential candidate in opposition to General Ky. The Constituent Assembly was on the point of considering a provision to "require that the chief of state be at least 40 years old," despite the vigorous opposition of Premier Ky, who was only 36. But on December 7, Tran Van Van was assassinated. The police immediately produced an alleged assassin who obligingly implicated the Vietcong, but this version was more easily believed in America than in Saigon, or for that matter in London or Paris. The family of Tran Van Van refused to accept a government funeral and the offer of a posthumous decoration. The government in turn,

. . . suspended two of South Vietnam's three English-language newspapers—including one owned by a member of the Government—on charges of having reflected doubts about the assassination (The New York Times, December 15, 1966).

The assembly promptly voted to establish its own special committee of inquiry into the assassination, and rejected attempts by the junta to be represented. Members of this committee have already exchanged public charges with the Saigon police. On December 27 the other leading civilian Assembly spokesman, Dr. Phan Quang Dan, was injured when an explosive charge blew up under his car. And Au Truong Thanh, the most popular of the outgoing civilian ministers, has also received telephone calls threatening his life.

Regardless of who in the end proves to be responsible for these outrages, it is clear that the Ky regime is at present no more capable than was any previous Saigon regime of happily accepting a cease-fire and a possible political settlement. It remains an artificial construct, supported from above, which has repeatedly purged itself of precisely those elements with a potential following among the South Vietnamese people. For such a regime peace, and above all genuine elections, would be a disaster. Nothing shows more clearly than the history of Saigon's political crises how quickly the Vietnamese War would have come to some kind of neutralist solution if this natural course of events had not been repeatedly frustrated by military coups, assassinations and, above all, escalations of the war.

Few U.S. authorities, whether doves or hawks, whether in Saigon or Washington, are satisfied with the present level of our commitment to the war. It seems destined to produce "a long draggy war," one which Sen. John Stennis and others have said may cost us $25 billion a year for perhaps the next ten years. The U.S. military at Manila asked for at least 100,000 more troops above their projected Vietnamese level of 400,000; but President Johnson refused. At that time it was still argued that American troops should be confined to large main-force operations, primarily against the North Vietnamese, while the more difficult task of pacification on the village level should be left to the South Vietnamese army (ARVN). Since its white paper of February, 1965, Washington has worked on the theory that once infiltration of men and supplies from the North was stopped, the guerrilla structure in the villages would become an easy police problem.

But the more the United States believes itself to be successful at the level of main-force operations, the more it must recognize that the so-called pacification problem of the village guerrilla structure is making no progress whatever. For the U.S. Army to take over this sensitive political task (assuming that GIs could do it) might require double the present troop levels. Yet the South Vietnamese army is demoralized, corrupt, inactive; and it continues to steal the food and belongings of the villagers it is supposed to be converting (see The New York Times, November 28, 1966). Despite a recent decree invoking death penalties for desertions, the desertion rate is predicted by The New York Times to run to about 18 per cent for 1966: one man in five will have deserted. According to U.S. sources, ARVN desertions were 67,000 for the first six months of 1966; Vietcong desertions were 17,726 for the first eleven months. A top American adviser has called five of the ten ARVN divisions "combat-ineffective," and three others marginal.

In short, the war is stymied until the problem of pacification is somehow solved, even if American tanks and paratroops can now penetrate to areas never before reached. Therefore, many hawks, like Sen. Strom Thurmond, are calling for a different war, not a "long draggy war," but one that "will bring the enemy to his knees." At the same time it becomes clearer that none of the easily suggested alternatives—tactical nuclear weapons, an invasion north of the demilitarized zone, a drive from Thailand to the Tonkin Gulf—will have any positive impact on the problem of village pacification. So frustration with the war is widespread: and therefore peace initiatives like U Thant's or the Pope's are regarded by hawks as particularly dangerous—inasmuch as they might succeed.

Abu: Tribune, London

In this context, one must consider the significance of the decision to bomb freight yards around Hanoi, and (even if without authorization) the center of Hanoi itself. Were these raids indicated on military or political grounds? It is hard to see a pressing military reason in the light of General Westmoreland's assurances that "the initiative has swung to our side" with respect to main-force operations. It is even more difficult to believe in a vital logistic relationship between the freight yards of Hanoi and the village guerrillas of the South. It makes sense only if you believe in bringing someone to his knees, even if it is the wrong person.

The political effect of these bombing raids is much clearer. In its article of last November 7, the U.S. News & World Report (as well as other sources) described the American contribution to a "deal" with Russia:

Mr. Johnson, for the U.S., is reported to have made a decision, revealed at the Manila Conference, not to escalate the Vietnam war by heavier bombing of really vital targets or by large-scale addition of troop strength.

Whatever the intention, the result of the December raids is to undo that decision, and effectively to minimize the threat of a de facto truce which might lead to negotiations. Despite Secretary McNamara's explicit assurances to the contrary, the Hanoi freight yards are a vital new target: they are the heart of the North Vietnamese rail system, and they had never been bombed before. Hanoi's suburbs have admittedly been bombed in the last weeks, and probably its center as well. If anyone was frightened that Hanoi might listen to a Russian appeal for negotiations, that person would find it easier to relax and enjoy his Happy New Year.

It was just twelve months ago that an Italian professor came back from Ho Chi Minh with what seemed like a highly significant statement of willingness to negotiate on the sole basis of the 1954 Geneva Agreements. As we relate in our book, Ambassador Goldberg was warned on December 8, 1965, that Ho would not enter into peace negotiations with the U.S. if the Hanoi-Haiphong area were bombed.

One week later, while Secretary Dean Rusk's letter concerning the Italian initiative was being studied in Hanoi, the Haiphong area was bombed for the very first time in the war. The pause in the bombing which followed the Christmas truce was also ended, after a major U.S. escalation had spoiled its prospects. Until this pattern is somehow broken, we must face periods like the present one with the greatest anxiety. For the presence of a significant possibility of disengagement, even of negotiations, seems on past experience to increase the risk of escalation.

This is not said out of despair, or to suggest that there are now no chances for an extended de facto truce. On the contrary, Washington's confusion and self-contradictions with respect to the bombing of central Hanoi confirm the presence of deep internal conflicts concerning the advisability of escalation. In this context the Goldberg letter of December 19 to U Thant, like his statement of September 22, seems important—not as a solution in itself but as a symptom of greater U.S. interest in peace. The letter's wording as such contains little to attract the interest of the other side, inasmuch as it does not ask U Thant to bring about a cease-fire, but only to engage in "the necessary discussions which could lead to such a cease-fire." This can easily be interpreted as another U.S. attempt to arrange discussions which are not specifically directed to the implementation of the 1954 Agreements, with the National Liberation Front as a participant. On the other hand, the Goldberg initiative—if combined with concessions in deeds such as a cessation of bombing—quite possibly could lead to meaningful discussions and even negotiations.

Correspondents agree that President Johnson's authorization for the two Goldberg initiatives was not given easily or lightly, as to an empty propaganda gesture. On the contrary, it was probably granted over the opposition of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who fear a truce which would, in James Reston's words, "leave the Vietcong in possession of most of South Vietnam" (San Francisco Chronicle, December 21, 1966). It does not seem inevitable that these international moves toward disengagement and peace will, as in the past, lead to a fresh round of escalation. One unknown factor which will affect the outcome will be the extent to which the Pope's initiative is supported by the American people. They must respond to it, not just passively (a 1965 poll showed that 73 per cent of Americans wished a pause in the bombing; the pause, however, soon ended), but actively through their words, letters, social and political organizations.

National Taxes and Local Needs

R. A. MUSGRAVE

Mr. Musgrave teaches economics at Harvard University. He has been an adviser to the U.S. Treasury Department, AID, and the Council of Economic Advisers.

The current burst of proposals to transfer federal revenue to the individual states has produced a wide variety of response. Launched from the liberal wing as the Heller proposal, the idea has been opposed by labor, and the Administration also is said to be unsympathetic. But the idea has received bipartisan endorsement from the Conference of State Governors and now bounces back from the Republican side as their "great answer to the planned society."

The key to this puzzling pattern is simply that the transfer proposal may be supported on quite different grounds. Liberals see it as a device for placing the superior taxing ability of the federal government at the service of rising state-local needs. They consider it a supplement to, not a substitute for, the traditional type of grant programs. Its purpose is to produce a higher and more adequate level of public services, with continued emphasis on income taxation in the overall (federal-state-local) tax structure. It is also to prevent the recurrence of "fiscal drag."

Conservatives take a different tack. They see the revenue transfer as an attractive alternative to specific aid programs, a device to hold down federal spending, a base for property tax reduction, a means to decentralize fiscal control and to strengthen state power relative to that of the federal government. It is evident, then, that the plan could do quite different things, depending on how it was structured and applied.

When the Heller plan was first advanced, the step-up in Vietnam had not yet materialized. The economy had responded well to the stimulus of the tax cut of 1964, but a situation was anticipated when renewed expansionary action would be needed. The proposal for revenue transfer to the states offered an attractive alternative to federal tax reduction or expenditure increase.

Since then, the economic picture has changed. Due to sharply increased military spending, the federal budget for 1966 has been excessively expansive rather than restrictive, and as of now the winds are still in that direction. However, hopes are that sooner or later the war demands will level off. At that time, and over the longer pull, the old problem of fiscal drag is likely to re-emerge.

The difficulty, briefly, is this. As the economy grows, the level of output at full employment rises by, say, $40 billion a year. This means that federal revenue (out of full-employment income) will automatically rise by about $7 billion. Unless federal expenditures go up, the potential budget surplus at full employment will rise accordingly, and it will be more difficult for the economy to maintain full employment.

The "fiscal dividend" of $7 billion, while a potential blessing, must be returned to the expenditure stream. Using the excess receipts for debt retirement will not do this, but expenditure increase or tax reduction will. Or it might be done by transferring the excess revenue to state-local governments. If this increases state-local spending, the employment effects are similar to those of increased federal spending. If it reduces state-local taxes, private spending will rise, and the expansionary effect would be similar to that of a federal tax cut. The transfer plan thus fits the needs of an expansionary stabilization policy; and given its broad political support, it might well permit more expansion than could otherwise be undertaken.

This case for revenue transfer, as a tool of stabilization policy, is joined with another, aimed at a better matching of fiscal resources and needs. From 1955 to 1965, state and local general expenditures rose from $34 billion to $75 billion, an increase of more than 120 per cent. Even on a per capita basis, the increase was 90 per cent. More than three-quarters of this was financed by increased tax receipts; and two-thirds of the increase in receipts was from sales and property taxes. As a result, the state-local tax structure was placed under considerable strain, at the very time when the federal government came to be concerned with a problem of fiscal drag and excess revenue yield.

The increased cost of state-local services must not be exaggerated. In relation to gross national product, such expenditures rose by one-third only, from 9 to 11 per cent; and as a fraction of total (federal, state, local) expenditures for civilian purposes they remained about constant at 63 per cent. Nevertheless, state-local needs will continue to rise in relation to GNP. Although the pressure for increased services stemming from underlying demographic factors will abate somewhat, a severe gap remains, and the built-in growth of state-local revenues from existing rates of tax will not suffice. Moreover, the potential for increased taxation is limited. For one thing, the states wish to compete for business by offering a good "tax climate," forgetting in most cases that the "public service climate" matters as well. For another, the types of tax available for use regionally are more limited than those on a nation-wide basis. The tax base for the nation exceeds the sum of those for the states, since more efficient and equitable tax measures can be applied.

These considerations distill down to four facts: (1) The public needs serviced at the state-local level must be assigned high priority in the expanding output of our economy; (2) federal taxes are qualitatively superior to and more readily available than state-local taxes; (3) the federal tax system will be in a position of relative slack; and (4) this slack must be disposed of to maintain employment. From this summary emerges a convincing case for placing the superior federal taxing power at the service of state and local needs. The question is not whether—but how—it should be done.

We commence with the need for fiscal equalization. Local and state governments can apply taxes only within their jurisdictions. The tax base (property, sales, income, etc.) available within the jurisdiction determines its fiscal capacity. This capacity differs widely between states and localities, and typically stands in inverse relationship to fiscal needs. Such is the case especially for health, welfare, education and low-cost housing.

Revenue transfer may be so used as to secure better balance between fiscal capacity and need. If the transfer is to the states, strict revenue sharing (returning to each state a fraction of the income tax collected from that state) would be distributionally neutral. Transfer on a per capita basis would be mildly redistributive, since per capita federal tax collections from high-income states exceed those from low-income states.

A much larger effect could and should be achieved by using a formula in which explicit recognition is given to capacity, measured by, say, per capita income; and where allowance for need may be introduced as well. Thus some fraction of the total transfer, and substantially more than the frequently mentioned 10 per cent, should be set aside for distribution in this way.

But even if this were done, the fact remains that the mismatch between fiscal capacity and need is not only, or even primarily, an interstate problem. Inequalities are even greater among localities within a state. This raises the question of whether the federal transfer, or some part thereof, should go to local governments rather than to states. The proposition seems sensible at a time when the need for regional fiscal complexes (to wit, for metropolitan areas) becomes increasingly evident, and the state has lost most of its logic as a major fiscal unit. For political reasons, however, it may still be necessary to direct the transfers to the states. In that case, they should be subject to conditions which assure their use in reducing capacity-need differentials among local governments.

But reducing the inequalities of fiscal capacity and need is not an objective in itself. Considerations of equality or equity relate to individuals, not to governments. What matters is that the federal government should be concerned first with sustaining minimum levels of public services, and failure to provide minimum levels arises precisely where capacity falls short of need. An additional dollar spent on high school education in Westchester County, N.Y., is fine, but it is much less important than an equivalent amount spent on elementary education in Harlem or in Mississippi.

This raises the question of just what kind of public services the transferred revenue is to support. Is it to go into highways, redevelopment of downtown office structures, or into human investment, such as elementary education or child care? The implication of the program will depend greatly on the answers.

By and large, the proponents of the Heller plan have held that there should be a minimum of strings, that the states should be permitted to decide how the funds are to be used. This would help to secure rapid legislation, but it now appears that there is no great hurry and the issue can be considered on its merits. The increase in state-local expenditures from 1955 to 1965, it is argued, was directed very largely at such essential categories as education (42 per cent of the increase) and health and welfare (14 per cent). From this it is concluded that the new grants will be used similarly.

But the matter is too important to be left thus to chance. The more vital the services which are to be supported with scarce means, the more essential it is that these resources be used effectively. If the largess of the federal government were boundless, it would make little difference how the support was given. But the federal government, notwithstanding its superior taxing powers, cannot (and should not) support all things in all places. Its resources are limited, even in the context of fiscal drag, and tax reduction and increased federal programs are alternative remedies. The scarce resources should be concentrated, therefore, where they would do most good.

This poses a further point. Suppose the revenue transfers are to be made in the form of unrestricted block grants. Will such transfers be supplementary to, or in lieu of, existing (and future) federal aid programs directed toward specific functions? The originators of the Heller plan and its supporters think in terms of the former alternative, but that is hardly the spirit of Congressman Melvin Laird's proposal (according to The New York Times of December 20) that a beginning be made by replacing grants under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act with block grants to the states, subject only to the general proviso that they be used for education. Thereby, the program's effectiveness in the war against poverty (and a quarter-hearted war it has been) would be greatly diluted.

Undoubtedly, the revenue transfer would be seen by many supporters as a device to reduce and restrict direct federal aid programs. Therefore, the case for general revenue transfer must be discussed not in isolation but in relation to the future role of specific grant programs. There is much to be said for stressing local responsibilities and involvement in traditionally local expenditure functions, and there is no denying that the local government is in closer touch with its specific needs. But it is evident also that the technical competence of most state governments is far below that available for program planning at the federal level. Nor does the ranking of programs, as seen from the state point of view, coincide, in many cases, with the set of national priorities with which the federal government must be concerned.

Much is being said about the new look of fiscal federalism that will emerge from this program. Will it be one of directed transmission of fiscal resources from the federal to the state and local levels, adjusted to provide minimum levels of nationally important (but locally furnished) public services? Or will it be one of general revenue transfer, with expenditure restriction at the federal level, reduction in state-local taxes, and complete freedom of the states to use the funds as they see fit?

The issue here is not one of partisan political advantage. The political complexion of Statehouses changes, and reapportionment may well reverse the "conservative versus liberal" ranking of the federal government and the states. What matters, rather, is the construction of a responsible system of fiscal federalism. A basic tenet of such a system is that there should be a link between the responsibility to tax and the responsibility to spend. While differentials in fiscal capacity and need make transfers necessary, the form of these transfers should be such as to preserve this link in some measure. There should be some assurance that funds, which originate at the national level, will be spent according to national priorities. Lacking this relationship, the revenue transfer may well result in a Balkanization of our expenditure structure, at the very time when a comprehensive national approach to public service programs is most needed.

To sum up, federal fiscal resources are not limitless, and cannot serve all needs at the same time. The most important policy objectives must be given priority, and the dispersion of funds for secondary and tertiary objectives be set behind. The "everything-is-important" answer is no solution. The most crucial domestic issue before the federal government is the social integration of the Negro, and the closely related poverty issue. Notwithstanding all the talk, very little has been done to date to meet these needs, and that is the area where fiscal resources should be directed first of all.

State and local governments must play an important part in such an endeavor, and revenue transfers to states and localities will be needed. But these transfers should be assigned and guided as part of a broader program. They should not be applied in a shotgun fashion.

LOVESTONE, MEANY & STATE

AMERICAN LABOR OVERSEAS

HENRY W. BERGER

Mr. Berger teaches history at the University of Vermont. His Union Democracy: American Labor's Foreign Policy in Latin America is being prepared for publication.

When the AFL-CIO Executive Council, at its meeting in Chicago last August, offered complete and unequivocal support of President Johnson's position in Vietnam, asserting that criticism of the war "can only pollute and poison the bloodstream of our democracy," it was remaining loyal to a conservative foreign policy which the country's major labor organization has followed from the start. This outlook is characteristic of George Meany and his chief adviser on international affairs, Jay Lovestone (director of the AFL-CIO International Affairs Department), as well as Irving Brown, William C. Doherty, Jr., and Andrew C. McLellan. These men have long been associated with the AFL wing of the giant labor confederation and, in active collaboration with the United States Government, they largely determine labor's foreign policy. Moreover, they conduct these very substantial overseas activities almost entirely without consulting the rank-and-file workers who help to subsidize them. To be sure, the International Affairs Department dutifully reports its activities to annual AFL-CIO conventions and throughout the year issues a voluminous barrage of publications. The reports usually either hail the accomplishments of labor's international efforts or warn of the ever-present danger that communism will sweep the free trade union movement of the world. Such rhetoric, however, does not stem from any views the members themselves may have. Instead, the workers tend to accept what the leaders tell them.

The main tenets of organized labor's present foreign policy were established in the early days of the AFL under the leadership of Samuel Gompers. Significant departures from the essential guidelines were nearly always forced responses to specific external events, rather than fundamental and permanent changes in ideas. Nor has successive leadership produced any noticeable shifts in policy.

The major exception to the general truth of this proposition was the international outlook of the CIO unions that broke from the AFL in the 1930s. On the whole, the CIO tended to be less doctrinaire, more flexible, more willing to recognize that changes could be produced by indigenous social conditions, and were not always directed from Moscow. This viewpoint helps to explain the present strain between the leadership of the two major components of the AFL-CIO.

From the beginning, the AFL viewed the international scene in terms of such narrow domestic bread-and-butter issues as overseas competition from cheap labor and cheap goods. Consequently, the federation habitually endorsed measures that would protect it from competition, including immigration restriction, improved world-wide labor standards and, for much of its history, high tariffs on many items produced by constituent unions. But these goals were tied to an outlook which increasingly emphasized the virtues of business unionism, championed liberal capitalism, espoused a conservative trade union program, promoted the export of an AFL style of union, and resisted alternative labor ideologies.

It cannot be denied that the AFL helped to create unions in some areas where virtually no labor movement had existed. This was particularly true in Latin America. In time, it was believed, this development would benefit labor in the United States because the foreign unions would reduce the competition of cheap labor as they forced higher wages from employers. Moreover, higher wages would mean a larger market for many goods produced by union members in the United States. But the unions which the AFL promoted abroad were either patterned after the AFL unions themselves or were politically allied with the American labor federation. Finally, in a number of instances the federation sponsored unions to compete with an already existing labor movement. It initiated activities in other countries wherever and whenever it had the resources to do so, and increasingly collaborated with the United States Government in pursuit of common foreign policy objectives.

For other insights into the activities of the AFL-CIO in nations abroad see: "Meddling in South America" by Stanley Meisler, The Nation, February 10, 1964; "Love-stone Diplomacy" by Sidney Lens, The Nation, July 5, 1965.

Records to document these tendencies exist from as early as the first decades of the century and continue to the present. The work of AFL organizers in Latin America and the Pacific after the Spanish-American War, Samuel Gompers' close association with the foreign policy of Woodrow Wilson, and union efforts (temporarily unsuccessful) in Europe during and immediately following World War I are but highlights of this long and conscious involvement in foreign affairs. The death of Gompers and the coming of the depression served momentarily to check labor's foreign activities, but there was no shift in basic policies. What changed was the degree of involvement.

In fact, the AFL's ultraconservative posture was confirmed and its efforts to influence the shape of overseas labor movements and official United States policy were renewed and intensified when the CIO emerged as a competitive force in the mid-1930s. While part of this attitude was in response to CIO activities abroad, especially in Latin America, the character of AFL policy was of its own making. William Green, then president of the federation, and his associates, Matthew Woll, John Frey, Chester Wright and George Meany, strongly opposed the progressive and nationalist Confederation of Mexican Workers (CTM), led by the Marxist-oriented Vicente Lombardo Toledano, and the oil-nationalization program of the Lázaro Cárdenas regime—both of which were endorsed by the CIO. The federation chose instead to support the impotent and conservative Regional Confederation of Mexican Workers (CROM) and those in the State Department who tried to resist the nationalization decrees.

This conservative position was repeated throughout Latin America, Europe and Asia during and after World War II. To be sure, the AFL was an early and vigorous opponent of Fascist and other right-wing authoritarian regimes which set out to destroy all trade unions. But it tended to tolerate, and sometimes to embrace, reactionary regimes that were vigorously anti-Communist and that permitted AFL-supported unions to function. Such was the situation after the war in Greece, in the Caribbean and Central America, in Bolivia and in China. Moreover, as the fighting ended, the AFL's campaign in Western Europe, Latin America and Asia received political and economic support from Washington.

Some of this union-government cooperation held over from labor involvement in wartime agencies, especially the Office of Inter-American Affairs (OIAA), headed by Nelson Rockefeller. Men associated with the AFL, among them John Herling, Serafino Romualdi (later in charge of the federation's Inter-American Affairs), Robert J. Watt and David Dubinsky, had either official or unofficial ties with the OIAA. Irving Brown, who probably did more than any other single person to promote AFL objectives in Europe and Africa after 1944, began this involvement as director of the Labor and Manpower Division of the Foreign Economic Administration (FEA) in which he served during the critical months of April to September, 1945. Brown then resigned from the FEA because he believed that American policy makers in Germany were promoting labor policies which, in his words, served "the interests of the Soviet Union." But this disagreement did not terminate Brown's work for the AFL in Europe, nor end AFL cooperation with the government. In fact, the relationship was eventually formalized and the government leaned increasingly toward the AFL point of view in foreign labor matters.

It is important to emphasize that AFL agents were proselytizing in Latin America, Asia and Europe well before it can be seriously argued that the Soviet Union was in any active sense intervening in those areas on behalf of Communist labor leadership. Soviet support and direction came after local Communists were already involved in unions on their own, as in France and Italy. Moreover, as even conservative journalists reported, the Communists in Western Europe were quite moderate and cooperated with non-Communist groups until 1947, when East-West relations turned exceedingly cold. The AFL intervened vigorously prior to these developments and did so on its own initiative. The intervention was surreptitious and designed to undermine labor elements already in existence or emerging from the chaos of World War II.

Drawing by Anton Refregier

In Latin America the federation simply renewed its historical involvement. George Meany was sent to Mexico in December, 1944, to investigate the possibilities of working with conservative elements of the Mexican CTM in opposition to Vicente Lombardo Toledano and the hemispheric Confederation of Latin American Workers (CTAL) which he now headed. The AFL had changed its position toward the CTM because it was clearly the dominant Mexican union and because it contained conservative men with whom the AFL might be able to join hands.

While the U.S. Department of State officially divorced itself from Meany's venture, it in fact gave assistance and encouragement. Meany reported on his findings to George S. Messersmith, the American Ambassador to Mexico. A year later, Serafino Romualdi, the official AFL Inter-American representative, traveled extensively through Latin America to seek support for a labor federation that would rival the CTAL. His trip was in part underwritten with public funds, since his ostensible reason for going south was to represent American labor at the regional International Labor Organization (ILO) Conference in Mexico City. State had a say in planning the rest of Romualdi's itinerary.

These events were followed by increased consultation between AFL and State Department officials, in particular Romualdi, Assistant Secretary of State Spruille Braden, and the chief of the division of labor attachés, Daniel Horowitz. From these meetings emerged the Inter-American Confederation of Labor (CIT), predecessor to the present-day Inter-American Regional Organization of Workers (ORIT).

In Europe, the AFL set out to establish anti-Communist cadres through heavy financial assistance, generous political advice and widespread underground activities. Its major instrument was the Free Trade Union Committee (FTUC) whose executive secretary was Jay Lovestone. Lovestone's chief man in Europe was Irving Brown. The method of operation was simple—dual unionism. Thus in France the AFL urged unions to split from the General Confederation of Labor (CGT), and materially assisted the formation of the rival Force Ouvrière (F.O.).

Brown also intervened in French strikes. The most famous of these episodes was a strike against the delivery of American arms at French ports in 1949-50. Brown supplied the funds and the manpower to get the material landed and thus helped to defeat the unions involved.

In France, as elsewhere in Europe, AFL showed little patience with those who saw distinctions between various factions of the Left or who refused to consider all Communists mere Kremlin robots. Thus a long-time labor attaché to Paris, Richard Eldridge—whose knowledge of French labor was extraordinary, and who suggested a more flexible policy in dealing with the French Left—ran into the opposition of the AFL "activists." The whole story of Eldridge, who seems to have had the confidence of American Ambassador Jefferson Caffery, will probably never be known, but he is proof that not all American officials shared the AFL's almost theological view of foreign labor matters.

In Italy, Brown and Harry Goldberg opposed Socialists as well as Communists, and helped to splinter the labor movement in that country too. Similar courses were followed in Greece, Germany and the Orient. Richard Deverall, the top AFL figure in Japan, had previously served with the American military government. The AFL also sent him to India, and Harry Goldberg moved from Italy to Indonesia. The available evidence suggests that a great deal of money was pumped into these missions and that it came from government sources as well from the AFL.

No one disputes the right of the AFL to take whatever political stand its judgment dictates. But what was so disturbing about the ventures cited above was the means the leadership used to approach its goals. First, the AFL became thickly involved in the labor affairs of other nations. This not only violated another AFL principle—the autonomy of labor unions—but it paralleled the very practices of the Communists that the AFL daily condemned. Second, the activity was carried on without the knowledge or prior consent of most rank-and-file union members at home. Third, the AFL increasingly tied its overseas activities to United States Government agencies, including the CIA. None of these developments fitted well into the democratic tradition of American unionism.

Meanwhile, in the increasingly bitter atmosphere of the cold war, the CIO withdrew from the Communist-dominated WFTU and, along with the AFL, affiliated with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions (ICFTU). Among other things, the agreement between the AFL and the CIO on foreign policy helped to create the climate for their merger in 1955. Although many in the CIO had been disillusioned by their experience with the Communists in the WFTU, what happened in that situation was by no means inevitable. It was rather the outcome of a deteriorating relationship between the United States and the Soviet Union. Nor did the result necessarily vindicate either the premises or the practices of AFL foreign policy. Even so, AFL leaders stepped up their activities after the merger, despite the formal liquidation of the Free Trade Union Committee. Lovestone and his assistants have continued to the present their private espionage efforts abroad and have remained firmly in control of the foreign policy apparatus of the AFL-CIO.

George Meany estimated in 1963 that 25 per cent of AFL-CIO income—"plus a great deal more from our various affiliates—goes into these international activities." But this statement does not suggest the very substantial income from another major source—the United States Government. It has been estimated at $110 million.

AFL-CIO involvement with official international policy has been expanded also by the increase of government personnel working in the field of international labor relations. By 1965, sixty-five labor attachés were assigned to United States embassies, 125 part-time labor officers and miscellaneous labor personnel were attached to embassies and missions of the Agency for International Development (AID) overseas, and twenty-one persons were employed as full-time workers in the State Department and AID in Washington. Nearly all these employees were cleared for appointment by the AFL-CIO, their militant anti-Communist credentials being scrutinized with particular care.

The attitude of the men who make American labor's foreign policy has produced a continuing dispute between them and Socialist-oriented unions affiliated with the ICFTU. Many in the world labor body would like to see a relaxation of tensions between East and West and less AFL-CIO dominance of the organization. Meany, Lovestone and company decidedly oppose this view. It is this sort of issue that provides the base for argument, not Mr. Meany's alleged quarrel with ICFTU officials over administrative matters or his concern about the personal morals of some ICFTU staff members.

A similar division between the AFL-CIO and the unions of other countries has occurred in the ICFTU's Latin American affiliate, ORIT. The AFL's first sustained overseas involvement was in Latin America, and it is still the scene of some of its most extensive activity. This is most dramatically illustrated in the work of the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), now directed by William C. Doherty, Jr. (see "Labor Between Bread and Revolution" by Sidney Lens, The Nation, September 19, 1966). The AIFLD, with a budget running into the millions, maintains fourteen Latin American field offices and has trained more than 30,000 students in United States union policies, tactics and organizational procedures. Nearly 500 of these students have taken advanced courses in Washington, have been placed on the AIFLD's payroll for nine months after they returned home, and have engaged in political activities in their countries, designed to advance the interests of the AFL-CIO and the United States Government.

The objectives of the AIFLD training schools have been primarily political. Paul K. Reed, former international representative of the United Mine Workers, made this clear in an exchange with the employer of one trade unionist from Bogotá, Colombia. Requesting a year's leave for this man, a union official, in order that he might participate in the AIFLD educational program, Reed declared that "we feel strongly that through the education of the workers it will be possible to halt the wave of communism sweeping through Latin America."

What this means in practice has become all too clear. In British Guiana, the AFL, along with large American corporations, supported the successful opponents of the Cheddi Jagan leftist regime, and in Brazil the AIFLD has cooperated with the military dictatorship of Humberto Castelo Branco. Only recently, Doherty endorsed Castelo Branco during public ceremonies dedicating a housing project largely financed by AID. In the Dominican Republic, federation-supported right-wing laborites helped in 1963 to oust Juan Bosch. The American union activity was so heavy-handed that eventually the Dominicans demanded that Fred Somerford, United States labor attaché, and Andrew McLellan, the ORIT representative, leave the country. Nevertheless, the AFL-CIO strenuously opposed Bosch in the 1966 elections, following American military intervention. It accused Bosch's revolutionary party (PRD), on very little evidence, of being Communist dominated, and leveled the same charge at unions supporting him.

The AIFLD has been a chief supporting instrument of these and other AFL-CIO activities in Latin America. It has also carried on what it calls "social projects," a series of efforts largely financed by the U.S. Government through AID. These include housing developments, worker co-ops, credit unions, banks, apprentice schools, medical clinics and union halls. Many of them are impressive achievements, but all have been channeled to the "proper" political recipients and favored unionists. The money, thus, has been political money, dispensed in accordance with AFL-CIO political objectives.

In these ambitious undertakings, the AIFLD has enjoyed not only the active participation and cooperation of the U.S. Government but also the support of certain private U.S. firms which have seen a controlled, anti-radical union movement as necessary to their well-being. The board of trustees of the AIFLD includes J. Peter Grace of W. R. Grace and Company, Berent Friele of the Rockefeller Foundation, Charles Brinckerhoff, president of the Anaconda Company, and Juan Trippe, president of Pan American Airways.

AFL-CIO ventures in the area have, of course, been severely denounced by Latin American Communists and some Socialists. But the opposition has not come only from the traditional Left. Supporters of former President Juan Perón of Argentina have been sharply critical and so has a group of labor organizations gathered in a growing organization known as the Latin American Confederation of Christian Trade Unions (CLASC), with its center of operations at Santiago de Chile. CLASC is affiliated with the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU), with European chapters in France, Belgium, Germany, Italy and Holland.

Though still small in numbers (about 50,000 dues-paying members), CLASC is a vigorous competitor of ORIT and a militant opponent of U.S. union activity and what it terms American "imperialism" in Latin America. But CLASC is also strongly anti-Communist and seems to borrow much of its central ideology and appeal from Peronista rhetoric. The emphasis is upon neutralism in the cold war and a revolutionary social program in Latin America. CLASC has been able to cause difficulties for Alliance for Progress trade union operations and thus to force U.S. officials to consider giving it a role in planning Alliance labor policies. This distresses the AFL-CIO, which has charged that CLASC "has traditionally opposed the U.S. type of economic system, has been anti-Alliance for Progress, anti-Organization of American States and anti-Pan Americanism."

However, not all the AFL-CIO leadership shares that estimate. Among those who take an apparently more open-minded view are Walter and Victor Reuther. Indeed, the Reuther brothers and their friends have increasingly objected to the entire Meany-Lovestone foreign policy. This schism has long been suspected, but recently there have been sharp public exchanges between the two groups over such matters as labor's relationship with the State Department and the CIA, the AFL-CIO boycott of the ILO after a Polish delegate was elected president, the role of the AFL-CIO in the Dominican crisis, the federation's position on Vietnam, and its foreign policy theories and tactics in general.

The latest meeting of the executive council on November 14 confirmed AFL control of organized labor's foreign policy. Walter Reuther, for reasons which are not yet entirely clear, chose not to attend the council meeting, which endorsed the entire eleven-year foreign policy record of the merged federation. The New York Times reported that when Mr. Meany was asked whether this meant that the council felt it had made no mistakes whatsoever during this period, he replied: "Yep"—a response which may be taken to indicate that the Meany-Lovestone outlook has become more rigid than ever.

By openly disputing the position of Meany and Lovestone,

Walter Reuther has probably risked his chances to succeed Meany as AFL-CIO president, but perhaps he has also set up the nucleus of a leadership able to challenge the established foreign policy of organized labor. He may elect to do this by dissociating the United Auto Workers from the foreign policy of the national labor federation, and by adopting an independent stand. It has been suggested that Reuther's absence from the November 14 meeting of the council was a first step in that direction. Whatever the strategy, Reuther could possibly provide a different direction for labor's international activities and also restore a portion of a badly damaged democratic labor tradition.

The alternative that Reuther represents is urgent for another and perhaps still more important reason. The present foreign policy of the federation contributes to an increased cold-war military build-up in the United States, because it emphasizes military responses to situations abroad. From Vietnam to the Dominican Republic, the AFL-CIO has endorsed the use of armed force. In so doing, American labor places its own hopes for domestic economic and social advance in severe jeopardy.

Contrary to official proclamations from Washington, the U.S. cannot have its guns and butter too. Already the Great Society programs have been slashed. That fact should be emphasized now, before anyone rushes to the defense of the Administration by ascribing those cuts to a future political consequence of Republican election successes. The cutbacks began long before last November and are mostly the result of the stepped-up war in Vietnam.

In the long run, American labor does not benefit from this situation, even if some workers in defense-oriented industries are temporarily the richer. The war boom must finally end, but it may not do so before conditions are created which deprive workers of important social programs, result in a postwar depression, or continue the military build-up to logical and totally disastrous consequences.

So, in the end, foreign policy and domestic politics are closely allied, and the AFL-CIO cannot pretend otherwise without injury to itself. From every point of view, therefore, it becomes a concrete and moral imperative for American labor to revise its assumptions about the role and goals of American labor abroad.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Wallace Stevens: Business and a Sonnet

LETTERS OF WALLACE STEVENS.
Selected and edited by Holly Stevens.
Alfred A. Knopf. 890 pp. $17.50.

A. WALTON LITZ

Mr. Litz is an associate professor of English at Princeton University. He is the author of Jane Austen (Oxford University Press), and is at present working on a critical study of Stevens.

Fame came slowly to Wallace Stevens, never completely breaking down the anonymity that he deliberately and stubbornly cultivated. In 1928, when Stevens was 49 years old, the poetry editor of a Hartford newspaper surveyed the local scene for Harriet Monroe's magazine Poetry:

No doubt you know that Robert Hillyer, Wilbert Snow and Odell Shepard live here, and that Muriel Stuart's last book was published by Mitchell's book-shop here. The Poetry Club of Hartford meets at Mitchell's and the poetry center here is really at that shop.

Miss Monroe, who had published Stevens' verse as early as 1914, added to this notice the rather acerbic remark that, in her opinion, "the poetry center of Hartford is in the residence of Wallace Stevens," but the Letters make it easy to understand how the author of Harmonium (1923) could remain virtually unknown in his home town. "Personality must be kept secret before the world," Stevens confided to his journal in 1900; and in the same journal entry he recorded his admiration for a successful Harvard graduate who "went into the shoe business & still kept an eye on sunsets & red-winged blackbirds—the summum bonum." Stevens himself, who was to become a successful lawyer and insurance executive, "kept an eye on sunsets & red-winged blackbirds." He once observed that "money is a kind of poetry," and like the hero of Robert Frost's "Two Tramps in Mud Time" he sought to unite his avocation and vocation, as the "two eyes make one in sight."

During the years since Stevens' death in 1955 his reputation has increased enormously, until today most readers of American poetry would grant him at least a place with Eliot and Frost and Pound. This dramatic increase in reputation is all the more remarkable since it was founded on the poetry alone; unlike Frost, Stevens never sought to provide us with a personality outside the poems. Even in the last years of his life, the years of lectures and public honors, Stevens remained a remote figure, but now with the publication of the Letters we are at last able to establish tentative connections between the private personality and the personality which informs the poems. From over 3,000 letters covering a period of sixty years, Stevens' daughter has selected some 800 which provide a fascinating guide to the contours of his life. Since many of the excluded letters deal with business matters or with the elaborate genealogical investigations which obsessed Stevens during the 1940s, this volume contains the heart of his correspondence. Inevitably the letters are scarcest for those periods where we most desire information: the long years between Stevens' undergraduate publications and the appearance of his first mature poetry (1900-14), and the fallow period between the first and second editions of Harmonium (1923-31). However, the editor has filled in Stevens' early career with selections from the journal he kept between 1898 and 1912, and with letters Stevens received from his father while an undergraduate at Harvard, so that in some ways the early sections of the Letters reveal the most about Stevens' inner life. With admirable restraint Holly Stevens has supplied just enough factual and biographical annotation to make for continuity and clarity.

The volume opens with four letters from Stevens to his mother, written during the vacations of 1895 and 1896. Tender and amusing, they reveal a close affinity between mother and son, as well as the first stirrings of a distinctive imagination. The last letter of the four begins with the "piping of flamboyant flutes, the wriggling of shrieking fifes with rasping dagger-voices, the sighing of bass-voils, drums that beat and rattle, the crescendo of cracked trombones"—here we have that love of sound and rhythm, that feel for the density and color of words, that would one day mark the poems of Harmonium.

In 1897 Stevens left his native Reading, Pa., for three years as a special student at Harvard. No significant letters have survived from that period, but in Stevens' journal—and obliquely in his father's letters—we can glimpse the young man who won the friendship of George Santayana. Witty and urbane, the letters of Stevens' father are the product of a powerful mind which his son may have found rather daunting:

You will see about Cambridge some nook perhaps seen by the eyes of those to whose greatness the world yielded niggardly homage then and who moved on to describe some other cloister in the words that never die. And who knows but bringing to its description your power of painting pictures in words you make it famous—and some Yankee old maid will say—it was here that Stevens stood and saw the road to distinction.

A little romance is essential to ecstasy.

Beside passages such as this, Stevens' own journal entries often seem "literary" and conventional, but occasionally they reflect that deep feeling for the composing power of nature which was to be the constant anchor of his imagination:

In the sunset to-night I tried to get the value of the various colors. The sun was dimmed by a slight mistiness which was sensitive to the faintest colors and thus gave an unusual opportunity for observation. In this delicate net was caught up first of all a pure whiteness which gradually tinted to yellow, and then to heavy orange and thick, blazing gold; this grew light again and slowly turned to pink. . . . The pink in the sky brightened into a momentary vermilion which slowly died again into rose-color edged with half-determined scarlet and purple. The rose-color faded, the purple turned into a fine, thin violet—and in a moment all the glow was gone.

My feelings to-night find vent in this phrase alone: Salut au Monde!

After a successful three years at Harvard, where he edited the Advocate and wrote a good deal of derivative verse, Stevens determined to make his way as a newspaper man in New York (perhaps under the inspiration of Stephen Crane, whose funeral he attended in June, 1900). But at this he did not succeed, and in the fall of 1901 he entered law school. In 1904 he was admitted to the bar, and after four inconclusive years as a practicing attorney he found his place as an insurance lawyer. During these years his journal provides a continuous record of his business activities and his poetry, the latter almost a subversive activity ("Engaged at the office all day on a sonnet—surreptitiously"). In 1904, during a trip to Reading, Stevens met Elsie Viola Moll, and began a correspondence which gradually supplanted the journal as a repository of his private aspirations. They were married in September, 1909, and settled in New York, where Stevens remained until 1916.

During these years, when Stevens was working steadily to establish his business career, his letters and journal entries reflect an intense if spasmodic interest in the making of poems. Shortly after their first meeting he wrote to Elsie Moll: "I should like to make a music of my own, a literature of my own, and I should like to live my own life." Presumably the urge to write was never completely submerged in these years, and we are not surprised to find Stevens writing to his wife in 1913: "I have, in fact, been trying to get together a little collection of verses again. . . . Keep all this a great secret." But there is little in the sparse letters of 1910-14 to prepare us for the poems Stevens began to submit for publication in 1914-15, and especially for "Sunday Morning," which he sent to Harriet Monroe in 1915. Perhaps the course of Stevens' artistic development will become clearer when the manuscript poems of the 1900-14 period are finally published, but it seems likely that the sudden appearance of the first Harmonium poems will always remain something of a miracle. The sensibility behind these poems is evident in the earliest letters and journal entries, but in terms of technique they represent a quantum jump over the verse Stevens was writing in 1908-09 (some of which is quoted in the Letters).

As Stevens' poetry began to appear in print his letters became more external, wider ranging but less revealing. It is as if the impulse to confide had been completely satisfied by his poetry. The letters of 1916-23 (especially those to his wife and to Harriet Monroe) are the work of a self-satisfied man who is doing exactly what he wishes to do. Stevens was interested in the world of letters, but completely independent of it. As he told Harriet Monroe, "having elected to regard poetry as a form of retreat, the judgment of people is neither here nor there." Perhaps the most significant event of this time was Stevens' introduction to Florida, which was to become for twenty-five years his vacation refuge, and whose landscape was to furnish his poetry with some of its most compelling images.

With the publication of Harmonium in 1923, and the birth of his only child in 1924, Stevens turned temporarily away from poetry and devoted most of his time for six or seven years to his career in business. He probably had this period of inactivity in mind when he wrote to Ronald Latimer in 1937:

. . . a good many years ago, when I really was a poet in the sense that I was all imagination, and so on, I deliberately gave up writing poetry because, much as I loved it, there were too many other things I wanted not to make an effort to have them.

By the early 1930s Stevens had, presumably, achieved most of these "other things"—among them the security of a large home and the vice presidency of the Hartford Accident and Indemnity Company—and he turned his mind once more to the making of poems. An augmented edition of Harmonium appeared in 1931, and from then on Stevens composed poetry at a rate which belied his double allegiance.

But in spite of this "freshening of life," the thirties were not easy years for Stevens. The pressure of the times made itself felt in his verse, and his letters reveal a new—and defensive—concern with criticism. Stevens was eager to justify his aesthetic position when confronted with the demands for a "social" literature, and in his letters we find him countering Marxist criticism by rehearsing the arguments and justifications that are dramatized in Owl's Clover and The Man with the Blue Guitar. "The real world seen by an imaginative man may very well seem like an imaginative construction," Stevens wrote to Ronald Latimer, and in The Man with the Blue Guitar he seeks to defend the "reality" of that imaginative construction. Against the demands of the time Stevens poses his belief that "life without poetry is, in effect, life without a sanction."

The 1940s, the most productive decade of Stevens' career, also brought a new vitality and range to his correspondence: over half the letters in this volume come from the last fifteen years of Stevens' life. The received image of the late Stevens—"John D. Rockefeller drenched in attar of roses"—is radically modified by these letters.

At first glance Stevens' sudden obsession with genealogy and family background may appear to be pure snobbery, and an element of snobbery is certainly there; but the genealogical investigations, and the poems which came from them, are shown by the Letters to be an essential part of Stevens' attempt to "realize the past as it was," to join the "fellowship of one's province." Similarly, Stevens' notorious political conservatism is somewhat modified by the Letters. Although he could deny in 1954 that there had ever been anything "hysterical" in McCarthyism, Stevens was not a stereotyped reactionary. Like Yeats, he tended to respond to politics in personal and aesthetic terms. Thus his refusal to be associated with the defense of Ezra Pound stemmed from his theory of the poet's social role. "While he [Pound] may have many excuses," Stevens wrote to Charles Norman, "I must say that I don't consider the fact that he is a man of genius as an excuse. Surely, such men are subject to the common disciplines."

Many of Stevens' late letters are in answer to specific inquiries about his verse, and these provide a fascinating gloss for many of the poems. In his letters to Hi Simons and later to Renato Poggioli (who was translating some of his poems into Italian), Stevens patiently answered the questions that puzzle an intelligent reader of his poems. Although they are models of sensible elucidation, these letters also reflect Stevens' ambiguous attitude toward all "explanations" which tend to translate the poem's structure of feeling into a logical argument. As early as 1918 Stevens had protested to a correspondent that "explanations spoil things"; but at the same time he knew that "explication de texte," his "principal form of piety," often depended on information he could best provide. We may be glad that, in the end, he yielded to the inquiries of a few trusted correspondents.

One of the most attractive aspects of Stevens' late letters is his interest in young poets, and his willingness to help them. Another is his deep friendship for Mr. and Mrs. Henry Church, with whom he had his fullest correspondence. Church, who was editor and co-founder of the French little magazine Mesures, had lived the life of Paris that Stevens chose to imagine, and he became for Stevens a kind of alter ego. "You have so thoroughly

HOSPITAL

*I am a man in my mind.
A splendid performance!*

*The professors of patience do not applaud.
They say: "These arrangements are temporary."*

*But I am a man in my mind.
Clap! Clap! It was a splendid performance.*

JOHN N. MORRIS

lived the life that I should have been glad to live," Stevens wrote to him in 1942. Church and Stevens became the closest of friends, and after Church's death in 1947 Mrs. Church became Stevens' principal link with the world of French art and literature.

From that world, as well as from the more exotic worlds of China and Japan and Ceylon, Stevens fed his imagination during his last years. The shipments of books and pictures from his Paris dealer, the carefully planned Christmas packages from the Orient, the letters from his Cuban and Irish and French correspondents—these enabled him to see Hartford in a new and revealing light. At the end of his life, when he could have made those trips to Europe and the East that he had so long denied himself, Stevens chose to remain at home. He had already made, in his mind and art, a more splendid voyage.

Dos Passos' Restless Times

THE BEST TIMES: An Informal Memoir. By John Dos Passos. New American Library. 229 pp. $5.

WORLD IN A GLASS: A view of our century selected from the novels of John Dos Passos. With an introductory essay by Kenneth S. Lynn. Houghton Mifflin. 440 pp. $6.95.

MOST LIKELY TO SUCCEED. By John Dos Passos. Houghton Mifflin. 310 pp. $4.95.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. By John Dos Passos. Houghton Mifflin. 446 pp. $12.50.

ROBERT SKLAR

Mr. Sklar is author of the forthcoming F. Scott Fitzgerald: The Last Laocoön (Oxford). He teaches American Studies at the University of Michigan.

In Edmund Wilson's roman à clef of the twenties, I Thought of Daisy, the character who portrays John Dos Passos is last seen embarking alone on a fruit steamer, bound for Afghanistan. "Why, yes—come along!" he cries, uneasily, to friends who want to come too—"if you wouldn't mind a few tarantulas and scorpions and things that go with the date and fig trade!" This restless, solitary wanderer emerges again from Dos Passos' memoir as if he had just now returned from Kabul. Three decades of political rhetoric wiped out: gone, the leftist line; gone, the Goldwater whine. The essential Dos Passos is a fellow traveler only with chance companions of the road.

It is good to have Dos Passos' memoir of his early years, as a counterpoint and in part an antidote, in the same season his publisher has reissued two of his novels and a book of selections from the whole. His list of works has been rearranged for the new editions to form not a chronological order as written but an order for the events they describe. The whole is called Dos Passos' Contemporary Chronicle, and he is proclaimed the author of a many-volume fictional history of our times. A shrewd effort, even as it falsifies: how else promote an unread living writer, whose fiction and reputation through a generation have leapfrogged over each other downhill?

Most Likely To Succeed and District of Columbia are the novels newly reissued in uniform binding. If they are meant to preview a complete edition of the "Contemporary Chronicle," as novels from the years of tumble, they are unlikely to whet an appetite for more. World in a Glass is something else: a condensed version of the whole, the best or at least the most representative of Dos Passos—mainly from the U.S.A. and District of Columbia trilogies and Midcentury, with bits from several others—arranged in the new manner, by date of event rather than of composition. The title comes from a brilliant essay by Jean Paul Sartre published in 1938, in which Sartre regarded Dos Passos "as the greatest living writer of our time." Then came the disastrous fall. Now The Best Times and World in a Glass refresh the memory, and if one prefers not to affirm Sartre's judgment, at least it is possible once more to understand.

Dos Passos was a restless youth: in childhood carried to and fro across the sea; later as a young man he turned the journey almost into a way of life. The Best Times were times of movement. Dos Passos recalls his travels with gusto, his literary and political past only with diffidence. Fitzgerald, Dreiser, Cummings, the Sacco-Vanzetti case appear in Dos Passos' memoir as if he had only read about them—though his stories of them probably seem second hand because he generously told them to scholars a long time ago.

The most moving story in The Best Times is Dos Passos' account of a journey through the Near East in 1921. The last leg, from Baghdad to Damascus, he traveled across the desert on camel back, the only Westerner in an Arab caravan. He leaves his watch behind, has only a smattering of words. Detached from time, detached from language, he lives only

The Sunday Ramparts

A new weekly newspaper of national significance, published by Ramparts Magazine. For free sample copy, write Ramparts, 301 Broadway, San Francisco 94133

MOVIES THAT MATTER

for school, church, community

meaningful — timely — important

For free catalogue of 16mm feature films on
ETHICS • CIVIL RIGHTS • WAR • PEACE • SOCIAL ACTION
THE GREAT SOCIETY • ACADEMIC FREEDOM • POLITICS

write for: MOVIES THAT MATTER, Dept. N

Brandon Films, Inc.

721 W. 57 St.
New York 10019

For Social Science Teaching

ANTIOCH-PUTNEY

Graduate School of Education

VARIED M.A.T. PROGRAM

- INDEPENDENT STUDY CENTERS
- INTERNSHIPS
- FIELD TRIPS
- ACADEMIC COURSES
- SEMINARS
- GRADUATE WORK
- Putney, Vt.
- Washington
- Yellow Springs, Ohio

Financial Aid Available — Write

DR. NORMAN H. WILSON
Putney, Vt. 05346

$2.95
each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N.Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER
UPON REQUEST

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to:

THE NATION

Reader's Service Division

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

with the undulating landscape, the enormous sky, the column of men and animals. He makes a note: "It's charming never to know exactly what's going on. I was never happier in my life." Arriving in Damascus, he finds awaiting him a packet of reviews on Three Soldiers. The novel is acclaimed, a bestseller. But it gives no pleasure. "This wasn't me. I was the nameless traveler who'd been sitting by the campfire with Jassem er Rawwif." He tosses the clippings into a wastebasket.

This is as close as Dos Passos comes in The Best Times to give a meaning for his incessant traveling, and one may be excused for thinking this simple polarity between nature and civilization a little sentimental. But World in a Glass provides another, and deeper, dimension. For the entire world of Dos Passos' fiction is constantly moving. None of his people sit still except the abject poor—and the motives for their motion convey the most important themes of Dos Passos' novels, the themes that thirty years ago were rightly so significant to Sartre.

The vast restlessness in Dos Passos' novels is a symptom of democratic society. Men are free; therefore they move. Movement is the badge of freedom, and its proof. Dos Passos' novels are about human freedom in our time. Neither bound in body nor in mind, men dream, hope, aspire. What is, no longer suffices: present time, present place, present people, cannot satisfy. They yearn for something better, at least for something different. This is the root of the immense longing that Dos Passos' people feel, a longing toward which Dos Passos creates for his readers so poignant a sense of pathos and understanding.

For his characters are free to run away, and free to run toward, yet never free to stop and stay for long. When Dos Passos' characters arrive at a place it rarely turns out as well as promised, and the old places in retrospect hardly ever seem as bad as they once did. His people are forever leaving at the wrong time, just before important events, and arriving elsewhere just too late. Thus his characters live emotionally in waves, hope turning to despair and suddenly renewing; sourness giving way to pleasure and good feeling; then again sour. Moving on, stopping, and moving on once more; no rest until death.

Freedom is a blessing and a curse, a curse of everlasting desires unfulfilled, dreams of a future that can never match the dream. Dos Passos' novels convey endless pathos without tragedy, eternal yearning without catharsis. He could not conceive a life or a society sufficient to itself; he only became, after U.S.A., increasingly unsympathetic to his restless characters, less and less capable of rendering his story as art. The only possibly satisfying answer stemmed from his experience in the desert: living in the pure present, neither running away nor running toward, but simply moving, without thought. Movement in itself and for itself might provide a controlling form.

Still, whatever the ultimate insufficiency, in three novels—the U.S.A. trilogy—Dos Passos created a world as had no other 20th-century novelist, a vast and complex place where average people lived ordinary lives, an image in art of modern society. Though it seems only a mirror reflecting the real world, in truth it is a new world, strange and distant, a world of art. "In capitalist society," Sartre wrote, "men do not have lives, they have only destinies. [Dos Passos] never says this, but he makes it felt throughout. He expresses it discreetly, cautiously, until we feel like smashing our destinies. We have become rebels; he has achieved his purpose."

And yet, as Sartre insists, Dos Passos impels the reader to rebel only against the world in the glass, not against his own world. The reader protests against the destinies of Dos Passos' characters, but can find no way to protest against his own. This is a major source of the pathos he makes his readers feel—the recognition that they are as frustrated in freedom as are Dos Passos' characters, that they too are trapped within their destinies, powerless to do anything about it. This does not detract from Dos Passos' achievement as an artist, but it suggests why he was unable to accomplish social objectives through his art, why after U.S.A. he turned from fiction toward history.

One way to evaluate Dos Passos for a new generation of readers is to compare him with the young novelist Thomas Pynchon, whose fiction resembles Dos Passos' in curious and instructive ways. Pynchon's V. is surprisingly similar to U.S.A. in the breadth of its ambition, in its diversity of styles, above all in the restlessness and unfulfilled longing of Pynchon's characters. Moreover, Pynchon has made the image of a world in a glass—a mirror world, a world beneath the surface world, a world sub rosa—his central theme. In U.S.A., Dos Passos created a more accomplished work of art than either of Pynchon's novels so far. Yet Pynchon displays an intricate intelligence unlike anything in Dos Passos. The fate of Pynchon's characters may not touch the reader, but his vision of a mirror world, a secret world, is deeply moving.

In the end, for all the apparent political commitment in his fiction, Dos Passos has wanted most of all to be a free and separate self; and his freedom has been as inconclusive as that of all his characters. The excerpts from his fiction in World in a Glass provide no view of the century more unified than the reiterated similarity of individual destinies. Pynchon's world in a glass represents instead a social gesture; whatever its lasting value, it opens up for the reader new possibilities for society—a visionary world's challenge to the world in which we live. It comes down, at last, to the nature of the vision. For Dos Passos, the individual; for Pynchon, society—a distinction which separates one novelist from the other, and may also prove the dividing point between the last great generation of artists and seers and the one that may now be emerging.

The Infection of the World

THE DECLINE OF THE WEST. By David Caute. The Macmillan Company. 616 pp. $7.95.

SOL YURICK

Mr. Yurick is the author of the novels, The Warriors (Holt, Rinehart & Winston) and Fertig (Trident Press).

In an effort to preserve economic and moral interests in a conquered world, men are sent to war. In the process, atrocities are committed and expediency is rationalized by the erection of ideologies whose slogans always include words like culture, freedom, dignity. Individual lives are wrecked: people are tortured physically, or internally by the contradiction between ideal sentiment and what is practice in the world. The administrators of colonialism seem blinded to what they do; probably they commit the most barbarous acts with relish. There is no tragedy or pathos in their behavior: literature has rarely studied them long enough to invent abstract, high-sounding categories. At best, psychology settles for the term "sickness," which would put a Hitler into therapy. The tragedy lies in the fate of the man of good will who is caught up in these currents and who is unable to bring himself to act decisively (for "liberalism" is a political tragic flaw). The hope for a humanistic act of faith, in terms of commitment in the world, is what David Caute's new novel is about. It is a hopeful book and an impressive achievement.

Poets, writers, historians of the grand fictions, have always chosen certain times in history which they have designated as seminal—frozen moments which are decisive, turning points in history. For one generation it was the French Revolution, for another the Russian, for still another it was the Spanish Civil War; today it is Lyndon Johnson's Vietnamese temper tantrum.

For Caute it is the events leading to the birth of the Congo as an independent state. Caute calls his country Coppernica (named for vast copper deposits). What he means is a Copernican revolution, symbolic of a change in Western fortunes; two old worlds, in dialectic confrontation, synthesizing a third world. The original revolution displaced man from the center of the universe; Caute's revolution displaces Western man from the center of the moral universe. His novel may shock some readers (where is the old fiction gone; why are the new writers so morbid; what personal fantasies are they working out?) who will prefer to mistake a way of life for a catalogue of aberrations rather than truth.

To sum up the plot is difficult in short space. An African leader arises, Coppernica makes its way to freedom, forces of the West seek to preserve their investments. The revolution is dethroned and, as in the Congo, a leader more amenable to doing business in the old way replaces the revolutionary leaders: the counterrevolution stages atrocities on the colons . . . nuns are raped, babies spitted, bureaucrats disemboweled, but the blame is placed on the revolutionary "savages." Mercenaries, hunting down the liberation leaders, range the landscape killing and torturing in the name of a grandiose ideology whose justification is Spengler's great historical fiction.

From this, it begins to be easier to understand Frantz Fanon's fiery, cleansing appeal to destroy the colonizers and the native collaborators with their West-programmed hearts: that great hunger for a fiery simplification. Finally, one man, James Caffrey, a kind of alienated liberal who dreams of action, but can, at first, only admire activism in a book (Malraux's Man's Fate), a sort of intellectual Mersault, brings himself to act and kill the leader of the ultras, Laval. He joins the revolution not of mere black against white—primitive against civilized—but the revolution of the humanists against the enslavers. This is too simple a summation. There are many characters, many scenes, flashing back and forth across time and space.

Caute's method is that of ideational allusion in the midst of action. Wisely, he understands the plenitude of motives that goes into decision making. He acknowledges many masters without being imitative or pointlessly eclectic. Every great political, moral and artistic event of the past generation is evoked and shown transformed in relation to this struggle. Characters in their immediate situations echo great catch phrases; a total reassessment is aimed for. And we learn how the need to preserve the best of Western culture can be used as rationalization for the protection of investments. The Bible, the divine right of taste, the primacy of personal urges, Carlylean evolution, Proust, Yeats provide touchstones. These become lenses through which to view the fight to determine which forces will rule Coppernica. In the hands of the inhumane, the humanities become another form of equity: "everything is permitted." Mercenaries bomb villages and torture resistance leaders, while quoting Spengler. People's views of themselves constantly change and become a sort of working truth. British investment is condoned by a taste for Renoirs: American pragmatism becomes an expression of density to human sensibility. Good will, pushed to the wall of dividend-loss, fails.

Possibly the best scenes, those expressive of the multiple layers Caute is working, are shown in terms of torture and perversion. These are horribly informative metaphors . . . more real than the reportage he quotes. The body is reduced to produce a fact. The tortured becomes subhuman and the torturer becomes superhuman, but neither remains a man. The mercenaries march through the jungle seeking out the revolutionaries, but in reality hunting for their lost destiny, the destiny of the West. The Decline of the West is a novel of ideas, but more important, it is also a work with dramatic thrust: political aphorisms in Caute's hand achieve the dignity of poetry. It is at times a brilliant performance.

There are weaknesses. The central drive of the novel is frequently vitiated by mere psychology. Caute is weak about Americans, both black and white. Carrying indecision as a literary strategy too far, Jason Powell is dissolved and becomes ridiculous. The force of the demoniac in civilization is dissipated by flash-back psychology. This is not to say that men do not have biographies, but the analytical approach is deformed by excessive rationality. It doesn't take account of the social forces; filtered through biography all seems mere personal sickness.

In this way we come to see Laval—at first as dedicated as any Aztec priest and as primeval—explained as a man whose behavior becomes a sum total of the frustrations of youth. Here Caute did not learn his lesson from Proust well enough. We end up feeling a little sorry for a man like Laval, understanding him, when it is dangerous and soft to do so. Then too, as a technique, biography tends to dissipate the dramatic drive of the novel. But these are minor faults in an ambitious, engrossing, all-encompassing work.

Since this book is addressed to men of good and weak will (the oppressed do not read books, nor do their oppressors), it would seem that Caute has an indoctrinating duty. This is not to say that he should write propaganda; he would thereby lose his audience and create bad art and worse truth. But it is the gripping terror of the word, the scene, the actors, their acts, standing as dramatic facts, that must convince, telling all. Fiction can convince: sociology and history do not seem to. Fiction can place one as participant and sufferer in this horror—the deliberate killing of nations of people. Tallies of facts do not involve the reader; they even lull, convincing us that this is the way things are. How many people these days have not tired of hearing about the 6 million—what has it to do with them?

And how are we to be convinced that out of the torture of Africans, out of their crucifixions, a new consciousness, a new moral center, should arise? Short of being tortured ourselves, the involvement fiction offers can do that magician's trick. To be sure, individual schizophrenia mirrors the multiple and contradictory splits of the world, but the burden of the infection is on the world, not on the individual. The cure lies in political involvement, not on an analyst's couch. Rage should mount, not be assuaged by the technique of calling it sickness.

This book has to be read; it is that exciting and important.

Body Testing the Slogans

SAY THAT WE SAW SPAIN DIE: Literary Consequences of the Spanish Civil War. By John M. Muste. University of Washington Press. 208 pp. $5.95.

ALLEN GUTTMANN

Mr. Guttman, author of The Wound in the Heart: America and the Spanish Civil War (Free Press), teaches at Amherst College and is a public affairs editor for The Massachusetts Review.

From the siege of Troy to the present day, important historical events have had important literary consequences, but most of the poems and novels written in response to these events have been, like most other poems and novels, trivial. Critical assessments of the literary merit of works concerned with the Jacobite rebellion or the French Revolution or the Great Depression are, generally, a waste of time. Diligence discovers that semiliterate stanzas, dissected with the fine instruments of textual analysis, are inferior in value to War and Peace. Although historical events cannot be fully understood without a comprehension of their artistic consequences, the events themselves should not be a principle of organization for literary studies. Anyone who has felt, however remotely, the tragedy of the Spanish Civil War, is likely to respond with irritation and ennui to the subtitle of John Muste's book. Are we to learn again that Barker's poems are more intricate than Cornford's?

Annoyed prejudgments are premature. The book is limited, unsatisfactory, intensely moral in its concerns, but quite indispensable. Too sensitive to be satisfied with frisky comments on miscellaneous books with the same ostensible subject, Muste sets forth a thesis that demands attention. He sees the Spanish war as an empirical test of the Marxism that many American and more British writers adopted in the 1930s when the political and economic collapse of liberal democratic society, and the rise of fascism in Europe, shattered whatever complacency had survived World War I.

Marxism, argues Muste, failed the test. "The writers who went to Spain found out that war and revolution are destructive, that even Marxists are often inefficient bureaucrats, and that history does not always move in expected directions. The pressure of the new knowledge was too much for most of these writers to withstand." Why? Because no ideology can justify the horrors of war. The writers whom Muste most admires are those who abandoned their faith in socialism or communism even as they earned their red badge of courage. Men shivered in pools of mud and excrement, scratched the lice that afflict every army, and discovered, as Hemingway's Frederic Henry had discovered in A Farewell to Arms, that all the slogans are lies.

For Alvah Bessie's post-Spanish Civil War novel in defense of communism, The Un-Americans (1957), Muste expresses contempt, but he exempts from scorn the "painstaking honesty" of Bessie's memoir of Spain, because he sees the book as an inadvertent rejection of ideology: "Whatever [Alvah] Bessie's later experience may have been, it does not change Men in Battle, which remains a book demonstrating vividly the way in which prolonged exposure to violence can turn idealism into ashes, and which shows that when no sacrifice will suffice, any slogan or dogma is irrelevant."

Similarly, Edwin Rolfe's fine poem about Madrid, "City of Anguish," is praiseworthy because "the dogma is far less memorable than the experience of destruction." Novels and autobiographies by Marxists—e.g., Upton Sinclair's No Pasarán!—are violently condemned as "dull," "flat," "foolish," "lifeless," "ludicrous," "bombastic" and "melodramatic." Hemingway's propagandistic play, The Fifth Column, is properly denounced, but Muste writes that For Whom the Bell Tolls deserves extended analysis "because it demonstrates so clearly the dilemma of writers who continued to believe in the Loyalist cause, but who had seen and understood too much to be capable of . . . easy sophistries. . . ." The extended analysis is nearly devoid of comment on the structure and the techniques by which Hemingway articulated his vision of the Spanish war. The emphasis on Robert Jordan's overt politics misses the metaphorical affirmation of the Spanish earth and the peasants who tilled it.

George Orwell's Homage to Catalonia is, of course, the touchstone, the article of apolitical faith. In this book that finds skepticism the proper moral stance, Orwell is credited with "having seen, toward the end of his life, that modern societies tend toward regimentation whether their official ideology be Fascist, Socialist, Democratic or Communist. . . ." Muste himself is a less skillful Orwell. Perhaps a better formulation is to say that he, while not openly insistent upon pacifism, has clearly followed in the footsteps of his father, one of the founders of The Fellowship of Reconciliation.

Like most polemicists, Muste excludes as well as includes relevant data. He generally ignores popular literature which was not Marxist (and some that was), and he does next to nothing with the literature of the Right. Wyndham Lewis' Revenge for Love is a serious omission. Anne Fremantle's By Grace of Love is another. The single criterion by which he measures all men has other obvious disadvantages—a tendency to shrillness is one of them. A more serious problem derives from the social bias inherent in the selection. If Marxism appears inadequate, and in the writers discussed it does, the reason might well have more to do with the writers than with Marxism. No American or British writer of the first rank has ever been a committed Marxist, but French and German and Spanish writers have been. André Malraux's L'Espoir, the best novel of the Spanish war, is mentioned, but Muste does not really consider the possibility that Malraux and Pablo Neruda and Ludwig Renn succeeded where Stephen Spender and William Rollins failed, because the former were more, rather than less, committed to a Socialist analysis which was, itself, more applicable to Spanish than to American or British society. After all, Orwell went to Spain a Socialist and returned one, and Alvah Bessie, whom Muste praises for Men in Battle, was and is a Marxist.

PARAMOUNT PICTURES presents HARRY SALTZMAN Production

MICHAEL CAINE™

Funeral in Berlin

TECHNICOLOR PANAVISION® PARAMOUNT PICTURE

NOW PLAYING!

FORUM 47th St. / GUILD 50th / Loew's TOWER EAST
& Bway PL 7-8320-1 33 W. 50th St. PL 7-2406-7 72nd St. & 3rd Ave. TR 9-1313

Because any appreciation of Marxism is likely these days to bring accusatory letters, I should add that I am not a Marxist. But I am sure that democratic socialism's model of historical analysis is more appropriate to the war than is Muste's implicit pacifism. To insist that war is horrible, and that ideological wars are the most horrible, is part of the truth, but all ideals are not morally equal, and all forms of social organization are not equally just. In an outrageously ignorant reference to the Weimar Republic, Muste seems to suggest that the Social Democrats were right not to take to the streets against Hitler, but I am not yet ready to think that the highest wisdom consists in the discovery that "politics (whatever ideals are being served) is an activity that involves intrigue, betrayal, and the multitude of confusions and compromises which are involved in making it the 'art of the possible.'" The Spanish Republic was less democratic than many of its supporters admitted, but the Republic was, as Orwell insisted, better than the Movimiento Nacional of the insurgent generals. Embarrassed as I am to praise heroism in the safety of my study, I still believe that the difference was worth the blood of men brave enough to die in mud, in rubble, in excrement, in defense of their Republic. The hopeless disillusion that Muste takes to be the most significant literary consequence of any war is, in large part, his own generous, understandable dismay, at what is probably the inevitable cost of a somewhat better world.

this passage from the seventh book before starting on the first—still one can also use it to recall the Wordsworthian child who is "father of the man." A breath of wind, a smell, a patch of sunlight on the carpet, a few bars of music may suddenly activate some memory from childhood; and then we appear to be invaded by something incredibly fresh and a lot nearer to the universe than we are.

Of course, a child has to grow up, to be (as it were) reborn in adolescence, and so on: but such memories ought to tell us how difficult and delicate the task of growing up is, how little it ought to be tampered with, and how much it needs to be understood. Readers of Lytton Strachey's Eminent Victorians need not be reminded of Dr. Arnold's prayer that his "sense of moral evil" might never leave him, and how there were moments when "he began to doubt whether some far more radical reforms than any he had attempted might not be necessary before the multitude of children under his charge—shouting and gamboling, and yet plunged all the while deep in moral evil—could ever be transformed into a set of Christian gentlemen." Strachey intended this sentence to be wildly funny, and so it is; but it shows that Strachey's Arnold (who may not have been the real one) was afflicted with the antinomian delusion—common in his time and not too rare in ours—that there was no moral law for childhood qua childhood, because the child was nothing more than an inferior adult.

It is, in short, always necessary to know what childhood is and not to worry too much about what it ought to be; and this is the paramount necessity to which Frances Wickes addresses her book. She tells us what it is like to be a child; she does not lay down—she carefully refrains from laying down—any rules for child guidance. Her own psychological guidelines (she is a well-known analyst) are explicitly Jungian. The reader will be asked to accept the collective unconscious and the archetypal image as working concepts; also the two "types" of extraversion and introversion; also the four "functions" of thinking, feeling, sensation and intuition. He must expect to be confronted with the numinous and the mysterious—with what used to be loosely described as Jungian mysticism—and he will be asked to distinguish between the "great dream," which belongs to the small dreamer and must not be touched, and the dream which speaks, however ambiguously, to a conflict that requires attention. As a layman, I find the Jungian system persuasive insofar as I understand it; but there are those who do not think so at all: and

The Gift of Grace

THE INNER WORLD OF CHILDHOOD: A Study in Analytical Psychology. By Frances G. Wickes. Introduction by Carl G. Jung. Appleton-Century. 342 pp. $6.95.

GEORGE DANGERFIELD

Mr. Dangerfield is the author, most recently, of The Awakening of American Nationalism, 1815-1828 (Harper and Row). His other books include Chancellor Robert R. Livingston of New York and The Era of Good Feelings (both Harcourt, Brace).

A new edition of Frances G. Wickes's masterpiece, The Inner World of Childhood, first published in 1927, is a welcome and timely event. The fact that most if not all the children whom Mrs. Wickes examines here, with such rare and delectable wisdom, were children from comfortable middle-class 1920 homes, children who went to private schools, and who had the good luck to find in the author an expert who could spend long hours unraveling their difficulties, does not diminish—it merely intensifies—one's belief that the inner world of childhood is something which all children inhabit. You cannot, indeed you dare not, say that there is one inner world for children of one class or color, and another inner world for children of another.

In other words, what Frances Wickes has posited, it seems to me, is a constant psychology for children, one that is always and everywhere governed, as to its well-being, by "a sense of security in the fundamental relationships of life," and always and everywhere ravaged if this sense of security is absent. I stress "fundamental" here, because it seems to be antithetical to "contemporary," in the sense that every child is born with certain rights which, in the course of growing up, he must adjust to the transient and possibly treacherous world in which he finds himself.

I recently gave a talk on Anthony Trollope, a novelist whom I admire; and in the course of giving this talk, it rather forcibly occurred to me that if we were able to meet those mid-Victorian men and women we should certainly think them all faintly mad: and vice versa. Between them and us there would lie such a complicated web of changed and changing social, political, economic and moral relations as to make rational discourse very nearly impossible. With a mid-Victorian child, on the other hand, we might be able to establish a reasonable dialogue, because he would probably not think us much stranger than any other casual acquaintance from his own milieu. Childhood is relatively timeless, insofar as it is a little closer to biological time than we adults are; and, conversely, because it is not yet adjusted to the frantic speed of historical time. Thus a child can be called "the father of the man" for three different reasons: because he is not yet modern; because what happens to him may powerfully affect his whole later life; and because (this was presumably Wordsworth's meaning in his great "Ode") he has a certain acute perceptiveness which is lost to us and which we can only recall through memory. In the last book of Proust's Remembrance of Things Past there is a beautiful passage about the interplay between sensation and memory; and while Proust used this to explicate once and for all his theory of art—so much so that a beginner ought to read to them I would recommend the words of Dr. Henry N. Murray (no Jungian, I believe) who, in an introduction to Mrs. Wickes's The Inner World of Choice (1963) wrote: "She was in such close contact with the multifarious trends and turns of a child's fabulous imaginations that the discernment of their meanings seemed to come to her as a gift of grace."

This gift of grace, working with a humane, penetrating, loving, unsentimental intelligence, distinguishes The Inner World of Childhood, for me, from any other book on the subject that I have read: but here there is only space to mention one way in which it seems to talk directly to one of our great dilemmas. Obviously, the first and most fundamental relationship of a child is with his parents: this is so obvious that it was once a truism; but it is a truism no longer. Frances Wickes is careful to point out that you cannot psychoanalyze a disturbed child; you can only use his dreams and fantasies (when he becomes confident enough to disclose them) as a means of talking things out with him. Usually, as she points out in case after case, the child's disorientations can be traced to the unconscience of the parents or of one parent. Parents in any walk of life are bound to have psychological difficulties, often appalling ones: but it is by now a well-established fact that the lower the economic and social condition, the more mental disturbance there is in the adult world. Thus the child in one of our ghettos, where the parents are degraded and distorted by a society which denies them any means of escape, must be a very rare child if he is not degraded and distorted too.

When I finished reading The Inner World of Childhood, I began to think of those living graveyards in our great cities, and of those children who are condemned to be Gray's "mute inglorious Miltons" in the radical sense that they are denied the chance to express themselves naturally, because their families are broken, their schools insufficient, their neighborhoods filled with dereliction and abomination, and the law itself their enemy. Even the most generous mental-health facilities for parents could not really help until these conditions are radically changed. And it seemed to me that it was time to junk such vulgar solecisms as "The Great Society," and to begin to think about the Good one. Demanding for all children "a sense of security in the fundamental relationships of life," The Inner World of Childhood seems to me, not only a profoundly wise and creative book in its revelations and interpretations of childhood but also a revolutionary one. I do not presume to suggest that this was the author's intention. But there it is.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

It would be easy to list the faults of Cecil Dawkins' The Displaced Person (American Place Theatre, 423 West 46 Street). Since it is an adaptation of three Flannery O'Connor stories, and with a trace of a fourth, the play lacks dramatic propulsion. Though the interweaving of the various threads is ably done, the tempo of progression is too even: there is insufficient differentiation of accent.

While not without humor, the general grimness of the stories produces the effect of "exaggeration" resembling certain types of Russian naturalism. . . .

I shall not continue in this vein because, despite these and other shortcomings, I found myself more interested in Mr. Dawkins' play than in most of the other serious offerings of the season. (This is journalistic double talk, since the only other play of the season of which I might say the same is A Delicate Balance.) I was interested, which is more to the point than saying that I liked it.

As I left the theatre I questioned myself as to the source of my interest, for had I not also been worried by a certain flatness in the proceedings? What absorbed me throughout was a confrontation with life, unfamiliar, strange (the play takes place in south Georgia), yet nonetheless significant beyond the details of its environment. It may sound a little "innocent" to say that a play conveys the look and feel of life, since all plays present some aspect of life; and what in this context does one mean by "life"?

In recent years respected plays have tended more and more toward abstraction. Realism had become boring. It had deteriorated into "journalism": it did not say enough, merely presented facts, and facts by themselves are dumb. They put out one's eyes. We demand insight and personal statement. We seek a view of life, something which suggests an essence, a core of meaning even if this leads, as so often of late, to a conclusion of meaninglessness. The new drama, we are convinced, brings us closer to the truth. It recalls the great classic tradition.

The reason for this reversion to the older style is due not only to the increasing triviality of the naturalistic theatre—with its appeal to a prosperous middle-class sodden with property and creature comforts—but to our mounting awareness of crisis. We are on the verge of Armageddon and await an apocalypse. Anything less basic (at least in art) strikes us as deceptive. Literature committed to the study of life as we find it and live it seems paltry, wide of the mark.

Still we are in and of this world, and though we may diagnose our condition as chronically wretched, there is something weak and flabby about our constant attempts to achieve the summits of ultimate knowledge. This groping for divinity bespeaks impotence rather than courage.

There is a brilliantly humorous scene in The Displaced Person—straight out of Flannery O'Connor's story "The Enduring Chill"—in which an obtuse country

CROWNS AND GARLANDS

Make a garland of Leontynes and Lenas
And hang it about your neck

Like ■ lei.

Make a crown of Sammys, Sidneys, Harrys,
Plus Cassius Mohammed Ali Clay.

Put their laurels on your brow

Today—

Then before you can walk
To the neighborhood corner,
Watch them droop, wilt, fade

Away.

Though worn in glory on my head,
They do not last a day—

Not one—

Nor take the place of meat or bread
Or rent that I must pay.

Great names for crowns and garlands!

Yeah!

I love Ralph Bunche—

But I can't eat him for lunch.

LANGSTON HUGHES

priest is invited to advise and console a sickly youth who wants to speak to an understanding person about his despair. The suffering boy tries to get to the heart of the things that distress him, but the priest simply counters with the injunction that he learn his catechism. Maddened by the priest's obliviousness, the boy shouts "I'm dying," to which the priest retorts sharply, "But you're not dead yet!"

The boy is ill and despondent because he hates the world into which he was born (the most backward South) and hasn't the talent to create something with and through it. The priest is a dolt. Yet he speaks true. We are like the ailing boy. We are all dying but since we aren't dead yet we ought to look about us and see things by our own lights, and not wholly in the light of eternity.

Each of the episodes in The Displaced Person contains, in what on the surface appears to be an impassive naturalism, a larger truth. The play's lack of "lyricism" is in fact a kind of classic severity. The abject submissiveness of the Negro farm hands is seen as both ignorant shiftlessness and an evasion of the white man's blind cruelty, a retreat into a realm the oppressor cannot enter, a profound contempt, comic and obdurate. It is an impasse in which both black and white are rendered stupid to the point of savagery.

The poor white's isolation in self-protective prejudice abetted by an empty religiosity is the alleviation of his cramped estate which becomes murderous. The crippled girl whose intellectual training has turned her to nothing better than a futile nihilism because she is deprived of any warm human contact, her momentary relief in tenderness when she is able to acknowledge the brute fact of her deformity and have it accepted through a gesture of love, the general insecurity of all concerned who destroy the "displaced person"—a Polish farm hand brought into the community by the priesthood more out of guile than from compassion—all these are depicted without adornment or apology, one might even say "coldly," and yet with an understanding which extends beyond their bare recital. Flannery O'Connor was a greatly gifted artist and Cecil Dawkins has done honorable service in bringing the O'Connor material directly to the stage.

I cannot make any assured statement about the production, partly because the problem of communicating the quality of the play, an amalgam of moods and methods, is an extremely difficult one requiring much more rehearsal time than our theatre economy permits. The balance between the need to maintain the tone of dispassionate statement and the no less necessary demand to convey the

FREE!

With every new subscription to

THE NATION

The FBI Nobody Knows

by Fred J. Cook. 414 pp. Pyramid Books.

A portion of this important book first appeared in The Nation (October 18, 1958), as a special feature and attracted nationwide attention and the highest praise. Now it has been rewritten and enlarged with much new material.

"... an effective and powerful document. . . ."

—Mark DeWolfe Howe, New York Review of Books

"Fred Cook must be credited with as courageous as well as an illuminating book. Let those who dispute his charges refute them if they can."

—Alan Barth, New York Herald Tribune

"A devastating case against the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its veteran director, J. Edgar Hoover."

—San Francisco Chronicle

"J. Edgar Hoover won't like this book . . . well-documented . . . likely to cause plenty of furor."

—Publisher's Weekly

THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS has the unique distinction of being the central point in the plot of Rex Stout's latest Nero Wolfe who-dun-it, THE DOORBELL RANG.

For your FREE copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION

333 6th Avenue

New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS.

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP No.

1-16-67

living nerve, which is the creative root of the play, may not have been absolutely struck. It is clear, however, that the director, Edward Parone, understood the challenge. He is to be commended for having chosen a good cast—Frances Sternhagen, David Clarke, Bette Henritze, Dixie Marquis, Robert Earl Jones, Woodie King, James Hall, to name only those who play the main roles. He has directed them so that the play as a whole remains coherent and well defined. Kert Lundell, here as in Hogan's Goat, proves himself remarkably adept at giving the peculiar spatial accommodations of the former St. Clement's Church, the seat of the American Place Theatre, a semblance of stage reality.

Frank Gagliano, whose one-act play Conerico Was Here To Stay was presented by Richard Barr, Clinton Wilder and Edward Albee at the Cherry Lane Theatre in 1965, is one of the more promising of our younger dramatists. Gagliano's central preoccupation appears to be the indifference and irresponsibility in the face of evil as it manifests itself among us today.

The same producers at the same theatre now offer Gagliano's Night of the Dunces. One cannot tell in this instance whether Gagliano is fulfilling his promise because Night of the Dunces, though repeatedly revised, was written five years ago. The plot deals with a gang of youngsters ("Dunces") whose aim is destruction for its own hellish sake. The difference between this and the previously presented play is that in Night of the Dunces a group of citizens led by a widowed librarian, whose ill-attended establishment located in an apparently desolate area of the city the Dunces plan to wreck, fight to protect it. This makes the library something of a symbol. One is reminded of certain plays of the thirties except that Gagliano's emphasis is less "social" and rather more "Kafkaesque."

PERSONALS

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington, D. C. 20036.

RECORDS ANALYST, experienced, will organize files, classify, index/abstract. Took university courses in records management, systems analysis, information retrieval, besides MS Librarianship. New York City only. Box 599, c/o The Nation.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Despite overtones of contemporary terror, the play remains a naive melodrama. As such it is not without effective moments. It is well acted by Terry Kiser, Salem Ludwig, Anne Revere and all the others; it is ably directed by Joseph Hardy and, with limited means, admirably designed by William Ritman.

Seeing Night of the Dunces and then The Displaced Person brought to my attention once more how many talented people of no particular "fame" our theatre could use to immense advantage if it were not so disastrously hobbled. As for Gagliano himself, I look forward to his further work, now that he is advancing in experience and has been awarded a Rockefeller grant.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Horriification is a delicate theatrical operation; overcook it ever so little and it curdles into slapstick. That is the accident that occurred to Night Games, Mai Zetterling's study of impotence caused by injudicious mother love.

The picture runs on two time tracks. In the present, a perplexed young man brings his sweetheart home to his family's country estate, to test whether on this ground he can exorcise the childhood experiences that prevent him from consummating their love. These, we learn from a portfolio of flashbacks that constitute the second track, stemmed from the circumstances that his mother chose to surround herself with exceedingly bizarre companions and that she was driven by a sexual urgency that directed itself even to her son. The boy watches as his mother gives birth, surrounded by a group of revelers who look like a provincial road company specializing in witches' sabbaths. He wanders through scenes of drunkenness and outré lechery. He crawls under his mother's diaphanous hoop skirt while she is embracing her current favorite. In the scene which is, presumably, causing all the fevered whispering, she deliberately arouses the boy and then, in guilt, turns her scorn on him. When word arrives of her death by motor accident, the boy takes to his mother's bed, where he is joined by a wench and an obese homosexual, both intent on his inheritance. The boy's only ally in this erotic circus is a dotty old aunt, adept at cutting paper dolls and painting caricatures on eggs (which the boy derives some satisfaction from smashing). She also acts as chorus, observing that the atmosphere of the house is unsuitable for an impressionable child.

When the engaged couple returns to this scene of fancy-dress corruption, the house seems deserted; but, as if on cue, the old troupe reappears and resumes its perverse entertainments (blue home movies are introduced). Thus harassed by memory and once more in his mother's bed, the young man finds himself still incapable, and begins to fling himself about like Hamlet in love. But the girl is no Ophelia; at her sensible urging, he orders the parasites to break camp and, to make sure that they do, brings in a crew of dynamiters who blow the house into flaming rubble. This works like an Oriental potion: as the credits come across the screen, the couple is cavorting in a snowy field with every prospect of happy union.

The trouble with all this is its simple, humorless excess. Like many Scandinavians today, Miss Zetterling is awestruck by sex. She is here so intent on enlisting our indignation at its misuse that she shovels Krafft-Ebing with a pitchfork. Thus, instead of provoking gasps of horror, her stagy tableaux and italicized symbols induce ironic laughter. It doesn't take that much machinery to produce a sexual neurotic.

The proposition, widely touted, that the French-Italian Galia is a naughty and delicious comedy will not stand the test of seeing the picture. It opens to scenes of rolling surf—always an ominous sign in "art" films—and it is wanly dispirited throughout. It is only factually sexy (there is no zest to it) and the melodramatic triangle plot—vulgar Lothario, wronged wife, pert young fixer who gets herself hooked—is as mechanized as a switching yard. It is one of those plots so crowded with incident and so empty of content that you crack your knuckles to have it done with.

As for Mireille Darc, the "discovery," she is a twiggly girl with large breasts, many freckles, heavy lips and quite expressionless eyes. She wears pants and sweaters to advantage and moves like a boy—assets that are ruthlessly exploited. She might do very well as wry spice to a film, but she cannot carry the show on her two moods of bachelor-girl competence and bruised infatuation. The assumption of the film is that she has slept with half the men who hang out at the Select, which suggests a taste among the habitués of that movie set for immature companionship.

This, by the way, is the third picture in a row to offer me the hitherto forbidden (except in Scandinavia) sight of the naked female torso. It is undeniably pleasant, but I hope the impulse to semi-disclosure will not degenerate into an anatomical cliché.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1184

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 It might be called perfect to toss paper clips at it. (4, 10)
- 9 Not likely to cause good feeling. (7)
- 10 Classic villain who might be akin to a hobo to us. (7)
- 11 and 14 Vampire's line might imply we're tied in exemplary fashion. (4, 2, 3, 3, 1)
- 12 It cheers the sort that might have been once burned. (8)
- 14 See 11 across
- 15 The part of the line that suggests you have a fish hooked? (5)
- 17 What cattle might do to suggest a certain elegy? (5)
- 19 and 27 Might Annie imply the old pump is owned by Warbucks? (2, 5, 7, 2, 5)
- 21 Marion, suggesting shallow water craft? (5, 3)
- 23 Slipped on the ice. (6)
- 25 If the show is getting out, his act would be one to follow. (7)
- 26 One might also deal with Daisy's boyfriend, for example. (7)
- 27 See 19 across

DOWN:

- 1 Clay stamping-ground — sometimes found along with popcorn and nuts. (5, 4)
- 2 Argentine products might be. (7)
- 3 Not so wild get-up in spotless surroundings, but green. (9)

- 4 What youngsters might chew on in the State Department? (4)
- 5 Correct the conservative position? (2, 3, 5)
- 6 Rather silly in an expression's beginning. (5)
- 7 In front and at the side of a bird? (7)
- 8 Very dangerous types, unless they're quakers. (4)
- 13 Doesn't stand out in smog, up in this mixture. (10)
- 15 Might it be a club for the writer? (5, 4)
- 16 Proving there's a field for stuffy businessmen. (9)
- 18 How a yardstick might be used, generally speaking. (2, 1, 4)
- 20 Any summer probably did. (7)
- 21 So honest, but homeless in London. (4)
- 22 The player's first part provides the margin in an Italian flower. (5)
- 24 Taunt, but not with holding it. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1183

ACROSS: 1 Scarlet tanager; 8 Visiting team; 10 Nucleonics; 11 Omar; 13 Swarms; 14 Reynolds; 16 Nainsook; 17 Chromo; 19 Long; 20 Pasteboard; 22 Distillation; 23 American cheese. DOWN: 1 and 2 Savings and loan associations; 3 Lattermost; 4 Tuning; 5 Attacked; 6 Adam; 7 Correspondence; 9 Ameliorative; 12 On the Beach; 15 Romantic; 18 Stolen; 21 Tier.

PUBLICATIONS

For latest developments in CHINA'S CULTURAL REVOLUTION subscribe now to PEKING REVIEW (in English) aimed weekly $4. Also China Pictorial, China Reconstructs, and Chinese Literature @ $3 each seasmall. Write for our free catalog of 700 imported publications in English from China. CHINA BOOKS & PERIODICALS, 2929 24 St., San Francisco, California 94110.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

DOES UNCLE SAM WANT YOU? Escape from "Freedom," a new pamphlet explains Canadian immigration procedures. Send 50c plus handling to SUPA Anti-draft Program, 658 Spadina Avenue, Toronto 4, Canada.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

LITTLE MAGAZINE DIRECTORY (annual)—800 listings ($3.50/four editions; $1.00/single); also: THE SMALL PRESS REVIEW (quarterly)—news, features, reviews, quarterly "record" of small press/little magazine scene worldwide ($3.50/year). DUSTbooks, Box 123, El Cerrito, California.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 1-16-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

STATE ZIP NO.

PRIVATE PROBLEMS AND PUBLIC AFFAIRS -IMPORTANT BOOKS FROM CHICAGO

THE NEGRO AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

by Harry Kalven, Jr.

Professor Kalven discusses the contribution made by civil rights litigation to the Supreme Court's interpretation of the First Amendment, in a cogent inquiry into the Negro viewpoint on the issue of free speech. This is a book to interest and involve everyone concerned with the new turns being taken by the civil rights movement. "It takes a careful . . . reading of these lectures to savor their vintage excellence."—EPHRAIM MARGOLIN, California Law Review. Paper, $2.45

NEGRO POLITICIANS

The Rise of Negro Politics in Chicago

by Harold F. Gosnell

New Introduction

by James Q. Wilson

The winner of the John Anisfield-Wolf Award for the year's best book in the field of racial relations "realistically describes how the Southern Negro, having invaded Chicago in large numbers, readily adapted himself to the machine politics of that city."—RALPH BUNCHE. Clothbound $7.50; paper $2.95

THE SUPREME COURT REVIEW, 1966

Edited by Philip B. Kurland

The sixth annual discussion and analysis of Supreme Court activities includes Archibald MacLeish on Justice Frankfurter; John H. Mansfield on self-incrimination; Alexander Bickel on voting rights laws; Edmund Kitch on patent cases; William Leuchtenburg on the Court-packing plan; Monrad Paulsen on due process in the juvenile courts; Alfred Kamin on unions and libel; and C. Peter Magrath on obscenity cases. $8.95

THE NEGRO FAMILY IN THE UNITED STATES

by E. Franklin Frazier

Revised and abridged with a new foreword by Nathan Glazer

This classic 1939 study of the Negro family in America has proved itself grimly prophetic in its descriptions of what would happen to an essentially rural population crowded into urban ghettos. As informative today as when it was first published, it is "a highly important contribution to the intimate history of the people of the United States."—EDGAR T. THOMPSON, Journal of Southern History. Clothbound, $6.00; paper, $2.45

VOTING

A Study of Opinion Formation in a Presidential Campaign

Edited by Bernard Berelson, Paul F. Lazarsfeld, and William N. McPhee

Based on the famous Elmira Study made during the 1948 presidential campaign, this fascinating study shows how voting is affected by social class, religion, mass communication media, and other factors. Its political and human insights have made this an unusually cogent analysis of what makes voters and campaigns tick. "A brilliant book."—ROBERT E. LANE, American Political Science Review. Clothbound, $8.50; paper, $2.95

RELIGION AND THE PUBLIC ORDER, 1965

Edited by Donald F. Giannella

The third volume in this excellent series on conflicts involving religious issues includes John H. Mansfield on conscientious objectors; Kelley and LaNoue on the Church-State compromise on federal aid to education; Phenix on teaching religion in the public school; Albert Saunders on government and birth control. $6.95

75th Year

University of Chicago Press

BURLINGAME
JAN 24 1967
LIBRARY

PINTER'S 'HOMECOMING' HAROLD CLURMAN

NATION

JANUARY 23, 1967 35 cents

Military Seminars

THE MONGERS RETURN

RICHARD DUDMAN

The Prodigious Satellites

COMSAT, Ma BELL and ETV

EDMUND B. LAMBETH

The Coup that Impends

Episcopal Extremism

LESTER KINSOLVING

REVIEWS

Styles in Educated Females

THELMA McCORMACK

Violette Ledue's Child-Women

MURIEL HAYNES

The Case of Frank Lloyd Wright

SHERMAN PAUL

7-22-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

Godforsaken

Miami, Fla.

DEAR SIR: Except for Cardinal Spellman, Carle McIntyre, Billy Graham, Billy James Hargis and possibly General Westmoreland (who recently declared that U.S. troops are fighting on God's side "in this most Christian of causes"), most religious leaders, including the Pope himself, the National Council of Churches, and the entire World Council of Churches now oppose this war. Both the Vatican and the World Council of Churches believe this war to be a crime against humanity, and urge an immediate cessation of U.S. bombing in North Vietnam. Indeed there can be only one God, and one may well wonder whose side he is really on, or if he is on either side. One thing seems certain, and that is that he is not on our side.

Reynolds Moody
Lt. Col. USMC (Ret.)

cost of science

Stanford, Calif.

DEAR SIR: I have read with interest Lord Bowden's discussion, "How Much Science Can We Afford?" [The Nation, Jan. 2]. The article is a curious mixture of praise for the accomplishments of science and the intellectual and cultural values it represents with criticism of its cost. The latter is particularly confusing since the article fails to distinguish between "science" and "technical development." Lord Bowden complains that not enough useful work is being done by "science," but at the same time the cost of science which he quotes includes technical development which represents 90 per cent or so of the total, and which is just the cost of those technical items which are being developed to satisfy the needs of society.

An example of the misleading nature of the article is the sentence: "Before long we shall have to decide if the world is ever to see . . . a bigger linear electron accelerator than W. K. H. Panofsky's at Stanford which is reputed to cost more to operate than the whole of the great university which houses the machine." The operating cost for Stanford University during the year ending Aug. 31, 1966, was $108 million, not including construction of new buildings. The operating costs of the accelerator for the year starting July, 1967 (which is its first full year of operation), are $21 million. Considering the fact that work of the Stanford Center, together with that of three other institutions of comparable size, supports the work of more than thirty universities in high-energy physics, these figures are not as unreasonable as Lord Bowden suggests.

W. K. H. Panofsky

Gerassi's point

New York City

DEAR SIR: Jack Leavitt's review ["The Ordinarity of Sodomy," The Nation, Jan. 9] which treated, or rather mistreated, John Gerassi's Boys of Boise, is a perfect example of a reviewer who forgot just what it was he was commissioned to do.

If Mr. Leavitt desired a forum to put forward his legalistic views on homosexuality he should have been honest in his intentions and not have used Mr. Gerassi's book as a shill. . . .

Mr. Gerassi's book is not so much about homosexuals as it is about a homosexual scandal that rocked Boise and the atmosphere of McCarthyism that pervaded that hypocritical city. For Gerassi, homosexuals and indeed the scandal were a point of departure and not the crux of the book. Mr. Leavitt missed this rather obvious point. . . .

Richard M. Cohen

EDITORIALS

A Message of Defeat

The State of the Union message reveals, more clearly than any poll, the decline of the President's drive and influence. The few good things in the message are mainly recommendations that, given the composition of the 90th Congress, he is well aware cannot be implemented during the remainder of his term. In this aspect, the message reflects what might be called the reality gap—the application of purely verbal remedies to the acute and worsening ills that afflict the country. The most desperate of these, whose existence precludes any significant improvements on the home front, is of course the Vietnamese War, which Mr. Johnson once more justified with specious analogies and tiresome recriminations. The one indisputable truth he spoke was that the war, as he plans to prosecute it, will bring more cost, more loss and more agony. For these evils he acknowledges no personal responsibility. It is all the fault of that ever-ready scapegoat—communism.

On domestic issues, the move to the right is unmistakable. At one point Mr. Johnson invoked the words of Harry Truman on poverty as a preventable disease. Mr. Truman had his faults, but trying to buy off or appease the opposition was not one of them. The headlong charge was his style, whereas Mr. Johnson tries to cover his submission with glowing phrases.

The trouble with the across-the-board tax increase is that it will probably coincide with the softening of the economy which is already in evidence. A year ago it might have been effective; next July, it might bring on a recession—except for the corporations that are loaded with orders for the Vietnamese War.

The President touched on the anti-missile-missile controversy but said nothing that had not been said earlier and better by others. He promises to seek the advice of Congress on the possibility of international agreements bearing on this problem. The advice he can expect is to go ahead with the manufacture of anti-ICBM systems that have only one certain capability—they will start a new cycle in the arms race.

Mr. Johnson had only sensible things to say about efforts to improve relations with the Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe, but the situation here is the same as in the anti-ICBM field. The revived coalition of Republicans and Dixiecrats is already preparing to sabotage what Mr. Johnson proposes. Even the treaty to ban weapons in outer space is likely to meet opposition in the Senate. Moreover, the Vietnamese War precludes any salient change for the better in East-West relations.

It is good to hear that Mr. Johnson abhors wire tapping and bugging, but Congress is more likely to heed J. Edgar Hoover's ideas in that field than the President's. If Mr. Johnson had taken timely steps to curb Mr. Hoover's influence, his denunciations would carry some weight. As it is, these will be among the first recommendations to be forgotten. But no matter; the real purpose was probably to "bug" Senator Kennedy.

The President had virtually nothing to say about civil rights. The point here is not that further legislation is needed—there has been enough legislation but not enough action to make the legislation meaningful to the great mass of Negroes. What is urgently needed is leadership, and the President evidently has no intention of providing it. Aside from the moral aspects, a political disaster is in the making. What with the suspension of Adam Clayton Powell, and the seating of Lester G. Maddox as Governor of Georgia, it would seem that the Democratic Party is well on the way to losing the Negro vote. At the same time the President has created a painful dilemma for the leaders of the Negro Establishment.

By proposing the consolidation of the Commerce and Labor Departments into a new Department of Business and Labor (a labor "front"?), Mr. Johnson has likewise embarrassed the leaders of organized labor. It is quite true that Mr. Meany and his faction deserve what they now face, and that Walter Reuther may gain by it, but labor's support for the Democrats may be less than enthusiastic in 1968.

If the President brushed off civil rights, he was vehement on the subject of crime in the streets. His words might have been Barry Goldwater's. In the sense in which the President treated the subject, there is no crime wave. The nation's major crime problem is in the area of white-collar, largely middle-class economic crime—embezzlement, employee thefts, shoplifting, fraudulent salesmanship, auto thefts by teen-agers, etc. If the figures are properly analyzed, they negate Mr. Johnson's premise. But what he said will certainly fuel the backlash.

The fact that Mr. Johnson said nothing about space exploration, and nothing about the supersonic transport, might indicate that he has come to some sane conclusions about priorities in the nation's needs. But, on the positive side, he simply ticked off problems in haphazard order, with no attempt to establish a system of priorities. He sees no need for such a system, since most of the reforms he advocates have been swallowed up by the Vietnamese War. When a foreign policy has disastrous effects on domestic problems, there must be something wrong with the policy, but that policy is the one item on which Mr. Johnson stands firm.

The national priority which should head the list is the redirection of American power. What is needed is reconsideration of foreign policy in the light of domestic needs. When Mr. Johnson succeeded to the Presidency he seemed to be moving in that direction, and he continued on that general course during the 1964 campaign. Then he switched. That was his disaster and, unfortunately, the disaster of the rest of us; the State of the Union message is a reflection of the debacle.

A Brave Man in Seattle

Stimson Bullitt, who is attracting national attention with TV editorials critical of U.S. policy in Vietnam, is no 50-watt broadcaster. He is president of the King Broadcasting Company, which owns KING-TV, the N.B.C. affiliate in Seattle, KREM-TV, the A.B.C. affiliate in Spokane, and KGW-TV, the N.B.C. affiliate in Portland, Ore. In 1961, Doubleday-Anchor published Mr. Bullitt's To Be a Politician, with an introduction by David Riesman.

The Northwest was in sore need of someone to speak out, and Bullitt, who is a combination of industrialist and

IN THIS ISSUE

January 23, 1967

EDITORIALS

98

ARTICLES

- 101 Military Seminars:
The Mongers Return

Richard Dudman

- 105 The Coup that Impends:
Episcopal Extremism

Lester Kinsolving

- 109 The Prodigious Satellites:
Comsat, Ma Bell & ETV

Edmund B. Lambeth

- 112 Reunion in Warsaw:
Remembering Nuremberg

Victor H. Bernstein

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 117 Styles in Educated Females

Thelma McCormack

- 118 With the Saints and Martyrs

Muriel Haynes

- 120 The Surrealist Quixote

Stephen Koch

- 121 Interior Order

Sherman Paul

- 122 Theatre

Harold Clurman

- 123 Music

Benjamin Boretz

- 125 Art

Max Kozloff

- 127 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Science
CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION

Volume 204
No. 4

intellectual, responded to the opportunity. He is scornful of the average run of broadcast editorials: "They endorse Christmas seals," he says. The Seattle newspapers are similarly safe and conventional. The Times prints as little as possible concerning dissent on the Vietnamese War, apparently on the theory that publicity plays into the Communists' hands.

Bullitt, on the contrary, could hardly be more explicit. He began his December 20-23 editorials with the statement that the war and its treatment in the news compelled him to speak. His second sentence was: "The intensity of our military action should be stepped down, and we should stop bombing North Vietnam." He went on to say that the purposes of World War II justified the cost, but the Vietnamese War neither gives us security nor defends our liberty; on the contrary, it jeopardizes both. It disrupts and degrades the country we have invaded, it is repulsive to the ideals we have held in the past, and it is turning most of the countries of the world against us.

Mr. Bullitt has reason to be pleased with the reaction to his campaign. In the period from December 20 to January 2, the Seattle station received 740 telephone calls, far above the normal level. Of these, 225 were critical in one way or another; 384 were favorable. Fifty wanted more information and eighty asked for the schedule of forthcoming editorials. Assuming that half of the 130 in the last two groups are favorable, the ratio approving the station's views on Vietnam would be 3 to 2. In the same period 300 letters were received; these were favorable in the ratio 5 to 1.

A portion of the mail fell into familiar categories. There was the expected Birch-type outcry. Some letters came from old-time isolationists, commending the program but saying we should have minded our own business in the first place. "Peaceniks" made their contribution, and there were a certain number of what Westbrook Pegler used to call "bleeding hearts," which in Bullitt's definition means people who regard foreign policy strictly in humanitarian terms.

Over and above these groups, there was a preponderance of mail to the effect that while the writers would not necessarily agree on every point, they were happy to see the subject opened up for frank discussion. Many said they were delighted to hear someone say publicly what many people have been saying privately, or only in their own thoughts. From this standpoint Mr. Bullitt's innovation is of great importance. The tendency, where large financial interests are involved, is to express views that will displease no one, or only those groups that are so unpopular or impecunious that they don't count. In the case of a mass medium like TV, sharp criticism of the official position is seldom heard.

In such a setting, opinion polls on Vietnam are robbed of authenticity. How can a genuine public opinion be expected to form unless the opposition case is stated publicly so that it can reverberate in the community? Airing the opposition case can be hazardous—and doubly so when it is adopted by the station itself, that is, when it is voiced as an editorial position. But once the wall of silence is broken down, it is often discovered that a large proportion of the people have wanted frank discussion right along. Would that there were more station managements with the courage and sense of responsibility which Mr. Bullitt and his colleagues have demonstrated.

Showmanship at Sacramento

Ronald Reagan's inauguration was, as one commentator suggested, "a mixture of Hollywood and a county fair." The good showman was sworn in just after midnight on January 2 under the floodlit dome of the State Capitol, thus avoiding conflict with TV coverage of the football games during the daylight hours. The festivities that followed neglected no aspect of the California ethos. The "cultural way" was honored by a performance of the San Francisco Symphony orchestra. A prayer breakfast was the occasion for the "spiritual way," with Ronnie intoning: "Belief in and dependence on God is absolutely essential. It will be an integral part of our public life as long as I am governor." The "official way" was represented by the inaugural itself, and the "hospitality way" by a civic luncheon of the Chamber of Commerce. Hollywood spared neither expense nor talent for its own. Five bands played at the Fair Ground and Danny Thomas exclaimed, "Is this for real or is it a movie?" It was, of course, both.

In his inaugural address Ronnie promised to lead California "down the path of the creative society," which apparently is to consist of the following steps:

(1) Cutback on welfare, with recipients to work in public institutions. The solution is not original: back in the thirties beneficiaries of state aid were threatened with being dropped from the rolls if they refused to chop cotton at 27½¢ an hour.

(2) Anti-pornographic legislation, modeled presumably after Proposition 16, "CLEAN," which was defeated at the polls.

(3) To exorcise the specter of Watts, an act to put down riots and insurrection with utmost firmness.

(4) Anti-crime legislation—always a good bit.

(5) Legislation guaranteeing every union member a secret ballot on union dues and policy.

(6) Support for Max Rafferty's proposal to give local school boards more control of curriculum and textbook selection: "Support your local school boards, support your local police," etc.

And, underlying and flanking all the above, the balancing of the state budget.

Toward this last goal, the new Governor proposes to cut the budget of the University of California and make up the deficit by charging students $400 a year for tuition. Dr. Clark Kerr pointed out that it already costs them $1,750 to attend and that many would be squeezed out if tuition were no longer free. It may not be true that the university ranks among the five leading institutions of learning in the world, but it is the most generously supported and, by many standards, an admirable system, befitting the largest and fastest growing state. Under Reagan, will it remain what it is today?

California has the governor the majority of its voters deserve. He is said to be plotting with John Tower to set up a right-wing national ticket in 1968. It seems a little early for such euphoric plans. There has always been a problem in California about the confusion of illusion and reality—witness Hollywood, the Disney fantasy empire, "instant cities," and the rest. But in politics, reality has a way of catching up with the dreamers. Reagan would do well to ponder the words of a fictional governor of Pennsylvania in one of John O'Hara's novels. "Any son of a bitch who wants to be President," says this character, "should first try being governor of Pennsylvania." As he becomes enmeshed in the realities of California problems and California politics, Ronnie may wish he were back on the late show—and the voters may wish it too.

Is This Museum Necessary?

Public Law 87-186, already passed by the Congress, sets up a National Armed Forces Museum Advisory Board as a branch of the Smithsonian Institution. A general plan for the project has been approved and all that remains is for the Congress to appropriate $40 million (which may be only a down payment) to acquire the 100 acres still needed to round out the 610-acre site in Washington, and start building.

As presently conceived, the plan calls for a complex of indoor and outdoor exhibits, including, according to The Washington Post, a military aviation section on about 30 acres, containing pavilions housing military aircraft from World War I to the current models; a ship basin illustrating naval history; a beachhead displaying amphibious attack vessels and wartime beach defenses; a replica of a World War I trench system (the wire specially fabricated with rubber barbs to protect the kiddies); a cut-away model of an ICBM in its underground silo; and such intellectual treats as a study center for research into the meaning of war and its contributions to civilization.

Col. John H. Magruder, USMC, director of the project, emphasizes that the proposed museum will be angled toward visitor participation and a "dynamic educational" goal. The constructive achievements of the armed forces will be featured, such as the building of the Panama Canal, the conquest of yellow fever, the opening of the West, the exploration of Antarctica, and the contributions of the U.S. military to the establishment of a peaceful world, by which is meant, presumably, a world in which the United States has so far been spared the ravages of war on its own territory.

MILITARY SEMINARS

THE MONGERS RETURN

RICHARD DUDMAN

Mr. Dudman is a Washington correspondent for the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. He is the author of Men of the Far Right (Pyramid Publications).

Those cold-war seminars, institutes and workshops that caused a stir five years ago are not dead after all. They just went underground long enough for the controversy to simmer down and for people to forget their concern that high-ranking military officers, active or retired on pensions, were getting into politics by way of alerting the country to the danger of communism at home and abroad. [See "The Ultras" by Fred J. Cook, Nation special issue,

Something might be said for an armed forces museum and exhibition park if the idea were carried out with rigorous candor and honesty. About half of the major conflicts in which the United States has engaged could qualify as "just wars." Others, like the Mexican war, of which Gen. U. S. Grant said that a more wicked war had never been waged, are shameful chapters in our history and should be displayed for the young with due contrition and all possible prophylaxis against the viciously immoral doctrine of "my country, right or wrong." But the mere statement of any such expectation exposes its absurdity. In the eyes of the military all wars are glorious.

If the objective is to be the deification of the armed forces, just because this nation still retains a residue of coolness toward the idea of huge standing armies, or because our professional soldiers feel the need for arresting the deterioration of their image, then true patriots will oppose the idea. We do not need what some of the mothers of Washington are calling a Disneyland of Death.

Waldo Frank (1889-1967)

Robert Frost liked to describe himself as having "a lover's quarrel with the world." Waldo Frank tried to sustain the same sort of relationship with the United States, but it wouldn't love back, refusing to quarrel on his terms. Frank died last week after a writing career that endured for nearly sixty years and included fame in the thirties and near oblivion for the past decade. Such recognition he had here in his later years was usually reflected from those he had been credited with discovering: Sherwood Anderson, Hart Crane, and even—a curious tribute to Frank's unique personal evangelism—the people of Latin America.

A man of letters in an old-fashioned sense, Frank often moved beyond letters in a way that is highly contemporary. The social protest of his books was directed to action, and he frequently and dangerously found himself where the action was. Now that he is past all action, there are only the books. But every one of them is out of print today, still waiting as he did for a new audience.

June 30, 1962; pp. 594-596.] Certain changed circumstances suggest that the self-appointed cold-war strategists may be more successful this time.

Chief among the new operations is the Freedom Studies Center taking shape on a hillside estate near Culpeper, Va., as a private enterprise substitute for the old right-wing dream of a government-financed "freedom academy."

Two generals and an admiral flew out there by helicopter from the Pentagon to take part in dedication ceremonies last September. A military color guard and a section of the Navy band also helped set the tone of official approval. Speakers included National Commander John E. Davis of the American Legion; Admiral Arleigh A. Burke, former Chief of Naval Operations and now director of the Center for Strategic Studies at Georgetown University; Dr. Walter H. Judd, former Republican Congressman from Minnesota, and Sen. Thomas J. Dodd (D.) of Connecticut.

President Johnson sent a telegram of congratulations. His message began with a somewhat cryptic observation that "the will to resist aggression is strengthened by our understanding of the alternative to turning back a foe who would deny man's freedom." Mr. Johnson went on to say that private and public institutions must share a responsibility for "this great and urgent work of defending freedom and promoting peace." J. Edgar Hoover wired that "only by an informed citizenry, conscious of its responsibility in this giant ideological battle, can we hope to keep alive the flame of freedom." Gen. Earle G. Wheeler, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, wrote that the center promised to make "a distinguished contribution to the development of well-informed American policies."

John M. Fisher, the former FBI agent who is president and chief executive officer of the center, told the assembled group how he planned to satisfy these great expectations. He spoke of the first seminar, a four-day institute for twenty-eight Congressional aides conducted by Edgar Ansel Mower, Dr. Eleanor Dulles, Dr. Walter Judd, Allen W. Dulles, Prof. Frederick Barghoorn of Yale, and two representatives of the National Maritime Union. Fisher said nearly $800,000 had been donated or pledged by foundations, corporations and individuals toward an $11 million development program for a campus that would accommodate 400 graduate students a year.

Two key figures in the new academy are Fisher and Edward G. Lansdale, the retired Air Force major general who is now in Saigon as a special assistant for counterinsurgency operations to Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge.

Fisher is also president of the Institute for American Strategy and the American Security Council, two closely related Chicago organizations. The institute operates the new center at Culpeper as "a private psycho-political warfare school to turn out finished cold-war professionals, just as the service academies turn out hot-war professionals."

The American Security Council was set up in 1955 to maintain a loyalty-security blacklist where employers could check employees and potential employees for indications of leftist or troublemaking tendencies. Five former FBI agents were on the staff. The blacklist eventually contained more than 1 million names. The council tried to obtain files left by the late Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy, but his widow gave them instead to Marquette University.

Fisher joined the council in 1961, after eight years as a "corporate security" specialist for Sears Roebuck and Co. Under his leadership, it grew rapidly, acquiring many corporate subscribers at fees up to $900 a year. Corporate members include Sears, Motorola, Stewart-Warner, U.S. Steel, Illinois Central Railroad, General Electric and Allstate Insurance. At that time, the council also moved into the area of opinion making, publishing a newsletter, Washington Report, and analyzing defense and foreign policy issues through its National Strategy Committee.

General Lansdale's name appears in the initial literature of the Freedom Studies Center as its administrative director, with a footnote to say that he is "on leave of absence as U.S. Minister to Vietnam." Lansdale does have the rank of minister there, although his title is special assistant to the ambassador. Some of Lansdale's admirers in Washington assumed at first that he had been drawn into the operation only incidentally, as a public figure whose name would lend prestige to the new center. He had won wide respect for his successful counterinsurgency strategy in the Philippines and for his outspoken thesis that the Vietnamese War could never be won by shelling hamlets and dropping napalm on civilians.

It has come to light, however, that Lansdale was a chief architect of this new version of a United States freedom academy. In June, 1965, he circulated a "preliminary working study" for such an academy. He envisaged it as "a continuing source of expert, dedicated help to the deserving in the cause of freedom—responding to requests for advice and counsel from graduates, from institutions and leaders in the ranks of freedom throughout the world—a big-hearted polarizing force always ready to lend a hand to the best of its ability whenever truly needed."

Lansdale's 23-page study said that the academy would be developed under the auspices of the Institute for American Strategy. In that and other respects, the center has developed closely along the lines he laid out. He envisioned a modest start through popular subscription, but mentioned the possibility that the academy, "if it fulfills its true role dynamically and successfully, could well become the sole required freedom academy and could receive U.S. Government funds for its education activities of direct benefit to the United States in the winning of national security goals, including scholarships for U.S. officials."

The General proposed a permanent location at Yorktown, Va., which "carries in its very name the reminders of victory in the American Revolution and of brotherhood shared with comrades from across the sea." He warned against the temptation to develop a private intelligence organization, on the ground that it "well could grow into the tail that wags the dog, becoming more aggressively active than the needs of the freedom academy warrant." He did say, however, that the academy should have its own library of information about foreign leaders, organizations, political institutions and social structures. And he suggested that retired officials of the CIA, Defense Intelligence Agency or Office of Naval Intelligence would be well suited to head the academy's reference service.

To help draft the curriculum, Lansdale suggested Walter Robertson, former Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs; Hugh Cumming, Jr., former State Department Director of Intelligence and Research, and William S. B. Lacy, former Ambassador to Korea. Lansdale's concept of instruction at the academy leaned toward the conservative. As sponsor of teaching on the theory and practice of economic free enterprise, he suggested the National Association of Manufacturers or the United States Chamber of Commerce. On the theory and practice of free trade unionism, he suggested the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Still another field of study he proposed was "the theory and practice of revolt in a Communist-controlled country," including "role and techniques of outside support" and "tactics (simple sabotage for popular adoption, overload and disruption of bureaucracy, political-psychological actions, socio-economic actions, use of force)." He suggested also an evaluation of émigré liberation groups and a study of "the potentials of 'freedom fighter' type of organizations now operating in the defense of freedom if they went over to the offensive."

Under the heading of "Advisory Teams," Lansdale said: "The freedom academy should acquire the capability of sending small teams to foreign countries, upon request, to assist with practical advice on how to resolve problems of concern to freedom. The requests might come from leaders of a foreign government, from a foreign political institution or group, or from an acceptable third party. The propriety of such requests could be checked readily before honoring them. Consulting fees could cover expenses and add a bonus for the academy's budget."

After his views on how the war should and should not be waged had led to a disagreement with Gen. Maxwell D. Taylor and a prolonged period of eclipse, General Lansdale began new efforts to get back to Saigon. Early in 1965, he and Rufus C. Phillips, former head of rural affairs in the United States AID mission in South Vietnam, prepared and circulated to friends and government officials a 6-page analysis, titled "How to Win in Vietnam."

It criticized General Taylor, then ambassador to Saigon, and what it called an overly formalized, bureaucratic approach. Its main line was that an elite group of Americans who understood the Vietnamese and enjoyed their confidence could cut through the red tape, arouse them with revolutionary fervor, and start the country on the road to a big anti-Communist victory. This recalled the strategy of The Ugly American, in which "Col. Edwin B. Hillandale" was recognizable as Gen. Edward G. Lansdale.

Lansdale did get back to Saigon, largely through the intercession of Vice President Hubert Humphrey and Senator Dodd with President Johnson, but he clearly achieved less than he had hoped. He now runs his own operation on the fringe of the so-called "other war" and appears to have been left in the backwash of the steadily expanding military effort.

The names that showed up eventually in connection with the Freedom Studies Center were a mixed lot. Senators Dodd and Karl Mundt of South Dakota, long-time advocates of a government-financed freedom academy, are members of the board of directors and co-chairmen of a Senatorial advisory board. Other directors include Patrick J. Frawley, Jr., chairman of the board of Eversharp, Inc., and a supporter of many ultraconservative causes including Dr. Fred C. Schwarz's Christian Anti-Communist Crusade; Henry Regnery, the conservative publisher; Henry Salvatori, who was Barry Goldwater's chief California fund raiser in 1964; Allan B. Kline, former president of the American Farm Bureau Federation; Dr. Myron Blee, deputy director of the Office of Emergency Planning, in the Executive Office of the President; the Very Rev. James F. Maguire, S.J., president of Loyola University; Gen. Robert B. Wood, retired chairman of the board of Sears Roebuck, and Gov. Otto Kerner of Illinois. Listed as members of various advisory boards are fifteen U.S. Senators, thirty-eight U.S. Representatives and twelve Governors, including Romney and Hatfield.

Members of the center's Educational Advisory Committee include Dr. Lynn M. Bartlett, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Education; Dr. Ernest van den Haag of New York University, and Dr. Evron Kirkpatrick, executive director of the American Political Science Association. The Planning and Development Committee includes many persons active in the public information operations of the American Security Council, among them Dr. James D. Atkinson, associate professor of government at Georgetown University, international politics editor of the council's Washington Report; Dr. Lev Dobrianski, professor of Soviet economics at Georgetown and chairman of the National Captive Nations Committee, economics editor of the Report; Dr. Stefan T. Possony, director of International Studies at the Hoover Institution for War, Revolution and Peace, strategy and military affairs editor of the Report; Stanley J. Tracy, former assistant FBI director, a member of the council's strategy staff, and Frank J. Johnson, foreign editor of the Report.

Mr. Johnson is the author of No Substitute for Victory (Regnery, 1962), which carried an introduction by Admiral Burke. In a chapter called "Blueprint for Victory," he said that the way to win the cold war was first to inform the Kremlin "that we intend to win." He suggested an immediate naval blockade of Cuba, followed by a new invasion by exiles, but this time with an American guarantee against failure. Next would come the liberation of Albania, to show Khrushchev "that we intend to create plenty of trouble for him in his own back yard." The Saturday Evening Post called Johnson's plan "a blueprint for disaster" and said that "the inevitable result of Mr. Johnson's advice would be to find ourselves fighting all over the globe and exposing vital areas to Communist conquest by the dispersion of our forces."

When cold-war seminars were active five years ago, their extremism was open and evident. One of the more dramatic outbursts came from Rear Adm. Chester Ward, now law and space editor of the American Security Council's Washington Report. He told a "Fourth Dimensional Warfare Seminar" in Pittsburgh that Ambassadors Adlai E. Stevenson and George F. Kennan were some of the advisers around President John F. Kennedy who "have philosophies regarding foreign affairs that would chill the typical American." Ward and similar lecturers were only a few steps behind Maj. Gen. Edwin A. Walker, who was busy attacking Harry S. Truman, Dean Acheson, Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Edward R. Murrow, Walter Cronkite and Eric Sevareid as being Communist influenced. Walker was rebuked and removed from his command.

Sen. J. William Fulbright exposed this cold-war activity, citing enough horrible examples to make it clear that generals and admirals were getting deep into politics. President Kennedy and the new civilian team at the Pentagon accepted Fulbright's contention that the country needed no alerting to the danger of communism. There was a crack-down—interrupted by weeks of Senate hearings on the issue of whether the men in uniform were being "muzzled"—and anyone would have thought that the trouble had ended. The Pentagon ordered that military officers stop sponsoring anti-Communist alerts and take no further part in indoctrinating the general public.

The new corps of cold warriors—whether at the Freedom Studies Center or operating from their own foxholes—includes many of the old faces, but there is the difference that they are now wary of extreme proposals and personal attacks on widely respected public figures.

One of those who saw the light early is Frank R. Barnett, a former Rhodes scholar, who attracted attention in 1951 with a plan for an American-sponsored foreign legion, recruited from iron-curtain refugees. He urged the creation of "psycho-political forces" to fight the cold war, as well as a separate cabinet office and a special joint Congressional committee on cold-war strategy, a "West Point of political warfare," and an international "captive nations brigade," comprising refugee Russians, Poles, Hungarians, Koreans, Chinese, Ukrainians and others.

Fulbright mentioned Barnett prominently in a 1961 memorandum to President Kennedy and Secretary of Defense Robert S. McNamara in which he exposed the cold-war propagandizing by military men. Barnett was then a member of the American Security Council's planning committee and research director for the Institute for American Strategy—the same outfit that now operates the new Freedom Studies Center. He was also research director for the Richardson Foundation, a fund that was supported by the Vick Chemical Co., and that helped finance the institute and other conservative enterprises. Fulbright suggested that the organizations' close relations with the National War College and the Joint Chiefs of Staff amounted to official support for a viewpoint that conflicted with Administration policy.

Fulbright's memorandum quoted Barnett as having told an Atlanta "Seminar on American Strategy," sponsored by the Third Army, the Institute for American Strategy and other groups: "There are no bomb-carrying Communists around any more, but propaganda favorable to communism is being retailed in American journals and from the pulpit . . . by good people who have not done their homework. It is within the capacity of the people in this room to literally turn the state of Georgia into a civilian war college."

The memo also told of a five-day public institute conducted by the U.S. Naval Air Station at Glenview, Ill., called "Education for American Security," at which the speakers included Barnett, Dr. Fred Schwarz, Herbert Philbrick and Richard Arens, staff director of the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Ten days after Fulbright sent the memo to the President and McNamara, Barnett spoke out against "crackpot" groups that concentrated on hunting "pinkos" on college campuses. He also advised reserve officers attending a meeting of the National War College to apply "quality control" when organizing local seminars on cold-war strategy.

Barnett is still going strong, helped along by testimony from Secretary McNamara that he, as well as the Institute for American Strategy, had always conducted a "basically responsible group of seminars." He now operates the National Strategy Information Center in New York and arranges local sponsorship for seminars around the country. He provides the speakers, usually from the government and academic life. Sometimes he helps finance the conferences, and he often makes one of the speeches. For example, at a "National Security Seminar" last September at Wabash College, Crawfordsville, Ind., the sponsors were Sigma Delta Chi, professional journalistic fraternity, Wabash College, the Liberty Fund, Inc., and the National Strategy Information Center. Speakers included Barnett, on "Lenin, Clausewitz and the Private Citizen"; Frank N. Trager, professor of international affairs at New York University, on "The War in Vietnam and the Geopolitics of Southeast Asia"; Arthur Barber, Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense for Arms and Trade Control, and William Kintner, deputy director of the Foreign Policy Research Institute at the University of Pennsylvania, on "The Challenge of Communist Insurgency in Latin America" and "Alternate Military Strategies for the 1970s." William P. Bundy, Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs, was scheduled to speak but sent a substitute, Joseph Yager, ■ member of the State Department's policy planning council.

Literature distributed to participants at the Wabash seminar included a pamphlet titled "Public Opinion, the Private Sector and National Defense," published by Barnett's National Strategy Information Center. It called for volunteer anti-Communist actions by labor unions, cooperatives, foundations, universities, professional societies and trade associations. Under "action programs," the pamphlet commended the work of the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

Another publicist who has learned the importance of moderation in conducting cold-war seminars and institutes is Gen. Barksdale Hamlett, U.S.A. (Ret.). As vice chief of staff of the Army, the general lived through the controversy five years ago. Approaching the end of his testimony in the 1962 hearings on the muzzling of the military, General Hamlett said: "Regardless of the means adopted, I feel that a continuing and vital need exists to keep the American public fully alert to the ever-present threat of communism. . . . But I do think that we must be very careful. There is one thing that we all know—the military just can't become mixed up in political issues, either local or international."

General Hamlett now has a good opportunity to put his precept into practice. He is co-chairman of the Educational Advisory Committee of the Freedom Studies Center.

The seminars and the center clearly have learned from past excesses. They avoid any direct indoctrination of the general public and, so far as can be learned, they refrain even in their private sessions from outrageous slurs against good Americans. Also, the more extreme speakers are now missing from the programs.

But moderation is only part of the story. The Vietnamese conflict has grown since 1962 from a minor engagement to ■ major war. The American managers of the war want help wherever they can get it. The private enterprise cold warriors posed ■ threat to the peaceful coexistence objectives of the Kennedy administration, but are welcomed as allies by leading members of the Johnson Administration.

THE COUP THAT IMPENDS

EPISCOPAL EXTREMISM

LESTER KINSOLVING

After twelve years as a parish priest, Lester Kinsolving is serving the Episcopal Diocese of California as co-chairman of its legislative division. Father Kinsolving is a columnist for the San Francisco Chronicle, a reporter for Newsweek and a contributor to Ramparts and The Christian Century.

America's 3 million Episcopalians constitute a denomination that is modest in size when compared to such Protestant giants as Methodism or the assorted Baptists, who together total almost 40 million, or a little less than the nation's nearly 50 million Roman Catholics. What the Episcopal church lacks in size, however, is more than amply compensated in prestige—whether measured by a denominational compilation of Dun & Bradstreet or the Congressional Directory. Like the state of Virginia, the Episcopal church is the "Mother of Presidents," more of its members having occupied the White House (as well as Philadelphia's Independence Hall on July 4, 1776) than have those of any other denomination. While there has not been an Episcopal President in the last two decades, there was an Episcopal headmaster at the Choate School who frequently told the student body: "Ask not what your school can do for you. Ask what you can do for your school."

The Episcopal church is generally regarded as the wealthiest per capita of all denominations. It is also frequently referred to as "The Republican Party At Prayer."

There are, of course, some notable exceptions to this untabulated general surmise. Franklin Roosevelt, Dean Acheson and a bulk of the Sioux Indians (thanks to a devoted missionary named William Hare) have been among the church's membership. Yet despite varying degrees of Episcopal membership in every socio-economic and racial category in America, one Episcopal layman named J. Pierpont Morgan would seem to serve better as an identifying personage than an Episcopal convert named Sitting Bull, or even his tribal descendants.

If New York's Yankee Stadium is "the House that Ruth built," so New York's Cathedral of St. John the Divine is "the House that Morgan (almost) built." When completed, St. John's will be America's largest cathedral—the distance from end to end being presently so great that altar hangings of especially vivid colors are required for liturgical observance, since color tends to fade across such vast distance.

St. John's took a recent cut of some $600,000 in building pledges from assorted donors whose pledged word was discovered to be notably less than bond by New York's Bishop Horace W. B. Donegan. While Donegan permitted these backsliding pledgers to remain anonymous, he did disclose that the cause of their moral default (a church pledge is not a legal note) was the cathedral's stance on racial justice, as well as its employment of a Negro priest on the clergy staff (St. John's is adjacent not only to Columbia University but, on the other side, to an oceanic ghetto of Negro tenements in Harlem).

The financially penalized cathedral was the site, early in 1966, of a special conference which, in addition to metropolitan church people, drew attendants from a wide variety of areas. One of the featured speakers, Sen. Gale McGee of Wyoming, spoke from vivid personal experience at a conference on extremism which examined a subject of increased concern to growing numbers of Episcopal church people. The Rev. Canon Walter Dennis of St. John's Cathedral cannot reasonably be termed an alarmist. Yet he told the conference, "I may be nervous, but there is the possibility of a coup."

Canon Dennis' expressed concern was supported at the conference by one of the most prestigious clergymen in the Episcopal church, John Krumm, formerly dean of Los Angeles' St. Paul's Cathedral and chaplain of Columbia University, now rector of New York's Church of the Ascension. Dr. Krumm diagnosed the problem as "frightened people, who in the face of world revolutions—notably in minority rights—see their whole world crumbling about them and with it their hope of status and superiority." Krumm's incisive diagnosis was only a preface to his prediction that "they're going to try to do what they can to stack the next General Convention, although the Lord knows they did pretty well in 1964."

The Triennial General Convention (meeting next in Seattle in October) is the Episcopal church's equivalent of Congress. It legislates ultimate control over the 7,500 churches and 10,000 clergy—as well as control of an annual national budget now exceeding $14 million.

The convention's two houses (Deputies and Bishops) were originally designed by a number of the same Episcopal laymen who structured and signed the Constitution of the United States. Yet the Episcopal equivalent of the House of Representatives (The House of Deputies, comprising four priests and four laymen from each diocese) has repeatedly demonstrated itself as decidedly reactionary when compared to the Senate equivalent, The House of Bishops.

Such decided conservatism among the lay deputies is thought by many Episcopalians to be caused mainly by what amounts to economic exclusion of the poor. If Basil Broken Nose of South Dakota ever attends the General Convention, he comes as something of an exhibit—and finds himself trying to match parliamentary acumen with such as Charles P. Taft or Harvey Firestone.

If this is insufficient to discourage him, the average diocesan General Convention travel allowance will, since it falls far short of the cost of travel and residence for a twelve-day conference in a distant city. The duration of the conference further excludes all Episcopal laity except those able to leave their jobs for two weeks in October. To make matters worse, representation in the General Convention is so markedly disproportionate that an Episcopalian in Los Angeles has one-thirty-seventh the voice in his church's government as does an Episcopalian in west Wisconsin.

While there can be occasional competition for convention seats in the big dioceses, all too often the small and remote diocese is confronted with not a competition but a search for someone to attend. "Someone" is all too frequently a wealthy conservative who can afford the time and expense. There are, of course, some exceptions. The diocese of Pittsburgh electrified a recent convention by sending Michael Budzenowski, an official of the United Steelworkers, AFL-CIO—but even in his own delegation he was a distinct minority. Perhaps in no other place is the Episcopal church more susceptible to the familiar accusation of being "a rich man's church" than in its highest governing body.

Disproportionate representation was the subject of an earnest appeal for reform made by former Presiding Bishop Henry Knox Sherrill in 1958 at the convention in which he retired. His appeal was voted down, but its burden was heard again early in 1966, when The Episcopal Society for Cultural and Racial Unity and the Association of Episcopal Clergy passed a resolution asking for an end to disproportionate representation, together with realistic and uniform travel allowances from the national rather than diocesan budgets, a reduction in the length of convention (which should be held annually or biennially) and the admission of women if elected as deputies.

The possibility of such reform being enacted is equivalent to the possibility that a state legislature would voluntarily reapportion itself, with the consequent exclusion of a considerable segment of its hoariest seniority-system power structure. Perhaps such reform will come about only as the result of the most serious Alinsky-type agitation (Saul Alinsky himself plans to be present in Seattle during the convention); or a demand by the big dioceses for either proportionate representation or equal assessments.

The present disproportion in the General Convention makes the Episcopal church particularly vulnerable to arch-conservatism at its highest governing level—even as there is a similar vulnerability in a great many of the local churches.

Most local churches operate on a tight budget because they are trying to meet soaring building costs, support the missionary ideal (without which Christianity would have died in Jerusalem) and pay the clergy salaries which in most cases barely approximate a living wage. While there are a number of wealthy Episcopal churches, these are the exception and it is somewhat unusual when one of these retains a clergyman who is not a proper guardian of St. Status Quo. In the vast majority of Episcopal churches there is a constant struggle to meet the budget, and even one substantial pledger is afforded considerable power. His preferences are regarded with awe—particularly if he becomes sufficiently agitated to recruit even a minuscule company of like-minded and like-funded parishioners.

Under such circumstances it is remarkable indeed that more churches have not been taken over by well-heeled Birch types who can infiltrate the budget and then, having paid the piper (and increased the budget), proceed to call the tune, as has happened in Phoenix, Houston and Shreveport, La., among other places. Rare indeed are the instances of hungry church boards or clergy turning down any financial support unless it has absolutely blatant strings attached. What so often happens is that a building campaign or other needed expansion is undertaken on the basis of large contributions—and the strings appear only after the construction is under way.

The strings can and have been used on many occasions to hobble those clergy who, in taking Jesus and the other Hebrew prophets seriously, manifest a devotion to social justice. Despite certain protection afforded by church (canon) law there are many ways in which a pastor may be ousted—and no Episcopal clergyman has unemployment insurance. A majority of clergy have no training other than theology, having come into the ministry directly from school, college and seminary. If they try to obtain a church post elsewhere in the diocese, or in another diocese, the chances are that the bishop may be similarly vulnerable or convinced that the 11th commandment supersedes all others: "Thou shalt not rock the boat."

Clergy find that it is one thing to carry the cross oneself and be despised and the rejected of men—it is quite another to be unable to feed and house a wife and children. It is amazing under these circumstances that even a segment of the clergy has been prominently engaged on the front lines of such battlefields as Selma.

In just two years the number of Episcopal clergy who have dissociated themselves from local churches has increased from 25 to 40 per cent—or 4,000 priests. In addition to clergy service on national or diocesan staffs, institutional chaplaincies or in secular employment, a considerable number of them are now schoolteachers—and will affirm that the classroom has come to provide more freedom of speech than many pulpits.

In addition to that exodus, the enrollments in theological seminaries are down—even as a Lily Foundation survey discloses that a majority of today's seminarians have no intention of ever entering the parochial ministry.

A return to the historic clergy shortage that existed in the Episcopal church prior to 1950 (the height of the post-war Sheen-Peale-Graham religious "boom") may create a desperate need for clergy. Church boards may then be universally obliged (rather than occasionally inclined) to defend the freedom of the pulpit—or else have it uninhabited. If the majority of clergy are no longer dependent for their livelihood upon the whims of big pledgers, the church may well have a resurgence.

Perhaps, on the other hand, the transition to secular employment may be too drastic for too many clergy—or it may be too late in coming. When Rev. Dr. John Krumm warned the New York Cathedral conference that a coup would be attempted in Seattle in 1967, he also said advisedly that "they did pretty well in 1964." The record of the 1964 General Convention was for the most part utterly dismal that a group of forty of the leading bishops held an unofficial meeting of concern after the convention had adjourned. The House of Deputies had deplored racism in South Africa, but refused to address the same issue as it applied to Mississippi and Alabama. When the explosive issue of miscegenation laws was raised (by an Arizona attorney, Edward Morgan, who recently won a U.S. Supreme Court decision against a schoolteacher's loyalty oath), it was avoided like the plague. An even more explosive topic was raised when another attorney, William Stringfellow of New York, issued a statement protesting what he and 850 bishops, priests and laity termed the racism in the then current Goldwater-Miller campaign.

Copies of the Stringfellow statement were distributed in the General Convention pressroom, and while nothing in it could be construed as a claim that it was an official pronouncement of convention, it was carried with a St. Louis dateline by wire services across the nation and internationally. Some measure of conservatism in the Episcopal church could be found in the volume of letters, telegrams and long distance calls which transmitted the assorted screams of outraged Republican Episcopalians. California's Bishop James Pike, already under threat of heresy charges, received reports that his diocese had lost pledges of $60,000 in two days because he had signed the statement.

In the ensuing furor, the House of Deputies sprang into action by appointing a committee to investigate the pressroom. By striking contrast, no such investigation was either proposed or conducted regarding the presence and activities at convention of assorted members of the right wing—who maintained a booth in the convention's exhibit hall. This conglomeration of such organizations as "Episcopalians for the Faith" or "Episcopalians for Christ" had made an initial appearance at the 1961 General Convention, where it lobbied in favor of an attempt (unsuccessful) to have the church withdraw from the National Council of Churches.

Coordinator of these Birch-front groups is a dynamic and handsome woman, Mrs. Dorothy Faber of Washington, D.C., who edits a periodical called The Christian Challenge, published in Michigan. While Mrs. Faber vehemently denies any connection with Robert Welch's organization, her editorial line is remarkably similar, the particular points of attack being Bishop Pike, the National Council of Churches and the church's activity on behalf of civil rights.

While it may be a long time before any such radical rightist as Mrs. Faber is elected to any segment of the Episcopal church power structure, the actual existence of an arch-conservative beachhead is evident in the present constituency of the Executive Council. This group of geographically elected bishops, priests, laymen and churchwomen actually operates the national program of the Episcopal church during each three-year interim between General Conventions.

Perhaps the most widely known member of Executive Council is the erstwhile ghost writer, Senate campaign manager and at present historian to Barry Goldwater—Stephen C. Shadegg. Although Shadegg is considered something of a loner on the various noncontroversial issues that fill most Executive Council agendas, he can be formidable indeed when he teams up with other leaders of the conservative block—most notably Charles Crump (of the Memphis Crumps), Prime Osborne of Florida, and the considerably charming and persuasive Coadjutor (heir apparent) Bishop of Alabama, George Murray.

This aggregation has not yet been able to effect a complete coup in Executive Council, but it did manage to pass in 1965 a measure which in effect forbade all clergy on the Episcopal headquarters staff to participate in civil rights demonstrations without permission of the local bishop. Several of these headquarters clergy had taken part in such demonstrations and Alabama's senior Bishop, C. J. C. Carpenter, had told them all to go home instead of to Selma. The measure passed by Executive Council constituted an almost unprecedented clergy restriction. But only after receiving vehement protests from such giant dioceses as Massachusetts and California were the liberal and moderate members of Executive Council able to rescind this gag law of the Shadegg-Crump machine.

Although stymied in this particular attempt, the machine has made an impression upon national headquarters staff. The possibility of a right-wing take-over is a critical issue today in hundreds of local Episcopal churches. Yet when this writer visited national headquarters in New York City and requested material on the right wing from the Department of Christian Social Relations, not one Episcopal publication was devoted to this problem (only a group of excellent pamphlets from the Anti-Defamation League or the National Council of Churches).

Will the right wing take over the Episcopal church? A lot will depend on Seattle—and according to a number of informed sources the man to watch in Seattle is Stephen C. Shadegg. Shadegg will not be a convention deputy from his home diocese of Arizona—he was absent during the diocesan election because he was busy helping engineer a Republican sweep in Arizona. However, he is entitled to be present as a member of the Executive Council, and he is expected to be there—particularly since he is a member of the Department of Promotion, which includes supervision of communications and, notably, the pressroom.

THE PRODIGIOUS SATELLITES

COMSAT, Ma BELL and ETV

EDMUND B. LAMBETH

Mr. Lambeth, a 1961-62 Congressional fellow of the American Political Science Association, is a Washington correspondent for Eastern newspapers.

Washington

Pierre Teilhard de Chardin, the late Jesuit paleontologist, once wrote that man's discovery of the electromagnetic frequency spectrum should be counted as a "prodigious biological event." Prodigious, one can agree, in that through it men are now probing the outer reaches of the galaxy, sending television across continents, dispatching taxis, freight cars, plumbers and mobile pizzerias. And it was also a biological event in that media using the spectrum play a pivotal role in the way human societies organize and inform themselves.

Indeed, if we are to believe Gen. James M. Gavin (Ret.), chairman of the board of Arthur D. Little, Inc., the spectrum—properly exploited by communications satellites—may well be the device that enables our species to survive. Speaking in December to the American Institute of Aeronautics and Astronautics, Gavin declared:

Those who do our work in space now know that we can communicate from any point on earth to another, at once. We also know that we live in times of terrible danger of nucleacide.

Isn't it past time, therefore, that we take the first tentative steps to establish a global communications system under an international body—the United Nations, for example—that will begin to minimize the dangers of nuclear holocaust, the danger of massive killings through war.

I would urge the establishment of a global communications network under the auspices of the United Nations. Associated with this should be a program to place receivers in almost every village and hamlet.

Such a network should broadcast nonmilitary information such as weather reports, crop information, results of sports competitions, cultural programs and nonpolitical news.

Ultimately, through an agency sponsored by the United Nations, a sophistication in communications can be realized that such a network would be useful in enabling the family of man to live together in familiarity and harmony.

Coming from the man who was given a written, pre-Sputnik order from the Pentagon not to attempt a satellite launch, this estimate is a symbolic and fitting background against which to assess the prospects of harnessing the new technology to human needs. The assessment is timely because of five developments.

First, the Ford Foundation has proposed that satellites are ready to deliver a "people's dividend" in the form of a noncommercial, educational television network.

Second, an authoritative report now imminent from the Carnegie Commission on Educational TV is likely to recommend that ETV be transformed from a hand-me-down into a strong new medium for the intellectual and economic growth of the country.

Third, a fight is under way before the Federal Communications Commission over the right to serve the rapidly evolving market for domestic satellite service.

Fourth, it is now clear that the Communications Satellite Corp., chartered by Congress to build a global satellite system, wants and feels its health requires a stake in the domestic market.

Fifth, the Administration appears ready to recommend that Congress enact legislation permitting the merger of Comsat's competitors, the international common carriers—a combine to include perhaps even Comsat itself, as well as the domestic Western Union Telegraph Co.

The confluence of these five developments has caught short those who consigned the satellite to a sleepy future. Indeed, when President Kennedy signed the Communications Satellite Act on August 31, 1962, few realized how quickly satellite technology would advance toward its ultimate goal—taking the cost out of distance.

The Telstar-type, low orbiting satellite could "see" two points on the globe for relatively short periods of time. Therefore, upward of thirty satellites and many earth stations were thought necessary to establish the global communications system mandated by the 1962 law.

This could have meant the commitment of most of the $200 million that the public and private communications firms invested in Comsat. But by 1964 the space agency, chiefly with a satellite designed by the Hughes Aircraft Co., had demonstrated the feasibility of the synchronous orbiting satellite, a few of which would cover most of the earth's surface. These "stationary" relays, 22,300 miles out in space, also require fewer and less complicated ground stations. The result was that when Comsat launched Early Bird on April 6, 1965, the costs of a global system had been reduced dramatically.

This sudden technical advance will place Comsat, much earlier than anticipated, in a position to charge telecommunications users less than do the common carriers. Transmission can be cheaper via satellite than by cable because the equipment to be amortized costs less. Satellites are also more flexible than cables because the latter connect directly only two points, while with proper equipment a satellite system can reach many points simultaneously.

The failure of Lani Bird, the second commercial satellite, to attain a full stationary orbit over the Pacific indicates that satellites as reliable and long-lived as cables have not yet been perfected. Yet Lani Bird does not negate the fact that Comsat, for less than $75 million, can provide cross-oceanic circuits equivalent to those which it costs common carriers $500 million to provide by cable. This advantage has stimulated in Comsat management an aggressiveness toward the common carriers that was not foreseen when Congress chartered the corporation.

The Comsat stock, originally offered at $20 per share, is split by law into two blocs, with half owned by the carriers and half owned by 150,000 persons who bought on the open market. The giant American Telephone and Telegraph Co. owns 29 per cent of the carrier bloc, International Telephone and Telegraph Co. owns 10.5 per cent, and lesser amounts are held by the other carriers.

On Comsat's board sit six representatives of the carriers, six appointed by management to represent the public shareholders, and three appointed by the President to represent the public at large. (Despite its overwhelming private ownership and orientation, most newsmen persist in calling the company a "quasi-public" corporation.)

James D. O'Connell, the federal director of telecommunications management, once described Comsat to Congress as an "organization with a built-in conflict." He was referring to the competing interest of Comsat itself and the carriers represented on its board in the ground stations which provide the lucrative up-and-down links to the relays in space. Ground stations add to a company's rate base (capital investment), against which allowable profits are calculated.

As O'Connell explained to a subcommittee headed by Rep. Chet Holifield (D., Calif.): "The more rate base which the individual carriers get out of this satellite business, the less rate base the public-owned segment of the [Comsat] stock gets. This is perhaps an oversimplification but it seems very simple. It is a fact." This corporate structure can scarcely be comforting to Comsat's stockholders, half of whom hold less than ten shares.

As operating plans have rapidly developed, the aggressive Comsat management has been handled severely by the FCC, which in the past eighteen months has:

- (1) Ruled that Comsat cannot sell its services directly to private users, but must transact business as a "carrier's carrier" for established communications firms.
- (2) Decided that Comsat can by-pass the carriers to deal directly with the government only in exceptional cases—each of which must be decided by the FCC.
- (3) Overturned its previous decision, which gave Comsat full rights to the first three earth stations, and held that Comsat will own 50 per cent of a six-station network, with the carriers sharing ownership in the other half.

Whatever else one may say about these decisions, their net effect is to protect the common carriers against the impact of the new satellite technology. In fairness, it must be added that the FCC has instructed the carriers to lower cable rates, and has promised to adopt regulations that would stimulate use of the six-station global network. But one can be forgiven for believing the cable rate reductions to be more a result of Comsat's efforts to deal directly with the government than of FCC instructions.

The FCC has a point when it notes the carriers are at a disadvantage because of Comsat's monopoly of the space segment. The terrestrial carriers, according to the FCC, are thus under an "artificial restraint." But the public interest is not served by removing from the market the pressure for lower rates that comes from giving at least the government the right to deal directly with Comsat.

An example is the Pentagon's need for thirty more Pacific circuits. Comsat bid $4,000 per half circuit compared to bids of $10,000 to $12,500 by Western Union International, ITT World Communications and RCA Communications. Seeing themselves high bidders, the carriers then countered with "composite rates" of $7,100 per half circuit to supply not only the Pentagon's thirty new Pacific circuits (after first leasing them from Comsat) but also ninety-eight cable circuits. On a government-wide basis, according to the FCC, the common carriers' plan would offer $5,260,000 in savings compared to $2 million for Comsat's. The question then is whether the public interest is best served by a $3.2 million saving or by an arrangement that preserves the government's right to have direct access to a technology that promises even cheaper rates in the future.

Perhaps the FCC's most important decision was the ruling that Comsat must share ownership of its ground stations with the carriers. This decision meant a 25 per cent cut in a projected rate base (on which profits are calculated) of $80 million for Comsat in 1968. For the common carriers, with a collective rate base of $490 million, it meant a 4 per cent increase.

However favorable to the carriers, the FCC's decision must be viewed in a broader light. Without some such compromise, the disputes between the carriers and Comsat would certainly have meant long proceedings before the FCC, thus delaying creation of a global system. The government, for reasons of prestige and diplomacy, did not wish to take that risk. For reasons of profit, neither did Comsat.

In 1969 the interim, non-treaty arrangements governing Comsat's relationship with the international consortium will expire. Unless it has a global system in being at that time, Comsat's leadership of the fifty-three other nations will almost certainly be challenged by the Europeans.

Complicating the whole picture is the prospect that the Administration will ask Congress for legislation permitting a merger of the international carriers, with or without Comsat. In the past, such a merger has been opposed by the Justice Department on antitrust grounds. No matter what form the legislation takes, it is certain to provoke deserved controversy.

This, then, is the context in which the Ford Foundation has charged into the arcane world of the telecommunications industry, proposing what McGeorge Bundy, the foundation's president, called a "people's dividend" (in the form of an educational network) from the nation's heavy investment in space. To the global competition, this proposal added a flock of questions as to how the domestic potentials of satellite transmission should be allocated.

Briefly, Ford's idea is to use a set of non-Comsat satellites to distribute network television through a broadcasters' nonprofit corporation. This would be so much cheaper than present distribution methods that the networks could be charged more than the true cost of transmission, and the substantial sums thus accumulated applied to the operation of a noncommercial network. Bundy declared:

Comsat faces international horizons which can engage its full energies for decades to come.

The prosperity of all does not require for any a monopoly of the space communications available to the American people.

And for the common carriers the revenue presently at issue is less than 1 per cent of a business which grows by more than that in every season of the year.

Ford's proposal has turned much-needed public attention on the FCC's inquiry into whether private satellite systems, outside Comsat, should be authorized to meet special needs. In essence, it is a first step toward authorizing a domestic communications satellite service.

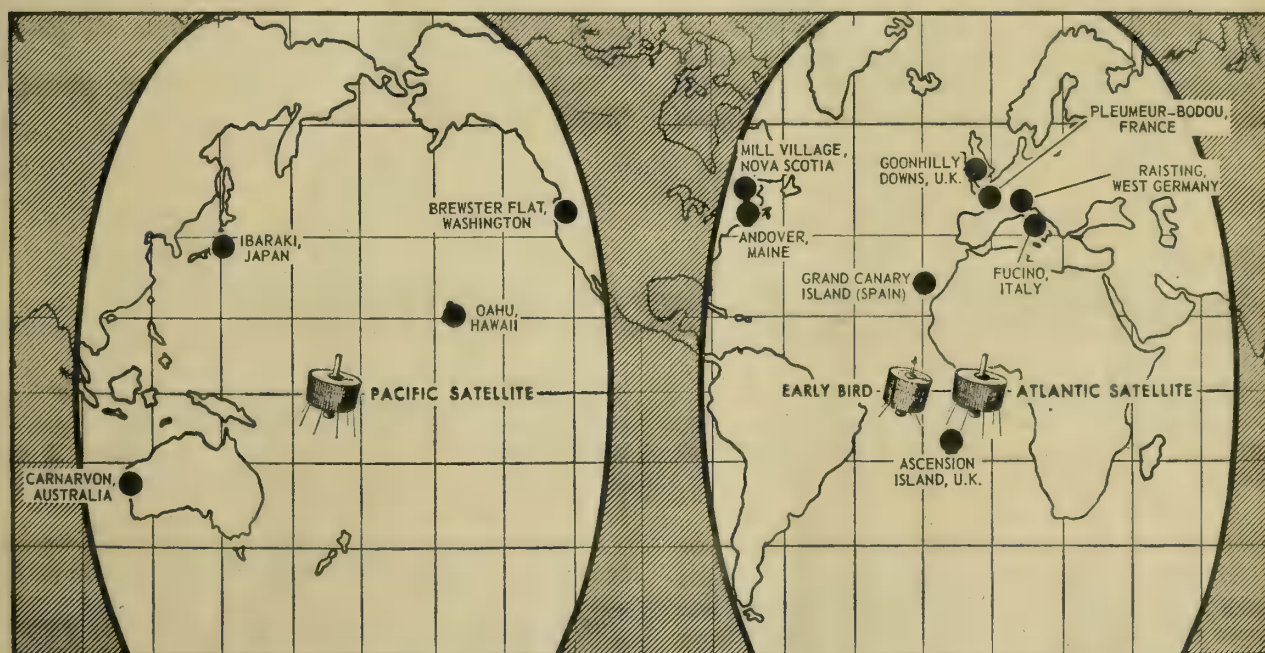

One virtue of the Ford proposal is that AT&T and Comsat, threatened with a parallel satellite system, have brought forward plans which, from the technical standpoint, can easily handle a new noncommercial network. One of the common carriers even suggested that a special low rate be allowed for ETV.

A weakness in the plan, submitted on August 1, was that it mistakenly estimated that most of an ETV network's needs could be financed by savings inherent in satellite transmission as opposed to the AT&T microwave now used. In its December 12 filing with the FCC, Ford admitted that there would be a deficit of $100 million, even with the savings from satellites. That is the fact that must be faced by Congress and the Administration in 1967: a federal tax and/or surcharge on all satellite users will have to be enacted if an ETV network is to be established.

Unfortunately, the profound benefits possible under a noncommercial and instructional television network are not widely understood in the country. Music, art, drama, news, documentaries, closed-circuit professional conferences, classes for the poor are among the objectives outlined before the FCC on behalf of satellite ETV.

The Ford Foundation, which in the past has spent $100 million on local ETV (far more than the federal government), plans to spend another $10 million to put on a fall nation-wide demonstration using land lines. One would hope that it could come while Congress is in session, as a belated terrestrial reply to AT&T's launch of Telstar during the 1962 filibuster over the Comsat bill.

Many of the pieces in the complicated ETV puzzle will fall into place when the Carnegie Commission issues its report. It will assess not just satellite ETV but ETV generally. In particular it will bring into public view potentials of new and inexpensive means of video recording and playback. In general it will ventilate the issues that both video recording and satellite TV pose, namely, centralized control of instructional and other material.

First Satellites in the Global Network, with Ground Stations Thus Far Established

One hopes that it will present a thoughtful answer to the financing question as well as to the problem of what type of organization can most intelligently handle programming. A danger is that differences of opinion over financing ETV will divert attention from the crucial question of how to establish a domestic satellite service.

The public interest is not clearly apparent in any of the rival plans now before the FCC. AT&T would have Comsat build the satellites and the carriers control the earth stations. All types of users, from telephone to television, would have access. "Ma Bell," as usual, is arguing for the "economies of scale" in regulated monopolies. The company also warns against the air-wave interference that might be expected if multiple satellite systems are authorized for special needs, such as Ford or the three commercial networks propose.

But AT&T's plan would allow carriers with their heavy investment in old technologies to control, in effect, the rate at which the public will gain access to cheaper communications tools.

On the other hand, AT&T's plan proposes the use of frequencies never before considered feasible for commercial applications. The introduction of a new frequency band would have the effect of relieving pressure on the spectrum. And that pressure is already so great that a telecommunications science panel at the Commerce Department described it as a "silent crisis" that is having a slowing effect on the nation's economic growth rate.

Ford's plan and one offered by the networks—while conflicting—speak persuasively to the basic point that there need not be monopoly in the domestic system. But these plans, concerned with specialized needs, fudge over the problem of how less glamorous uses, such as telephone, telegraph and computer communications, can be served. The American Newspaper Publishers Association found it necessary to tell the FCC that no matter what role is given Comsat and the common carriers, the commission should not rule out one or more private satellite systems.

The allegations that such competitive systems would cause harmful interference on the air waves can easily be tested by a neutral party such as the space agency; the FCC does not have to rely on the testimony of those with a pecuniary interest in the matter.

It is easy to sympathize with the neo-Populist who yearns to clip a "people's dividend" from the new technology. Indeed, since the government through June, 1966, has spent more than $493 million on communications satellites alone, it is not unreasonable to demand that, at a minimum, action be taken to give the nation a decent non-commercial educational network.

The situation is disconcerting, too, because the FCC, the institution with most responsibility for weighing the equities of the matter, has been intellectually and financially starved for twenty years.

One avenue of action open to concerned politicians, eggheads and citizens is to present a much richer context in which these upcoming major governmental decisions can be made. The time is ripe for an assessment in depth—from a consumer's point of view—of how the communications industry plans to use the new technology to serve its many varied clients.

A starting point would be the telecommunications science panel's report to Commerce Secretary John T. Connor, which, among other things, noted:

The electromagnetic spectrum usable for telecommunications is an extremely valuable, in fact essential, but also limited resource, which must be shared nationally and internationally.

It is an unusual resource in that it is not depleted by use. However, its value at any specific time can be drastically reduced by misuse.

It is unusual in another sense in that it is currently allocated without a use charge and with no quantitative measure of its value to the national welfare.

With its domestic satellite house put in order, the country could then perhaps get on with the nobler and knottier challenge envisioned by Gavin.

That indeed would be, in Father Teilhard's phrase, "prodigious biological event."

REUNION IN WARSAW

REMEMBERING NUREMBERG

VICTOR H. BERNSTEIN

Mr. Bernstein, a free-lance writer, was managing editor of The Nation from 1952 to 1963. He is the author of Final Judgment: The Story of Nuremberg.

It almost seemed that the Poles had the gift of prescience. They sent out their invitations months before a resurgent German Right marched to the polls last November, and a former Nazi was elevated to the chancellorship at Bonn. I received mine early in July. "We invite you," it said, "to take part in a Meeting of Former Nuremberg Trial Correspondents to take place in Warsaw on Nov. 11 and 12 to mark the twentieth anniversary of the trial." It was signed in behalf of an ad hoc committee of the Polish Journalists Association.

I was pleased that someone had thought the trial anniversary worth marking.* For eleven months in 1945-46 the

*Only after returning home did I learn that the National Lawyers Guild had noted the occasion with a meeting in Washington, D. C.

Nuremberg courthouse had commanded major headlines in a shocked world press; for a few years after that, lawyers and journalists (myself included) had published appraisals of what took place there. After that came a period of forgetting—a forgetting so complete that an American President could go before a crowd of roaring Germans and say, apparently quite without reservation or inhibition, Ich bin ein Berliner. Only in the last year has the word Nuremberg begun to reappear in the American vocabulary; specifically, in the speech of civil liberties attorneys, who cite the Nuremberg judgment in defense of boys who refuse to fight in Vietnam.

On our way to Warsaw, my wife and I stopped at Nuremberg. I had not been there since the trial, and I wanted to see whether Nuremberg's memory was any better than ours in America. From tourist pamphlets picked up in our hotel lobby I learned that Nuremberg is 900 years old; that during World War II Allied bombers destroyed 45.6 per cent of all homes and heavily damaged another 14.8 per cent; that the people of Nuremberg had rebuilt these structures and added more; and that parts of the old town had been rebuilt with exact fidelity to the originals. But of Julius Streicher and the Party Days, the Nuremberg Laws and the trial—nothing.

I mentioned the omissions to a local journalist—a young, well-informed German of liberal leanings. "We don't like to be reminded of our guilt," he said. "When Speer and von Shirach were released from prison a few weeks ago, some German papers gave it a big play; the Nuremberg papers buried it in a paragraph or so on an inside page." He thought a moment. "During the campaign before our last municipal election, the neo-Nazis were very active. My newspaper attacked them violently. But they won 5 per cent of the vote, and for the first time since the war won seats on the city legislature. Our editors decided that we had given them too much publicity and that henceforth we would ignore them." Ignoring them didn't help either; in the recent elections, Nuremberg gave the National Democratic Party 13 per cent of the city's total vote—more than any other large German community.

In the evening our journalist friend drove us to the grounds, once so familiar to millions of newsreel viewers, where the Nazis had celebrated their annual Party Day. The stone platform and balcony rail which served as Hitler's reviewing stand have been left untouched by man, but not by nature. Grass sprouts from crevices in the stone; and at the opposite end of the grounds, hidden now in the darkness, GIs have built a baseball diamond. Nearby stands another artifact of Hitler's 1,000-year Reich: the great coliseum, or Party Congress Hall, for which Hitler never did find the time to build a roof, and for which Nuremberg's architects and city planners have not yet found a use. "Practically nobody comes here now," said our guide, "except members of the Nuremberg Philharmonic. They use one of the rooms as a rehearsal hall."

The next morning I visited the courthouse, most of which is now occupied by administrators of the U.S. Post Exchange system for Europe. In an end wing, the German judiciary sits; and on the top floor of this wing, in Room 600, U.S. Chief Counsel Robert Jackson opened the American case twenty years ago:

In the prisoners' dock stand twenty-odd broken men. The forces which these defendants represent are the darkest and most sinister forces in society. . . . Their acts have bathed the world in blood and set civilization back a century.

The defendants are mostly gone; the trial, and time, have seen to that. The forces they represented are another matter.

From a German information clerk, I learned that Germans are not curious about the history of Room 600, but Americans are, and sometimes other foreign visitors. To meet this demand, American authorities have arranged semi-weekly one-hour guided tours of the courtroom, the prison cells downstairs and the execution chamber, now a wood-working room for German prisoners.

In the courtyard, I fell into conversation with a middle-aged German whose car was parked next to mine. "Oh yes, I remember the trial of the war criminals," he said spitefully. "Look how many wars there have been since! And have there been any more Nuremberg trials? Why did everybody pick on us?"

We arrived in Warsaw the day before the conference opened. The organizing committee had set up an information office, manned by multilingual personnel, in the hotel at which all the foreign participants were lodged. I was told there would be thirty-one conferees: six Poles, seven Russians, seven Frenchmen, five Britons, three Czechs, a Hollander, a Yugoslav, and myself as the only American.

Since hundreds of newsmen had covered the trial in whole or in part, the turn-out seemed to me disappointing. The committee chairman told me: "We could not find a complete list of accredited correspondents. Then we had difficulty making contact; many people proved untraceable and a number have died. Altogether we sent out 150 invitations. In view of the time and expense involved in coming here, especially from distant countries, a 20 per cent turn-out is not bad."

Many who did come brought with them formidable credentials. Dominique Auclerc of Le Figaro, Boris Afanasiev of Tass and Sefton Delmar, formerly of the London Daily Express, are journalists known in many countries outside their own. And since Nuremberg others among us had built reputations in fields other than journalism. Among the French were Pierre Bouzat, Secretary General of the International Association for Penal Law, and Didier Lazard of the Institute of Political Studies; the Russian delegation included several jurists and a poet, Siemion Kirsanov; Yugoslavia, too, was represented by a poet, Oscar Davico; and among the Britons was a writer, Lord Russell of Liverpool (no relation to the fire-eating nonagenarian) who participated in the British Zone war-crimes trials as a deputy judge advocate general.

The Poles had given the matter of conference procedures much thought. There would be five sessions, they said, spread over two days; they proposed that the chair be rotated among the representatives of the Big Four plus Poland. Between sessions, the five chairmen would serve as a steering committee. As for agenda, there was to be none: everyone should be free to discuss whatever was on his mind, subject only to the chairman's decision as to relevance. To encourage still further the free exchange of ideas, it might be agreed that no published report of the conference would cite any speaker by name. (I have abided by that restriction in what follows here.)

The Poles felt strongly that our generation has forgotten Nuremberg, and that the younger generation has never been told about it. "I would hope," the committee chairman said, "that the conference will find a way to point up this problem." Then he added: "We have also in mind the establishment of a small office, perhaps here in Poland, to publicize the resurgence of Nazism wherever and whenever it occurs." I thought there would be much support for such an office. "But," I said, "suppose an ex-Nazi is appointed to an important position in East Germany. Will you feel free to criticize? How far does your 'wherever' extend?" One of the other Poles in the group smiled. Nothing further was said on the subject—then, or during the succeeding two days of conferences.

Our meetings were held at Jablonna Castle on the outskirts of Warsaw, once the home of Polish aristocracy, now used for conferences and as a weekend resort for Polish academicians. We sat comfortably around the rim of long tables arranged in a square. To emphasize the personal and unofficial nature of the meeting, we were placed alphabetically by name, and not by country. I sat between a Frenchman and a Russian. Four-way instantaneous translation was provided: Polish, French, English and Russian.

From the time I had received my invitation I had expected that the conference would at some point shift to an attack on American policy in Vietnam. The link to Nuremberg was plain enough: the Nuremberg judgment had laid down strictures against wars of aggression, against genocide, against the defense of "superior order." If American attorneys were citing Nuremberg against the war, could one expect the Communists to do less?

If the subject came up, I, as the only American present, would be expected to say something. And that was the trouble. If I had no desire to defend an American policy in which I disbelieved, I was equally reluctant to join in an attack in these circumstances. While I do not believe in geographic limits to freedom of speech, I prefer to do my dissenting at home.

The early sessions did not allay my apprehensions; they merely postponed them. The chairman of the organizing committee welcomed us gracefully, and summarized the questions he hoped we would discuss: What were the permanent values of the Nuremberg trial? What is the trial's relevance to the contemporary scene?

The session chairman took over and recognized the first speaker, a Russian. We journalists, he said, had the "moral responsibility" to keep alive the memory of Nuremberg. "But in this we failed, for the young generation doesn't know what happened there—and there are many people, especially across the water, who have turned their backs upon it." (So early? I thought. Is the attack coming now? No, not yet.) In West Germany, the speaker continued, "the past is becoming again a political reality." He praised West German intellectuals who opposed Nazism: "We must protect them against what may happen in their country." Europe's tensions, he went on, will continue until East Germany is recognized, there is formal acceptance of Poland's western border, and Bonn drops its Hallstein Doctrine (under which West Germany refuses diplomatic relations with any country recognizing East Germany). Possible West German access to nuclear weapons was also a serious problem: "We are not afraid that they will use the bomb in battle; we are afraid that they will use it as blackmail to achieve their aims."

The next speaker, a Pole, picked up the problem of re-educating the world about Nuremberg. He had made a "superficial" study of the treatment given the trial by various encyclopedias, and he was not happy. His chief criticism was leveled at Brockhaus, the standard encyclopedia in West Germany, which he contrasted with Meyers, common in East Germany. He found the latter's treatment to be "correct and honest" and German war guilt discussed frankly and as frankly condemned; though, he added, "in all fairness" the Meyers entry should have pointed out that West Germany is still bringing war criminals into court. Brockhaus, on the other hand, he found "emotionally uncommitted" in its treatment. It pedantically lists what it calls the "deficiencies" of the war crimes trials, neglects to say that at Nuremberg all but one of the defendants were found guilty of crimes against humanity as well as of war crimes, and barely mentions the extermination of Jewry. "Without doubt," Brockhaus notes, "some of the war crimes trials were concerned with real crimes." This is the closest the encyclopedia comes to expressing an editorial point of view.

The British journalist who spoke next had arrived in Warsaw direct from a meeting of the German Right in Bavaria. "The speakers must have been educated by Brockhaus," he said grimly. Three thousand people had paid two marks (50c) each to hear speeches exonerating the Germans of war guilt. Most of the audience were middle-aged or older, but there was a sprinkling of youth. "If industry money ever swings behind the National Democrats, we are in for real trouble." The great menace, he thought, lies in German Irredentism: "No matter how much retribution the Germans make to Jews and their other victims, they remain a danger to peace as long as they persist in demanding the return of territory."

At this point, a French journalist added a footnote: "Twenty years ago we should have told the Germans: 'You will remain occupied until you accept, officially and permanently, your postwar boundaries.' Now it is too late."

The next few speakers swung back to Nuremberg. "The cold war," said a Pole, "buried the guilt of the Nazis." (And blunted the American conscience? It will come now, I thought. But it didn't.) "We are now forced into the position of defending the Nuremberg trial." The speaker cited the "incredible fact" that a West German has brought suit against an American member of the prosecution staff, now living in West Germany, for having helped to deliver the Nuremberg defendants to the hangman.

A Polish jurist depreciated the pessimism expressed so far. "From a legal point of view, the Nuremberg judgment has achieved much." Its principles are embodied in the UN Declaration of Human Rights, in the Convention on Genocide and in the 1949 Geneva Convention on the Protection of the Victims of War, as well as in the 1947 peace treaty with Italy. The Nuremberg judgment is cited directly in the treaty with Japan of 1951. In 1949, the UN General Assembly asked its International Law Commission to codify the principles and to examine the possibility of establishing an international penal court to administer them. "The commission, technically, is still charged with the task, but has done nothing since 1950. Politics, not law, has held up this task." A French jurist pointed out that disagreement between Moscow and Washington on the definition of aggression has held up this important work.

So went the first couple of sessions. At a late dinner, I found myself next to a Polish journalist whom I had known quite well at Nuremberg and in whose discretion—and information—I could trust. We discussed the proceedings and I asked: "Who will bring up Vietnam and Lord Russell's 'second Nuremberg'?"

My friend smiled. "Nobody on our side will bring up either subject. The Russians told us, before they came here, that they didn't want the conference turned into an anti-American, anti-Vietnamese demonstration. They were very positive about it. The Yugoslavs wanted to bring up Vietnam, but they have been persuaded not to. As for Lord Russell's plan, we don't take it seriously, and neither do the Russians. Whatever his faults, Johnson is no Hitler." (I thought this information of sufficient importance to warrant relaying to the U.S. Ambassador in Warsaw, and so informed my Polish friend. His reply took me aback. "But of course," he said. "Isn't it your duty as a citizen to report everything to your Ambassador?" In this instance, I took his advice. Subsequently, a Soviet journalist confirmed that his country had displayed little interest in Lord Russell's maneuver.)

My Polish friend's prophecy held up. During the final sessions, neither the United States nor Vietnam was mentioned, though there were a couple of near misses. The Yugoslav, in the course of an extraordinarily eloquent plea in behalf of the sanctity of human life, mentioned the word "napalm." And a Russian sternly reminded us that it is "the duty of intellectuals everywhere to defend humanity everywhere—in Europe, in America, in Africa and in Asia." (It is interesting that the two speakers who came nearest to attacking American policy were neither journalists, jurists nor politicians, but poets.)

In my own brief intervention, I expressed the view that there was little disposition in the United States to relieve the Nuremberg defendants of their burden of guilt; indeed, I suggested, by determinedly fixing war guilt on dead Germans, we have found it easier to exculpate the living. ("I bet a lot of Germans are thinking along the same lines," a Frenchman sitting near me muttered.)

The final session was interrupted for a visit with Poland's Premier Josef Cyrankiewicz at his offices. Over coffee, served in aristocratic purple and gold china, the Premier spoke of his days as a prisoner at Auschwitz and Mauthausen. Then he switched to relations with today's two Germanys. On reunification: "This can come only after recognition of the German Democratic Republic as a sovereign state, and recognition by Bonn of the border status quo. How can we accept as a neighbor a government which refuses to recognize our Western border?" On democracy in West Germany: "We support the democratic elements in West Germany, especially the youth and intellectuals. Unhappily, we are convinced that these elements exert little influence on their country's policies." On the West German Right: "The danger is as great as thirty years ago. The problem is not how strong, numerically, is the National Democratic Party, but whether it is in fact isolated from the German people. I am sorry to say that the nationalist program expresses the subconscious of the majority of Germans, just as the Nazi program did from the party's earliest days." On East German nationalism: "No doubt it exists, but what is important is the attitude of the governing circles. In East Germany the government educates its youth to the truth about the Nazis and World War II; it is eradicating many German military traditions; it has formally recognized our Western border and in other ways cooperates with us. That is why we support the regime in East Berlin."

I thought the Premier's attack on West Germany an impressive performance. It would have been more impressive had I not seen him drive off, afterward, in a Mercedes.

Back at Jablonna Castle, in the final minutes of our closing session, we approved the text of a message to UNESCO, asking that organization to review, with an eye to suggesting improvements, the sources from which world youth is most likely to obtain its knowledge of the evidence uncovered at Nuremberg: school texts, encyclopedias and mass-communications media generally. We also approved a general press release which noted, inter alia, that "the conferees took notice of an appeal by the jurists among them that the United Nations complete its task . . . of formulating an international penal code to be administered by an international court of justice. . . . It was further agreed that the imposition of any statute of limitations for war crimes would be contrary to the principles of morality and justice."

The Poles' motive for calling this conference was in part intensely partisan and political: they want the Oder-Neisse border recognized, and they don't want any German reunification which threatens to dilute East Berlin with Bonn. But to emphasize these political factors is to neglect, I think, the dominating element in Slav thinking: the burning fear of a revival of the German Right. This became clear not only at the conference table (where every Slav repeatedly used the word "genocide," treating it not as a historic phenomenon but as a living threat), but also on Warsaw's streets. Scores of wall plaques, scattered through the city, mark spots where Polish resistance fighters, or Polish hostages, fell before Nazi bullets; and more often than not, a fresh flower or two lies on the sidewalk beneath the memorial. For the Pole, the remembrance of things past is ordained as national policy. Polish school children are routinely taken on tours of Warsaw and shown the plaques, the ghetto memorial and other monuments to Nazi savagery.

I am aware, of course, of widespread current reports of continued Polish anti-Semitism. I met no overt signs of this in Warsaw. There were several Jews in the Polish delegation to the conference, and they seemed neither happier nor less happy than their colleagues. Outside the conference, I heard several things which disturbed me, but I had no opportunity to check them. I did get the impression that the few thousand Jews left in the country are in process of rapid and complete assimilation. Other and more qualified observers have been similarly impressed.

For some of us, then, the conference served a useful purpose: it made us see today's Germany through the eyes of Eastern Europe. The meetings could, of course, have tried—and with the utmost relevance—to do much more. The purpose of the international trial at Nuremberg was not only to punish aggressors but to lay down the law against aggression; not only to dispense justice to war criminals but to stop war crimes and crimes against peace. Many speakers took cognizance of this broader context, but none directly assayed the implications. Perhaps it is just as well. Had the Russians brought up Vietnam, one or more of us from the West would surely have brought up Stalin's concentration camps, or Khrushchev's tanks in Budapest, East Berlin and Warsaw. And, in turn, we would have had to fight the battle of the Bay of Pigs, and of the Dominican Republic, all over again.

I think, instinctively, we recognized that there are priorities in villainies as in everything else; after all, it had been neither the Russians nor ourselves who had turned Europe into an abattoir a little more than twenty years ago. So we stuck to our chosen priority. The only thing is, I thought as I gathered up my notes, East Europe needs no education on this particular subject. We should have held our conference not in Warsaw but in Nuremberg.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Styles in Educated Females

LIFE STYLES OF EDUCATED WOMEN. By Eli Ginzberg and others. Columbia University Press. 224 pp. $5.95.

EDUCATED AMERICAN WOMEN: Self-Portraits. Edited by Eli Ginzberg. Columbia University Press. 224 pp. $5.95.

WOMEN AND THE SCIENTIFIC PROFESSIONS. Edited by Jacquelyn A. Mattfeld and Carol G. Van Aken. The M.I.T. Press. 250 pp. $6.95.

THELMA McCORMACK

Mrs. McCormack teaches sociology at York University in Toronto.

Brainy women have always had their admirers as well as their detractors. From Héloïse to Franny, the female student has had a special place in literature. While among undergraduate women themselves, whether educated at school or privately, at home or abroad, in convents or secular institutions, life style has always been a major concern. Cushioned by wealth and leisure, exempt from work, these women were uniquely qualified to make the subtle normative and aesthetic choices that inspired novelists, playwrights and moralists (but not the social scientist). The choices, however, were narrow, variations within a class style, embellishing, refining, but not changing a culture. At best, it was an honorable tradition. Educated women dedicated themselves to art, to God, to orphans, to the deserving poor. At worst, it was frivolous, silly and childish. But either way, educated women were privileged women, providing models for other privileged women.

With mass education, educated women are no longer drawn exclusively from the upper class, and those who are wish to dissociate themselves from the unproductive life, from patterns of leisure that are synonymous with patterns of consumption. The young heiress pleads poverty and yearns to prove herself through merit scholarships and work. Like other producers, she wishes to be paid as a symbol of her achievement and her democratic solidarity with the middle class. In short, the life style of the educated woman is no longer a class style even for those who have this option.

But if the life style of educated women is no longer a class style, what is it? And if it is not contingent upon leisure, where and how is it expressed? Can work in an industrial society replace consumption as the basis of life style?

Examining the life styles of educated women in Eli Ginzberg's study of women who held fellowships at Columbia University (from 1945-51), nothing emerges so clearly as the lack of style. Having left behind them an undergraduate culture with its mannerisms or pseudo styles, these women go forth from Morningside Heights to become white-collar workers in government and academic bureaucracies, or to become suburban matrons committed to Kinder, CORE and gourmet Küche. Occasionally they surface, protesting against discrimination in hiring and promotion, the lack of domestic help and the disappearance of the extended family, bemoaning nepotism rules and the distances between home and library. But the overall impression is of a group of women who are intelligent, rarely intellectual; competent, rarely creative; performing necessary and useful services, rarely critical. Not a Beatrice Webb or a Simone de Beauvoir, not a Hannah Arendt or a Simone Weil among them. They are in every sense of the word—socially, intellectually and economically—underemployed.

Why this feminine trahison des clercs? The explanation lies, I think, along four dimensions: (1) the value system of women who go to graduate schools; (2) the programs of study in graduate schools; (3) the type of employment sought or available; and, above all, (4) the difficulties in a competitive individualistic society of converting job into vocation.

Graduate women in this study are generally middle class, from families where one parent was a college graduate; three out of four had mothers who worked either before or after marriage. The tone of graduate school is set, then, by a type of woman who is there for a specific purpose. Training herself for a job or economic self-sufficiency ("if it should ever be necessary"), she is not inclined to sit around speculating on Final Causes or to develop the conspiratorial group pride of an earlier generation of bluestocking renegades. Five out of six women, Ginzberg found, did graduate work in the same or closely related fields as their undergraduate majors. In other words, the women who go to graduate school do so for advanced specialization, and they are not the women plagued by self-doubt or philosophical Angst.

Graduate schools, alas, are not "think tanks." They reflect and reinforce a narrow vision by encouraging specialization and rewarding the most promising future specialists. It is not for all minds and all temperaments. But more crucial for the development of life style is the emphasis in the American graduate school on developing a professional attitude. Professionalism is defined as methodological sophistication, detachment, noninvolvement and objectivity. In the short run, this emphasis is to a woman's advantage, liberating her from the stereotype which associates femininity with subjectivity, sentimentality and irrationality. In the long run, however, it is a disservice, deepening a separation between mind and experience, denying the fusion of knowledge and life. After all, it was not objectivity that made Beatrice Webb, Simone de Beauvoir, Hannah Arendt or Simone Weil, but history, their own direct or indirect involvement in it, their sensitivity to human experience which made them acutely conscious of where established concepts failed.

A curriculum which concentrates so strongly on method results in polarizing intelligent women between tough-minded careerists and tender-minded amateurs, between those who refuse to make value judgments and those who do nothing but. Hence, the educated woman supported by a husband may curse her good fortune instead of regarding it as a godsend, as a Fulbright without strings. She does not use her leisure to explore what Robert S. Lynd called the "outrageous hypotheses" or the speculative inquiries that are an anathema to the established profession or the long-range studies neglected by men in pursuit of promotion. Instead, her leisure is dissipated. Her face is pressed against the windows of offices, classrooms and laboratories, giving moral support to her former classmates within. Inside, the more critical women find their output increasingly irrelevant and, after a long day of committee and paper work, come to suspect that they have won a Pyrrhic victory.

Classifying the careers of graduate women, Professor Ginzberg discerns various types and subgroups within them: women striving for independence and self-expression; women who wish to be influential; a third group whose orientation is supportive; a fourth whose approach is communal. Of these, the largest statistically was the first group; the smallest was the communal; her prototype was a nun. In view of this distribution, any comparison between the modern educated working woman and her frontier antecedent is spurious. The frontier woman was not concerned with self-expression but in protecting, maintaining and developing a viable, independent community. Her counterpart today is not found in the United States but in countries where the state has replaced the community. In this context, as on the frontier, the successful, aggressive woman does not threaten the male ego, for his ego, like hers, is subordinate to the transcending ideological task. American feminists are puzzled and dismayed to find that in countries like India and Japan women are more fully accepted in the higher echelons and in such traditional male strongholds as science and politics. They forget that their own emancipation was historically part of a laissez-faire society, that their equality, like equality generally, was interpreted as freedom from social obligation, freedom to compete. Now they are trapped with this ideology and are the victims of its backlash.

Nowhere is the problem of competition with men more brutally confronted than in the sciences; that is, in the intellectual disciplines most closely connected with business enterprise, most closely associated with power, and most richly rewarded. This is why a book reporting a conference held at M.I.T. on women in science is so interesting. All the participants recognized that women in science were viewed by men as a "threat," but none questioned the competitive ethos or its relevance in such a collaborative process as science. Begging the question, they tried to find some workable formula whereby women could compete as equals—tactfully; in other words, how to live with or live down the myth of the castrating bitch.

The answer usually given is that all will turn out for the best if women keep in mind that their primary responsibility is to their children and husbands. Alice Rossi and Jesse Bernard are among the few to challenge this sacred cow, arguing that marriage is not for all women (Bernard) and children are the joint responsibility of fathers and mothers (Rossi). In other words, a broader interpretation of the roles of women. Bruno Bettelheim took a more orthodox line with respect to das Ewig-Weibliche, but not as rigid as some of his colleagues in psychiatry. There is, he says, a female approach, different from the male whether it is in the bedroom or the drafting room. Its essence is to embrace rather than conquer a problem, to interiorize rather than expand the boundaries. The problem of competition here is solved by complementary roles which parallel the sex roles.

Embrace or conquer, neither touches the crux of the problem which is the nature of commitment. These postures are stylistic but not style. Vocation is the only style that matters in intellectual life. It is neither the self-expression of the competing woman nor the self-denial of the ideological woman. It is more socially responsive than the first; more politically independent than the second. Science as calling, Max Weber once wrote, is total subordination to work in the knowledge that truths won in the struggle to dominate ignorance and confusion are quickly obsolete, forgotten in a ruthlessly advancing cumulative development. Personal glory is brief and cannot be consciously pursued or put aside, like surplus earnings, for future investment. Vocation, then, is not for prima donnas, entrepreneurs or martyrs, for its discipline depersonalizes ego.

It is a mistake, however, to suppose that there is something unnatural or superhuman or heroic about the discipline. Vocation is like any other organizing principle of life; its discipline is different from the others, but no more demanding in terms of human nature. Nor is vocation an arbitrary phenomenon, a voice within heard by the elect. There is nothing that we know about human nature and social organization to suggest that vocation cannot be an institutionalized pattern of social behavior in work and leisure. Indeed, one can argue that when vocation is restricted to a few, when it is the basis of an elite, the people involved develop the blind spots of an elite which distort the social function of vocation.

There is, then, a life style that is an alternative to a class style, and a life style that is based on work rather than consumption. But it has its own ground rules. American women, because they are marginal, not because they are women, are in a position to explore it. To institutionalize it, however, requires that the culture of work and leisure be changed radically; only after that, the roles of women. To change the roles of women without changing the culture is merely exchanging one form of alienation for another.

With the Saints and Martyrs

THE WOMAN WITH THE LITTLE FOX. By Violette Leduc. Translated by Derek Colman. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 297 pp. $4.95.

MURIEL HAYNES

Miss Haynes has written reviews for The Massachusetts Review, Studies on the Left, Book Week and the English publications, Views and Tribune.

The reviews of Violette Leduc's autobiography, La Bâtarde, struck me as vulgar or patronizing, sometimes both. The tactic employed was that described by Sartre in Saint Genet: separation of the writer's talent from his being, of which it is expression. The socio-historic meanings of Mlle. Leduc's life experience and their relation to her role as artist were generally unexplored. Satisfied that this bulging suitcase held nothing more than an assortment of soiled linen, our literary censors snapped the lid shut with a burst of middle-class moral judgments in which conventional male attitudes were frequently visible. Repugnance was mingled with some pity and a pious invocation of popular psychological labels. Her idiosyncratic prose was deservedly praised, yet here, too, one was plagued by obtuseness. Poetic or sensuously rich it might be, but its repetitively revealing imagery, its function as private symbolism for her psychic attitudes, were unremarked.

It was not her book, but her "honesty" and "courage" in writing it that all agreed was eminently commendable. So much consolation can be found in the purgative of a damned soul's confession! Our society has made outcasts of its artists; therefore some, by the admission of literal sins, are more outcast than others, and for that reason alone will find esteem. Mlle. Leduc's novels had gone unnoticed in France outside that small coterie which has its own inner necessity to seek salvation through linking arms with the saints and martyrs. When with La Bâtarde she was cast as Simone de Beauvoir's Genet (a role clearly awaiting a woman), her obscurity was exchanged for notoriety.

This collection of three novellas (her novels remain unpublished here), confirms an impression of her autobiography as an uneven, perfervid letter to the world in which she struggled to find the communion denied her in her life and writing. She was defeated. To the reasons adduced above, we must add her own artistic failure. The extraordinary intensity of her recall of childhood betrayal coerced her memoirs, as it had her existence, into a continuous howling re-enactment. One longed for the imposition of some distance, her release as well as ours, from that "frightful quantity of I's and me's," which Stendhal correctly foresaw could render the writer tiresome.

The fictional process has brought respite from Mlle. Leduc's self-indulgent trancelike stare at her mirrored reflection. She has shifted her eyes, as it were, to look over her shoulder. Pursuing herself from this changed perspective, backward and forward in time, she wrests from her overwhelming early experience a set of alternate possibilities. With these stories of three women, she moves us with minor, wholly original art.

La Bûtarde exasperated: the novellas are agitating. We waver between mystification and blood recognition; so, one imagines it must be, to witness primitive rites. Bits of objective information—a packet of instant pudding, typists' fingers, gift-wrap ribbon—tell us the events are of our day. But the evidence is irrelevant; we are floating in existential time. An intractable lens twists the familiar world into strange shapes which reason rejects but to which our instinct responds.

"What cause could she have for apprehension? Her world consisted of nothing but what she had invented." The old woman of the title story talks to herself as she wanders through Paris streets, back to her miserable room, hugging her mangy fox neckpiece. What we invent is wholly ours; we cannot be separated from it. In the invention lies our safety, our autonomy. The aged woman of "The Woman With the Little Fox," Clothilde in "The Golden Buttons," and Clarisse of "The Old Maid and the Dead Man," each remains the humiliated child for whom the stratagem of love is to circumvent loss by a gambit which permits absolute possession. Like herself, the old lady's love object is cast out, a foxpiece she rescued from a garbage can. Demanding nothing, eternally faithful, her little fox frees her from the agony of rejection. Her friends likewise make no claims; they are her silent familiars of the Paris scene whom she visits daily: "the gray monk, the river"; the stores whose windows' contents are "her family life"; the crowd which "engulfed her like a lover." Though she is starving, she forgoes bread to buy a Metro ticket to keep her assignation with the anonymous popsicle eater. "They sat together on the same bench, as train succeeded train, as she nibbled, as she sucked through the teeth and drank the saliva of a friend to whom she would never speak." The loved one becomes an extension of self, a self who "dreams for two," and who decides and caresses for two, the other passive, even indifferent. In the end, it is she who commits the act of infidelity, for she, being human, is alone free to exercise her will. In repentance for her treachery, she prepares for bed and puts on her foxpiece over her nightgown. "He would sleep forever and she would wear him always, curled around her neck."

Similarly, Clarisse evades the threatening duality of love by assuming the role of both subject and object. As a young girl, fastidious, aspiringly bookish, she had held herself apart and became a spinster by choice. "I was waiting for a wise man to come to the village to learn how to hoe and lend me books." The sentence is revealing of the author's addiction to an aristocracy of the spirit in which delicacy mingles easily with a robust zest for country chores. One night Clarisse discovers a dead man in the café she owns, and succumbs to an ecstasy of tenderness. She bathes his feet, cleans his stained shirt, repairs his broken boots, and lifts his lids to gaze into his eyes, knowing "no real companion would have allowed himself to be taken care of like this." The dead man is a laborer, and she dimly senses he had come to her door earlier in the day seeking work, but her thought is fugitive, without remorse. Mlle. Leduc's subjectivity offers no room for conventional ironies. Clarisse regrets only that the man can give her nothing of himself to keep. His pockets yield no more than an old Metro ticket and an empty packet of Gauloises. "What she was asking for, what she was trying to say to him, was nothing but the sound of her voice as she spoke to him in a tone she had never heard herself use before."

The inanimate is the most trustworthy love object of all, and the dialogue of love most satisfying when it is uttered by the subject voice, questions and answers alike. Carried to its logical end, the passion for possession, for unattainable fidelity and oneness, outwits the pain of separation by courting it and thus making it a sweetness in itself. "Yes, he was going to leave . . . that was what made him beyond price," Clothilde murmurs of Georges in "The Golden Buttons."

Clothilde is the composite Leduc heroine, a rugged farm child, rooted in the earth, whose hooded eyes and Annamese nose are the mark of the alien, the different one. She is at once innocent and wise, with a sensibility gentler than her origins. Her emotional ambition foretells her doom. The story describes her search for affinity with leisurely serenity. It is subtle, intricate; an outward simplicity masks a blend of the ordinary and the fantastic. Clothilde's quest begins when she is cast out by her coarse gamekeeper father whom she hates. She is given haven by old Mme. Relicat, for whom she is the child her husband could not give her, as for Clothilde she is the mother who is hers alone. For Clothilde's own mother is worn out with drudgery and childbearing and prefers to talk to her chickens rather than to her children.

"The Golden Buttons" is a parable, a fairy tale, for the author's anarchic reordering of the forces of good and evil. Love's perfection lies in its unfeasibility. Marriage is more often than not malign, the unhappiness of couples with each other is a betrayal shifted to their children. Women are born to indignity and their freedom lies in the contrivances by which they carry renunciation to the extreme of

A trail-blazing inquiry into the nature and limits of free expression under the First Amendment

"Professor Emerson's balanced presentation well suggests that in our country's history social losses have on the whole far outweighed the supposed gains in 'security' or 'unity' or 'morality' meant to be achieved by restrictions on expression."

—WALTER GELLHORN, Professor of Law, Columbia University

"Venturesome, provocative, and pioneering."—MILTON R. KONVITZ, Professor of Law, Cornell University

TOWARD A GENERAL THEORY OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT

by THOMAS I. EMERSON

Lines Professor of Law, Yale University
$4.95, now at your bookstore

RANDOM HOUSE

self-effacement, as for example in insanity, old age and barrenness. Mlle. Leduc sees acquisitiveness as a ravishment of human feeling as well as of nature's gifts. "His maples," says Clothilde, mocking her father's words as she trails behind through the woods. "The forest doesn't belong to him."

In the tradition of Baudelaire, nature, for the author, is not indifferent; it abounds in meanings which we must search out. "To find something, no matter how learned or ignorant we may be, is to dip one's finger into cerulean blue." Blue, the benevolence of the protective sky, echoes through these stories like an incantation. We remember the child Violette in La Bâtarde who buried her face in her grandmother's blue apron, and who later with Hermine, plunged into the azure depths. It is the color of the dead man's eyes, with its promise for Clarisse of self-loss in the rapture of touching. Abandonment to touch, without fear of rebuff, is love's exquisite, transitory blessing. The old women, withered repositories of thwarted longing, against whom Clothilde hurls herself, are themselves nearly objects of nature, like the quivering trees she clasps in joy. We recognize the vision of the womb haven which repairs the rupture of birth. Cocoons, nests and burrows fill the fancy of Mlle. Leduc's characters. Wrapped, warmed, enclosed, self cherishes self, "a caterpillar eating its own tail." Clarisse slept at night "curled up like a ball" to avoid the pebbles in her life which gathered at night in the bottom of her bed.

What can we do about Mlle. Leduc's world except open ourselves to its desperate ingenuity? Perverse, absurd, at times precious—there is a whole catalog of level-headed words to fling at it. Without explanations, Mlle. Leduc strains backward for mythic unity with the gods of earth and sky. She inverts in a revenge for that which we have, in large measure, already irrevocably inverted. A child beats her fists against the walls of her prison and concocts schemes to cheat her sentence of its terror. How many among us aren't playing some form of this game?

The Surrealist Quixote

HEBDOMEROS. By Giorgio de Chirico. With an introduction by James A. Hodkinson. Four Seasons Book Society. 142 pp. $7.95, Paper $3.95.

STEPHEN KOCH

Mr. Koch teaches at the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

André Breton died in Paris early in October, a quixotic old man. Until the last, he had convened a few tired surrealists each week in a Paris café, there to issue his "directives." Until the last, he had kept up the violent para-militaristic rhetoric of a movement that had become a dead letter in France, a laughing joke. The New York Times obituary dwelt on Breton's weak points: his humorlessness; his grim pretensions; the narrow, authoritarian way he ruled a group supposedly dedicated to freedom; the doctrinaire intransigence which by the time he died had driven every gifted surrealist from his group. It was a sad, depressing end for the man who had led one of the most brilliant artistic movements of his time and evolved a set of principles that permanently changed modern art. He ended in utter triviality.

But what of surrealism itself? At the moment it seems to be taken much more seriously here than it is in France, and in general it influences painting much more than it does literature. There has lately been a burst of books and new translations about it: Maurice Nadeau's History of Surrealism, Mathew Josephson's Surrealism and the Novel, J. H. Mathew's Surrealism and Ferdinand Alquié's Philosophy of Surrealism have all appeared within a few months of one another (and I'm told there will shortly be a new translation of Breton's Surrealist Manifestoes), while certain classical surrealist heroes—Sade, Jarry, Lautréamont and Rimbaud—have all in the last couple of years appeared in new translations. The Museum of Modern Art last season gave a big retrospective of René Magritte, and the art magazines talk about surrealism constantly—indeed, Artforum recently devoted an entire issue to it.

The painters' continuing interest in surrealism is easily understood. The line of descent from the original Paris group to the Abstract Expressionists of the New York school is unbroken, often a matter of direct personal contact with refugees during the war. Among more recent painters, Robert Rauschenberg is explicitly "neo-dadaistic," while Jasper Johns—in a more reflective way—has pursued something like that line of glowing and elegant surrealist wit which, as Max Kozloff has pointed out, is also found in Magritte.

However, except for Burroughs, a few poets, and the accelerating influence of Antonin Artaud's surrealist theatre in drama, nothing like the painters' pervasive awareness of surrealism can be found in our literature. Whether this is good or bad, I cannot say—but it's worth noting that the surrealists turned out much finer literature than painting. Very little of this work has been translated, and much of it is untranslatable. I suspect that Paul Eluard in English would sound like an English Imagist or a pale imitation of Baudelaire—but even less satisfactory than the English versions of Baudelaire. And the most interesting work of Robert Desnos might well be as toneless and confused in English as Burroughs would be in French. Still, there are some good translations of Artaud (though we urgently need a replacement for City Lights's wretched Artaud Anthology, which unfortunately remains our only collection of his poetry) and more work by top-flight translators would do a lot to clear the air about surrealism and to give us some grasp of its real achievement.

One such book is Hebdomeros, Giorgio de Chirico's surrealist novel written in 1929. It is particularly valuable because Chirico was also one of the best surrealist painters, one of the few whose canvases are something more than historical curiosities. James Hodkinson's translation of this demanding work—accompanied by a lucid and informative introduction—is highly literate, and in places beautiful. Working entirely without assistance from the schools or foundations or big publishing houses, he has put a great deal of care into making available a classic of surrealism which should interest anyone concerned with modern painting and literature.

Hebdomeros is a book with a hero. That is the most important thing about it, and I mention it at once because Hebdomeros is no ordinary "central figure"; he strikes up on the page something like the charismatic postures of the classical heroes, and like them he moves through an enchanted, awesome, magic-ridden landscape which—though a mixture of the commonplace and the otherworldly—is charged with an electrically mysterious atmosphere that goads him into heroic poses, if not heroic actions. He is a strange, sad, 20th-century descendant of Odysseus, Roland, Lancelot and the White Knight, who "dreams about battles at the edge of the sea," and stands gazing over endless vistas, singing in his "powerful, musical voice: 'Farewell, high mountains and rocky peaks! Farewell nights bathed in the light of the moon! I am not struck down by sickness, and yet I am going to die!'" But Hebdomeros is also the heir of Don Quixote—he is indeed the surrealist Quixote. Like the Knight of the Sorrowful Countenance, he lives in a world where he does not belong, and like him, he is often a figure of fun. The mysteries he confronts are often merely amusing fetishes—"like Orestes pursued by the Furies he fled those who ate lobsters"—and the glittering disorder of his own mind is so at odds with reality that he sometimes wonders whether "life is nothing but an immense lie? Nothing but the shadow of a dream?"

But unlike the world of Cervantes' great book, there is no clear distinction between the real world and the hero's fantasy in Hebdomeros. Both are fused surrealistically, so that we are never asked to give credence to one or the other. Thus, when Hebdomeros enters a garden filled with old men who have turned to stone, they are neither real nor mere projections of his imagination. Chirico has rather fitted out Hebdomeros' mind as a physical landscape, and paid no attention to the distinction between the inner and outer life. Thus, if Hebdomeros is not at home in the world of the book it is because he is at odds with himself; if he is the surrealist Quixote, it is because he has an imagination that both dreams and doubts at once.

As Mr. Hodkinson makes clear in his introduction, Chirico was not—like some of the surrealists—an inspired, wild-eyed illiterate but a man thoroughly schooled by his highly cultivated Italian parents and by an Italian and German university education in the best traditions of classical European culture. He arrived in Paris at a time when such a background was being violently called into question by the avant-garde, and despite his training, he does not seem to have had the intellectual equipment needed to resolve the extreme contradictions that his prolix education had created in him. Though his mind was cluttered with the exalted paraphernalia of the past, he also wanted to "engage himself" culturally, to take a position, to live. This conflict is felt everywhere in his novel, as it is in his painting and biography. Though one habitually thinks of him as dead, Chirico is still alive: the ex-darling of the avant-garde has returned to Italy to fritter his time in a splenetic, Philistine, academic defense of "tradition."

With Chirico's background in mind, it becomes clear that the homeless pathos that pervades both Hebdomeros and his painting partly springs from their common struggle with an excessively rationalized past and an irrational present. It's a question of a young man wanting to express an ungovernable verve and force of feeling, but having at his disposal for this task only the musty forms of an antiquated, merely academic "cultivation"—to which he is also partly committed.

But this struggle does not ruin Chirico as an artist and writer. On the contrary, it sometimes results in a charged, haunted impasse of great force and pathos. There is an academic element even in Chirico's best paintings. Haunted and timeless and unworldly though they are, they are filled with the classical busts and heroic plaster casts of the classroom, and their schoolmasterish perspectives narrow in on faceless deserted Renaissance plazas. In typical surrealist fashion, Chirico did not create a new style in painting. He merely broke apart the conventional styles to produce his irrational "atmospheres."

This same academic element is found in Hebdomeros, though in a different way. Chirico (a so-called "literary" painter) is also a painterlike writer who is most at home describing visual scenes that greatly resemble the irrational landscapes of his canvases. As in the paintings, one is brought into contact with an imagination afflicted with solitude—Hebdomeros is a knight-errant, wandering alone in the past, futilely attempting to reach the present and contemporaries who are less obsessed with the past's dead attractions. The result is moving—a mental landscape filled with specters and mysteries; with heroic postures and absurdity; with doubt and exhilaration and boredom, where the hero wanders alone in much surrealist glamour, but where he can never quite liberate himself and take his own stride.

Interior Order

FRANK LLOYD WRIGHT: A Study in Architectural Content. By Norris Kelly Smith. Prentice-Hall. 182 pp. $5.95. Paper $2.45.

SHERMAN PAUL

Mr. Paul is professor of English at the University of Illinois. His most recent book is Edmund Wilson: A Study of Literary Vocation in Our Time (University of Illinois Press). He is also the author of Louis Sullivan: An Architect in American Thought (Prentice-Hall).

One needn't accept the assumptions or conclusions of this study to appreciate the kind of inquiry Mr. Smith has undertaken. He is interested in the "architectural content" of Frank Lloyd Wright's work—in its metaphorical expression or meaning; with how it stands in relation to his awareness of the world, the philosophy and ethics he believed to be the ultimate gift of the architect. Others have contributed to such an understanding of his thought (for example, Lewis Mumford, Vincent Scully, Jr., Paul and Percival Goodman, Morton and Lucia White—none of whose work, incidentally, is acknowledged by Mr. Smith); but no one has gone so far in treating Wright's work as a history of ideas.

Smith's concern with the history of ideas, however, is of less importance to him than the polemical ends to which he puts it. He is a partisan—rarer, it seems, in architecture than in literature—of the religious and socially conservative ideas so fashionable today. To present Wright as an advocate of such ideas, he has had to deny the importance of Wright's relation to the modern movement, and to reject the notion that the art of an age is its reflex, its expression a unity. The distinction he wishes to make between the efficient functionalism of contemporary building (and science) and the expressive vital organic functionalism of the Romantic tradition is a valuable one that could have been made without fixing religion to the latter, or pushing beyond the facts of Wright's case. He does so, I think, when with the help of a single book, Thorlief Boman's Hebrew Thought Compared with Greek, he presents Romanticism in terms of Hebraism—to no other purpose than to give Wright's work religious significance. "It will be one of my purposes," he says, "to demonstrate that though the Bible has played an incalculably important role in shaping western thought for some two thousand years, it was only with Wright that Biblical thought found expression in the art of architecture, which has been dominated almost exclusively by the Greco-Roman tradition."

No one will deny that Wright "disliked the Hellenic way and its principles" (I quote Scully), or that he considered himself an artist-seer, one of those great personalities that Van Wyck Brooks, for example, valued so highly for their social force in the 19th century. Like his master, Louis Sullivan, he lived in "the cause of architecture," and "total architecture" was his religion. But he would not have found agreeable the association of his work with Hebraism, for Hebraism (as Matthew Arnold, if not Boman, defined it) was for Wright connected with all that was rigid and retributive, and was repugnant to him. "The boy," he says of himself in An Autobiography, "grew to distrust Isaiah"—that "Mosaic Isaiah" to whom he preferred the gentle, beauty-loving Celtic prophet Taliesin, and against whom he sought refuge in his work.

As for the place Smith seeks for him in "the cause conservative," no one will deny that Wright, who needed so much the security of his ancestral valley, was conservative in some respects. Yes, conservative in impulse but radical in idea, as Richard Chase has characterized the best American minds, including those who influenced Wright, like Emerson and Whitman. Wright was too much opposed to the institutions of our society to be conservative in the special sense that Smith has in mind: that architecture is the art of the Establishment, of constituted social relationships (not necessarily new ones). Wright, at least, thought himself radical and described the essence of his being in the anecdote of deviation from the straight way with which he begins An Autobiography. He was, if any American architect was, a reformer, with an "imperturbable readiness," Mumford says, "to break old molds and improvise new ones"; and he also had the radical's utopian expectation that his work would create the conditions of new life—and that others should conform to it.

The claims of growth were for Wright superior to any other; growth is the idea he dramatizes throughout his essentially open, unending autobiography. An Autobiography, modeled on Sullivan's, parts of which he heard the master read aloud, is an autobiography of an idea—of the growth and nurture of genius in the cause of architecture and in behalf of the idea of "the supremacy of interior order." The event in his life that probably disturbed him most, and that the story of his achievement was intended to justify, was the first domestic crisis, his desertion of his family in 1909. He reads it back to instances of flight in his boyhood and youth, and forward to his many Wanderjahre; and he gathers about it his resentment of his mother's gentility and of the sentimentality and stuffy domesticity of the time.

The reader may, with Smith, consider Wright's early houses (the Winslow house is his example) "sacramental homes"; Wright was a great domestic architect, who understood the many uses of home and was always profoundly moved by the eternal feminine. But he was also, in keeping with the realistic spirit of the age, a simplifier of relationships in the interest of truth; and his own flight, anticipated in the Coonley house, the prototype of Taliesin, was part of the contemporary sexual revolution against the hypocrisy of middle-class family life. At the end of the first version of An Autobiography, Wright tries to explain its lesson: "The sufferings of growth, the agony of sentimentality that tries to hold life by 'institution' and establishment and extend the fleeting hour until the simple inevitable becomes high tragedy—are they not all punishment for violation of the first simple law of Freedom: the law of organic change."

As a proponent of organic change

Wright was fully aware of the need for roots—for the ground and shelter of genius—a necessity wonderfully expressed in respect to his own life in Taliesin. With him, security is not so much a conservative idea as an aspect of the bipolar unity of his thought, and one might even say that Wright was never more radical than when advancing it. The tensions of such thought are seldom resolved, as Smith shows, in the most valuable part of his book, by analyzing its architectural expression in several representative designs: the Winslow and Coonley houses, Taliesin, the Barnsdall house, Fallingwater, the Johnson Wax Company Building and Broadacre City.

Smith follows Wright in considering the work an integral part of his life and using it for biographical purposes. His interpretations differ from those of An Autobiography, a book he cites but insufficiently studies as autobiography, that is, as the foundation for a much needed biography. For Wright the Barnsdall house was, in the language of Sullivan he frequently uses, a "romanza"; for Smith it is an expression of his need in unsettled years for security and shelter. This is perceptive, as are many of his insights—that Taliesin, for example, was his Camelot, and that the tree, his organic model, represented for him a free solution to the social problem of the relation of part to whole.

When one feels especially critical of Smith's study it is because of the encumbering polemical tone, the loose construction and the lack of rounded presentation and balance. He does not adequately characterize Wright's mind (in some ways a Populist mind) in terms of its time and place. And he lets his religious argument mislead him when, in a major instance, he treats Broadacre City as Wright's supreme statement—as a secular version of the City of God. Taliesin, it seems to me, would have been a better example of Wright's "vision": a vision of the natural house become a principality, where the abundant life is possible ("the exuberance of life in all these rural riches"), and all the things Wright valued—Family, Fellowship, Work, Freedom: the headings of An Autobiography—were brought together under one roof. Much about Taliesin is "feudal" and "agrarian," but not necessarily the joyous spirit with which Wright hoped to invest it. His genuinely conservative ideas are conserving and relate to human well-being in an urban culture. When they fail in this it is usually due to inadequate thought, for his thought was not always equal to the scope and spirit of his designs, and to the authoritarianism he sometimes permitted his genius.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

Harold Pinter's The Homecoming is a masterful play. (At the Music Box.) I do not speak of its content but of its construction. When a play is praised in this respect what is generally meant is that the play conforms to a past model in the tradition of that subtly logical coherence Ibsen brought to the realistic form of the 19th century. Pinter's construction is of a different sort. Not to perceive this is to misconstrue the play.

To the unaware theatregoer The Homecoming may seem to have an ordinary continuity. But if he regards it in this way he will find it bewildering, unfathomable, unreal, to use adjectives which have been applied to it in most of the recent reviews. The play is none of these things. In fact it may be too simple.

It is superficially a family comedy. There is a 70-year-old widower, resident of north London, a retired butcher, father of three sons. The youngest is a construction worker training to become a prize fighter. The second son, whose occupation goes unmentioned at the outset, conveys unspoken menace in tight-lipped irony. He is an adept at the "game"—pimping. The third and oldest son, absent for years, brings home a pretty wife for a brief visit. He is the intellectual of the family, a Ph.D. in philosophy with a chair at a (perhaps Western) American university. There is also the butcher's brother, a correctly efficient, mild mannered, unambitious and generally impotent chauffeur.

The plot of the play, although it is misleading to call it that, shows the men gradually converting the philosopher's wife into a consenting whore. She must engage in the occupation to put her weight into the family budget while her father- and brothers-in-law look forward to enjoying her favors. She accepts the terms after driving a hard bargain, for she—a mother of three, by the way—is as unyieldingly calculating as any of them. Her philosophical husband leaves without further ado to return to his campus.

The scene in which the deal is made is not the climax of the story or the point of the play. It is only the finishing touch. Every scene and verbal exchange is as indicative of the play's meaning as every other. They are all facets of one theme. The play is a parable of insensibility, the death of values, a world in which little remains but primitive appetite.

It is significant that the characters—particularly the butcher father who is central to the composition—talk with orthodox unctuousness of family loyalty, of the sacredness of blood ties, reverence for mother, of all the hallowed virtues. But we see immediately that the old man despised his wife, is savage with his sons, cruelly contemptuous of his brother. What is genuine in him is his animal voraciousness, a brute clinging to existence. Since he is the fountainhead of all, the strongest too, each of the play's characters shares the same traits—except for the chauffeur brother who collapses when he announces that Jessie, his brother's wife, the family mother, had an affair at the back of his car with the butcher's much admired assistant.

What of the Ph.D.? When the family spiv asks him: "Do you detect a certain logical incoherence in the central affirmations of Christian theism?" the Ph.D. answers: "That question doesn't fall within my province." Like all the others, he's a "professional"; he refuses to extend his thinking beyond the bounds of his own interest. There is no connection with anything else.

The question and answer, funny as is so much else in the play, is as crucial to the whole picture as any of its more active or shocking moments. When, to take another instance, the youngest brother moves his sister-in-law to the couch and lies on top of her, while her husband and the others stand by and watch without a tremor, we are not confronted with a situation in a realistic story progression but an episode in a panel, an image which tells us more strikingly than some of the others what the total picture and meaning of the play are. The meaning is to be sought in the lack of feeling, absence of any moral or ideological foundation, the heartlessness which encompasses all.

This explains the attitude of the apparently wholly enigmatic character of the play: the soft-spoken philosopher's wife. There was a lack of living substance in the life she led with her husband on the immaculate campus, a place as barren of spirit and pulse as the home into which they have come. Being well taken care of as a whore will prove no worse and perhaps more honest.

How does Pinter make so absolute and damaging a statement theatrically fascinating and lucid? By constructing his play not on the basis of a simple narrative line, in which case it would indeed be incredible, but through a series of fragmented passages joined by brief but unmistakable breaks. The device renders the play abstract. There is a continuity of idea from one fragment to another, a unity of atmosphere. For example, after the bit in which the family watches the symbolic cohabitation of brother with sister-in-law, there is a sharp pause; she then gets up and says peremptorily: "I'd like something to eat," and an entirely new sequence commences in which another aspect of the general situation is played out.

Peter Hall's direction realizes the quality and scheme of the play to perfection. The production is one of the most complete I have seen on the English or American stage in some years, less striking but more organic than that of Peter Brook's Marat/Sade. What is script and what staging is almost indistinguishable. The pauses or breaks are not elements of character portrayal; they are "freezes" of action to indicate that we are passing from one phase of the material to another, that the play is not continuing in naturalistic order but shifting to a new "angle."

Adding to the overall unity of impression is John Bury's setting, which bears the same relation to reality as does every other element of the play. It appears to be a real place with fatigued furniture, murky walls in mist gray and muck brown, corroded as if by dirt and fog. Yet its design is almost classically imposing, like that of an imperial mansion gone to seed and turned hollow.

The actors follow the direction with utmost fidelity. It is not psychological acting. In a vein of apparent realism consonant with the play's environment, it is chiseled and polished acting, with each line and speech sculpted to convey the incisive and mordant intention of the dramatist's thought. Paul Rogers' gross and yet towering monster of a father, sensual, hypocritical, vicious, grasping, and Ian Holm's acidly witty ponce, with the sterile power of a low-grade dictator are perhaps the best, but Vivien Merchant, Michael Craig, John Normington, Terence Rigby, in more limited roles, are nearly as good.

What is the sum of all this? Pinter's manner is icy: he does not declare himself. He leaves interpretation to the audience. (This is most brave.) He has a keen ear for dramatic speech, he writes with superb control: there is hardly a wasted word. At first one is inclined to think that he must be either wickedly unfeeling or perhaps that he has no convictions. But no! Only a prophet or a fanatic, fiercely moral, can be so damning. But Pinter is wholly of our moment: we refuse to be hortatory, to cry out, plead, condemn or call to account. Since we do not permit ourselves to "take sides" overtly, we grin or keep our jaws so tightly clamped that it becomes hard to tell whether we are kidding or repressing pain. The mask is one of horror subdued in glacial irony.

I do not see life as Pinter does. But it is imperative that he reveal his view of it; it is part of the truth. He is an artist, one of the most astute to have entered upon the world stage in the past ten years. Those who do not respect and appreciate his talent understand little of our times or its theatre.

MUSIC

BENJAMIN BORETZ

The interest of our mass-circulation journals in the views and activities of composers is so sporadic that the appearance of an extensive interview with the Italian composer, Luciano Berio, on the occasion of the first performance of his opera Passaggio at the Juilliard School (The New York Times, January 8), was a notable and welcome event. But its very rarity heightened one's concern for the content of Berio's remarks. In the prevailing vacuum of public awareness not only of what composers actually do represent nowadays but of what music represents altogether, I found particularly unfortunate the attribution to Berio of the remarks that "in tonal music there were predetermined forms; now we invent form every time. In tonal music there was a hierarchy, with melody first, then harmony and finally rhythm taking their places. Now there are no such components—no melody as such." The inapplicability of these remarks should be self-evident: "Predetermined form" is surely the least significant aspect of a masterpiece in any language, tonal or otherwise, musical or otherwise. The absence of "such components" as "melody," which is simply

"... Fanshen is the most exciting, fascinating, extraordinary document of Land Reform in China ever written... a classic to be compared with Red Star Over China."

—Han Suyin

"... the most important book that has yet been written about China at the time of the Communist Revolution... How better could we begin to understand its meaning?"

—Felix Greene

"... A vivid and unique contribution to historical documentation on the land redistribution phase of the revolution in China... a vast and indispensable storehouse of sociological information." —Edgar Snow

FANSHEN

A Documentary of Revolution in a Chinese Village

by WILLIAM HINTON

Pre-pub price $9; After Jan. 30, 1967,
$12.50. Order from:

MONTHLY REVIEW PRESS
116 W. 14th St., N.Y. 10011

Hear author Hinton discuss "The Cultural Revolution in China—A Positive View" during his speaking tour:

JANUARY 1-31 — Eastern Seaboard
FEBRUARY 1-20 — Midwest
FEB. 21-MAR. 10 — Far West
MAR. 11-APR. 1 — Eastern Seaboard

For information write:

WILLIAM HINTON
Route 2, Fleetwood, Pa. 19522

the exposed surface of pitch relation; "harmony," the sonorities resulting from conjunctions of pitches, and "rhythm," the rates of event-change, however asserted, is definitionally impossible.

But what is really distressing about such statements by a distinguished composer is the serious mischief done public consciousness not only of traditional music but of traditional composition. And this is especially unfortunate at a time when such serious work tends to be widely associated with all "modernism," however primitive, in the general category of "avant-garde." So much simplistic musical "extremism," whether of the "right" (in the manner of Samuel Barber's Antony and Cleopatra, etc.) or of the "left" (the know-nothing or as-little-as-possible avant-garde) is in reality traceable to a lack of awareness of what music has already achieved. Here education is crucial; and those who regard the increasing orientation of composers to the university as a "narrowing" of outlook might consider how unlikely it would be for a university-educated composer to remark, as Berio was quoted, that "tonality can still work [sic] . . . for moments of escapism . . . like with jazz. But for serious art, absolutely NO!"

Yet I wonder how many readers of the Times felt quite sure that some similar statement would readily be made by, let us say, any "committed" twelve-tone composer, even though in fact any real understanding of the bases of twelve-tone coherence—or of any coherent musical syntax, actual or potential—would be the surest possible guarantee against the currency of such beliefs. And Berio is actually among the most responsible of the European avant-garde, and also makes such "ideologically" reasonable statements as that "control . . . is the sine qua non of composition," and that "there is a . . . global type of thinking today, a concern with musical processes that has nothing to do with geography," although the latter remark is illustrated by the mention of three European composers from the Darmstadt "inner circle" (Stockhausen, Boulez, Pousseur) who are "not compatriots," being German, French and Belgian, with no hint given of even the existence of any American compositional activity or of a single important American composer, not even Berio's Juilliard colleague, Elliott Carter. This parochialism, whether naive or "political," is another symptom of the conceptual crudity that plagues any effort to represent music, past, present and potential, with any reasonable sense of its true range of subtlety, complexity, profundity and diversity.

One of the contributory aspects to an environment in which attitudes such as those of Berio can flourish has been the deep general unawareness of the existence and nature of 20th-century musical tradition. Thus it was particularly gratifying to hear, on the ~~same~~ weekend as the publication of the Berio interview, the Philharmonic's performance of the Schoenberg Violin Concerto, a work that seems to me one of the most profound and original compositional achievements of any time. On this occasion, Zvi Zeitlin's playing of the solo part, still prodigiously difficult in its demands on the outer limits of contemporary violinistic capacity, was especially impressive, in both its technical and musical adequacy. The articulation of pitch, duration and phrase structure in the solo part was invariably clear and precise, despite the somewhat small sonorous and dynamic range of Mr. Zeitlin's playing. And wherever the soloist was responsible for generating the entire coherence of a passage (as in the two solo cadenzas in the outer movements), the results were remarkable—the multiple-stopped trills and chords of the last movement cadenza, the multiply articulated arpeggios of the first movement cadenza, and the simultaneous bowed-plucked attacks were real feats of violinism and musicianship, far beyond any performances I had heard previously.

Moreover, after noting these qualities in the performance, it was interesting to read in Zeitlin's program note that "thinking people, who fully accept the need for some preparatory study of Shakespeare, Joyce, Thomas Mann or the Talmud, reject, on first hearing, music that needs equal conditioning. They are reluctant to apply the principles of one area of human endeavor to another." I wonder what the implications of such a remark are for the attitudes promulgated by Mr. Berio.

I do not, however, mean to minimize the orchestra's contribution to this performance; its playing under Leonard Bernstein seemed the product of careful and conscientious preparation. The crucial requirements of ensemble accuracy in reproducing the pitches and durations indicated in the score were in large part realized, far beyond the performances earlier this year of Schoenberg's Survivor from Warsaw and Second Chamber Symphony. Thus, that there remained such problems as the misrepresentation or even absence of dynamic differentiation, and a general uncertainty of the shaping of events and successions, seems less noteworthy at this point than that the totality constituted probably the most competent performance of a Schoenberg orchestral work in New York since Hans Rosbaud's visit to the Philharmonic in 1961.

A still more remarkable event, under the present musical conditions, was the performance by the Opera Company of Boston of Schoenberg's opera Moses and Aron, another monument of the 20th-century tradition which, incredibly, was receiving its first American performance. This alone would have guaranteed to the Opera Company of Boston the distinction of presenting the most significant American operatic event since Wozzeck at the City Center and The Rake's Progress at the Metropolitan in 1952 (unless inaugurations of buildings are seen as more significant musical events than performances of works).

For Moses and Aron represents the ultimate development of the concepts of dramatic-verbal-musical structure that were crucial for Schoenberg throughout his compositional life—from his earliest songs to the first works in which his real originality was manifest (the Book of the Hanging Gardens and Pierrot Lunaire) to the furthest extended explorations of structural ideas (Erwartung, Der Jakobsleiter, Die Glückliche Hand, A Survivor from Warsaw, etc.) And this ultimacy obviously precludes any attempt at even minimal exegesis here—except to point out that, as one might expect, the work is "operatic" in the deepest of senses: it is in fact generated out of a total reconsideration of every aspect of what constitutes an operatic continuity. This becomes especially evident in the manner in which the extraordinary diversity of resources and media—and the sense-perceptual contexts associated with each—all contribute to a unitary dramatic unfolding, not in trivial synchronism but in a fantastically complex counterpoint of rates and qualities of unfolding in the several domains.

In a direct sense, Moses and Aron is also the ultimate realization of the potential of German Expressionist theatre, a musical and dramatic purification of its resources that reconceives its characteristic "devices" as the generators and projectors of a unitary structural continuity. Thus the constant interplay of the two "dramatic" levels—the verbal, intimate and "abstract" dialogues of Moses and Aaron, on the one hand, and the externalized pure action of the massed crowds, on the other—is realized through an extraordinary development of a single set of presentational qualities—orchestral, vocal and visual—for each scene. The "expressionist" idea of the unseen murmuring chorus whose location (the spatial sense of the source of sound) constantly shifts to represent the "burning bush" idea—a great stroke of musical theatre in itself—is immediately juxtaposed with the chamber-music, recitative quality of the Moses-Aaron dialogue. The continuity of ideas thus created, each sharply characterized by "profiles," relates Moses to the heart of the operatic tradition from the upper-lower world juxtaposition of Monteverdi's Orfeo to the outdoor-indoor, natural-supernatural musical correlates in Mozart's Don Giovanni, to the merging and interdevelopment of a multitude of such identities in Wagner.

But beyond the virtue of the mere fact of the presentation, the Boston company's performance was extraordinary in the ingenuity and discipline of many aspects of the production. Throughout, the accuracy of the chorus, which is virtually an ensemble soloist—and frequently an ensemble of differentiated ensemble soloists—was phenomenal, and perhaps contributed more than any other factor to the projection of the special sonic-articulative qualities of the work. Above all, however, the settings and the stage direction by Sarah Caldwell—under the most inadequate conceivable of physical conditions in an old movie theatre—were the uniquely imaginative and original aspects of the production, brilliantly "effective," yet at almost every point deriving evidently from an awareness of what was going on, musically and dramatically, in the work.

The transformation of a ridiculously shallow stage by vertical, lateral and even circular extensions (the orchestral ensemble was entirely surrounded by stage aprons), and the sense of relations of space, volume and (visual) speed and shape of events were strokes of authentic genius that make the presentation by the financially affluent but conceptually indigent New York companies quite ludicrously pathetic. Miss Caldwell must immediately be given an adequate orchestra, an authoritative conductor, and all the funds, stage resources, electronic equipment and mechanical devices she requires. At the very least, the old Metropolitan ought to be rebuilt to her specifications and turned over to her. For her work (beginning more than ten years ago with the first, and thus far only, American performance of Hindemith's Mathis der Maler, and continuing with Berg's Lulu, which has not yet appeared at the Metropolitan or the New York City Opera, and Nono's Intolleranza of last year) has been the only sign of vitality that American operatic activity has produced (excepting individual productions in Santa Fe and Washington). Even if all the compositional activity in America is worth only 50,000 matching-grant dollars to the National Foundation on the Arts, it still seems possible that our national reputation for operatic incompetence might appear worthy of the rectification uniquely available through activities such as Miss Caldwell's.

ART / Max Kozloff

Some day it might be profitable to examine the unexpected affinities between various isolated members of the artistic generation now in their 50s or 60s, and the impulses of their colleagues, twenty and thirty years younger. For instance, Ad Reinhardt and Barnett Newman, or even old Josef Albers, still occupy respected and relevant positions as far as young abstract art is concerned. They bask in an aesthetic look backward, behind or to the flank of Abstract-Expressionism, which is motivated by a fondness for geometric idioms as clear as it was in Constructivism, but now far less utopian. The much touted "reductionism," which in the early days of the modern tradition signified a compression of pictorial or sculptural energies, currently stands for their drainage.

Or to put the situation in another way, Western technology is no longer seen as the life-giving potentiality that, between the wars, it was somewhat defensively construed to be. Rather, we now have a quite numbed appreciation of its patterning, expressed in forms as neutral as chevrons and parallelograms, in which human affect dissolves into an alarming ennui. The industrialized circumstances in which we find ourselves are not, it seems, conditions that can be crystallized into affirmation, but produce instead a brand-new detritus of indifference. The environment of much American art today is such that power is perceived as mindless and enervating, and scale grossens beyond measure into a species of physical "overkill." Moreover, the machine seems only to have disarticulated artistic notions of formal relationships, rather than mobilized them. In this light, the older artists I mentioned are like way stations between two alien sensibilities, preserving a vocabulary base to concepts within which they themselves have not been able to participate.

An altogether astonishing exception to this state of affairs is Tony Smith, professionally unknown, who, in his fifty-fourth year, has just made his debut as a sculptor (in a joint exhibition at Hartford's Wadsworth Atheneum and the Institute of Contemporary Art, at the University of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia). In many respects, he seems to be in advance of his youngest colleagues in realizing giant images, or rather structures, that are based on modular units, regular volumes, inert compositions and, above all, hollow masses. This last point, hollowness, is important not so much because it answers the practical problem of attaining great bulk, without the corresponding deficit of unmanageable weight but because it also registers a psychological response to a peculiar American experience. Rather than monuments whose status is reinforced by their density, this sculpture gives the impression of vast surfaces that act as spatial occlusions, and planes that are less the terminations of matter than containers of voids. These works are enormously inconvenient, even intractable presences, which are yet bodiless and provisional—like more cryptic versions of the urban-scape itself. In such perceptions, Smith, effortlessly moving away (yet also drawing nourishment) from the backlog of more than thirty years as a teacher, designer and architect, strikes a comfortlessly contemporary note.

Its force, oddly enough, lies in its rationalistic origins, diverging radically from the hyper-stylized, almost precious aesthetics of his juniors, men like Donald Judd or Robert Morris. For them, art breeds in the avoidance of the anthropomorphic insinuation, and the meaning mongering of social significance. In leaning so far back from "artiness,"

The Sunday Ramparts

A new weekly newspaper of national significance, published by Ramparts Magazine. For free sample copy, write Ramparts, 301 Broadway, San Francisco 94133

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00

PAGEANT PRESS

101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

HEBDOMEROS

giorgio
de chirico

Cloth edition, limited to 500
copies: $7.95

Paperback: $3.95

THE
FOUR SEASONS
BOOK SOCIETY
550 Fifth Ave.
New York

they risk tumbling into a rejective stance that is almost metaphysical. They want to foist upon us an acceptance of their work as devoid of appearances, almost to the degree that we were once asked to view Purism as their platonic essence. The Smith exhibition, so close in its physical look to the output of these younger artists, has an entirely different context. Here is an engineer who, to the extent that he is theoretical, makes hypotheses about various three-dimensional forms, and then has the occasional curiosity to have his working drawings tested through outside fabrication. The result is a population of mock-ups, made of plywood sheets painted featureless light gray for the indoor pieces, and smeared with black automotive undercoating for those that are to be placed outside. If, as the catalogue indicates, Smith sometimes draws his inspiration from such things as an index-card box, or the problem of covering a Baroque fountain in the Athenaeum's Avery Hall, he supervises the production of his works, which sometimes require as little time as a few hours, without fuss. It is in the judging of various alternatives, represented by preliminary models, that one imagines him to take a more active hand in sculptural process than is fashionable in minimal art these days. In addition, Smith is not particularly concerned with "finish"—either the totally impersonal quality of, say, a fiberglass mold, or deliberate patina or textures, and that indifference sets his work apart from almost all current sculpture in which some decision about surfacing is crucial. Practical in that he causes constructions to be built to see how they "look" (and then mostly on commission, as with architects), he is also enigmatic in that he is evidently not involved with the formulation of an overall "statement" or ideological position.

The experience of the works themselves is quite out of the ordinary. If one turns into Avery Hall from the museum proper, the first view is of the fountain piece, "Fixture," looking disconcertingly like the conning tower of a nuclear submarine that has arisen from the floor of the exhibition hall. This room, a deep well rimmed with rectangular balconies, has become the setting for what seems to be a schematic turbine works, a lifeless dynamo. One wanders about, a trifle disoriented, among rectangles and blocks and free-standing walls—nothing substantially more complicated than that—to find oneself intermittently cornered or blocked out. Tons of air seem displaced by these static presences. (The one diagonal, in "Fixture," has a clattering force.) But at the same time, the way the structures pick up and echo the cubic nature of the architecture in more truncated form reinforces the stability of the environment. This truncation is significant. Though the pieces themselves can be as high as almost a couple of stories, they are clearly fragments—elbows or buttresses, defunctioned and unsupporting of anything in particular. As a result, the implications of a sculpture of such scale as to dwarf even architecture are staggering to contemplate.

Outdoors, the work has altered to create an extremely different spectacle. Smith's response to landscape, in any event, is rather special. He speaks of having discovered "some abandoned airstrips in Europe. . . . Surrealist landscapes, something that had nothing to do with any function, created worlds without tradition. Artificial landscape without cultural precedent began to dawn on me. There is a drill ground in Nuremberg, large enough to accommodate 2 million men."

An artist kindled by such observations, was bound to murder Hartford's Tower Plaza, which is not sufficiently polite to conceal its Miami-modern grimacing. Looked down upon from a helicopter, Smith's outdoor sculptures might, I imagine, resemble enormous black arachnids menacing pigmy humans. On the ground, they are reproachful enough—domineering arches or bulky tetrahedrons, with their blunt spreads and straddling ways. Remarkably, they are constructed on modular forms whose repetition and parallelism are hidden by awkward turnings. The effect is always asymmetrical, with angle changes that equalize proportions without indication of center, or stop short or shave off the extension that would complete them too neatly in the memory.

The great success is a piece called "Cigarette." Other works, especially those few gotten up in black steel, appear, as Smith himself admits, simply malignant. Probably the most concise statement on their overall content is given by Sam Wagstaff, the Wadsworth's very enterprising curator of paintings and the director of the exhibition: "These heavy, primitive organisms embrace space through volume and deep thrusts. Romanesque rather than Gothic. . . . They are related to early cultures intentionally or through sympathy—menhirs, earth mounds, cairns, and to this culture with equal sympathy—smokestacks, gas tanks, dump trucks, poured concrete ramps. No focus, no detail, no symmetry. They are plain but constantly changing. They are grave without being heavy, ordinary and mystical at the same time. . . ."

Surging up only within the last five years, the premier work of a creator already in a fairly late period of his maturity, they comprise one of the most unusual and, I think, moving, expressions of vitality in current American sculpture.

Representative examples of Tony Smith's work will be exhibited in New York's Bryant Park, toward the end of January.

PERSONALS

THE FUTURIST, published bimonthly by World Future Society, reports scientists' forecasts for coming decades. Subscription: $5 yearly. Box 19285-N, Twentieth Street Station, Washington, D. C. 20036.

OFFICE WORK desired by young man, all-round clerical experience in mail room and shipping. Box 600, c/o The Nation.

BUY YOUR BOOKS
through The Nation

Crossword Puzzle No. 1185

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 An understanding there might be no more pinches, however bad. (13)
- 10 Ranked as a ham on rye might be. (7)
- 11 From which a daring young flier took off in the air. (7)
- 12 Timely, in a distinctive way. (7)
- 13 Train. (7)
- 14 Its offspring is supposed to be graceful. (7)
- 15 One is likely to be given the air, if high. (7)
- 16 Possesses what one might put his foot in, or what one might put his foot on. (7)
- 20 The character of vegetable fruit? (7)
- 23 It might be made with 20 across, but it's rather hard. (7)
- 24 Expecting this at one time? (5, 2)
- 25 Seems to be coming to the point, eventually. (7)
- 26 Care to be disturbed about him? Foolish fancy! (7)
- 27 When the players hope to get a run started? (7, 6)

DOWN:

- 2 How to make a bad loser do something with a shade of difference? (3, 4)
- 3 Needing water, like corn sometimes.
- 4 The final gun might, but it could affect the score. (3, 4)

- 5 The wrong sex, wrong at heart, obtains things wrongly. (7)
- 6 What the crank used to do with a heavenly body, such as the ram. (5, 2)
- 7 Pacific lands. (7)
- 8 To appear near the strip? It's the most! (2, 4, 3, 4)
- 9 Even blue law towns might show it, but thus! (5, 2, 6)
- 17 Even one who soars over obstacles sometimes puts his foot in it. (7)
- 18 Wordsworth's pagan had such a creed.
- 19 Not a smooth mounting, but craft is strengthened by it. (7)
- 20 An unusual place in the state of Louisiana? (7)
- 21 Living with your surroundings, or just putting up with them? (7)
- 22 Salvagers might have it on them. (7)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1184

ACROSS: 1 Past participle; 9 Illness; 10 Trampus; 11 and 14 Even as you and I; 12 Heretics; 15 Bight; 17 Graze; 19 and 27 My Heart Belongs to Daddy; 21 Swamp Fox; 23 Skated; 25 Houdini; 26 Wheeler. DOWN: 1 Prize ring; 2 Silvery; 3 Premature; 4 Rusk; 5 In the right; 6 Inane; 7 Lapwing; 8 Asps; 13 Unimposing; 15 Black lead; 16 Taxidermy; 18 As a rule; 20 Totaled; 21 Soho; 22 Primo; 24 Twit.

EDUCATIONAL

Training for Leadership in Social Change The Upland Institute

One-year graduate level professional training. Studying theory and strategy of the great traditions of social change. Field experience with institutions of social change in Philadelphia area. Co-educational, non-sectarian. Admission requirement: B.A. or equivalent training and experience. Write:

JOHN W. THOMAS
THE UPLAND INSTITUTE
Chester, Pa. 19013

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 111 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PUBLICATIONS

What to do until the revolution comes! Read NEW WEST, a radical magazine for political activists. 5 issues, $2.00. Box 2125N, Santa Monica, California 90405.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 1-23-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
- ☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
- (Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

FREE!

With every new subscription to

THE
NATION

BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN

by Carey McWilliams, Editor, The Nation

When BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN was first issued (April 21, 1943), it evoked this comment from Oswald Garrison Villard in the Saturday Review:

"Mr. McWilliams has rendered a very great public service in producing this volume, which is worth any twenty of the wartime books dealing with other phases of the national problem forced upon our attention by the crisis in our national life."

* * *

Now, twenty-four years and many editions later, BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN (365 pp.) has been issued with a lengthy, new introduction assessing civil rights developments from 1943 to the present time.

The new edition drew this comment from William Hogan, Book Editor of the San Francisco Chronicle: "A classic study of American race relations."

For your FREE copy of BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN, fill out the subscription coupon at right, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest weekly journal of opinion—a truly independent, critical weekly—which since July 6, 1865, has been in the forefront of the fight for civil rights.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for ■ NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of BROTHERS UNDER THE SKIN.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP No.

1-23-67

AWAKENING OLYMPUS MORDECAI ROSENWALD

THE

NATION

JANUARY 30, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

FEB 1 1967

LIBRARY

CALIFORNIA REVOLUTION 1

The Dynamics of Repulsion D. B. LUTEN

CURRAN'S NMU

Headquarters vs. the Men at Sea DORIAN J. FLIEGEL

India Campaigns

Cows, Corruption & Demonstrations

LLOYD and SUSANNE RUDOLPH

AMERICAN GAMES

SPORTS: FUN AND PROFIT ROLFE HUMPHRIES

THE JOHNSON SYSTEM MARVIN E. GETTLEMAN

AID OVERKILL SAMUEL L. SHARP

7-27-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

numbers in the news

Maryville, Mo.

DEAR SIR: The virtual blackout of the 18,000 who demonstrated in Madison Square Garden for peace in Vietnam seems in strange contrast to the round-the-clock reiteration given the "only 75 out of 1,800 eligible" who showed up for a draft protest in another large city. The important "news" about the seventy-five was rushed to me via my car radio during my vacation, but I had to return home and read The Nation [editorial, Dec. 26] to find out about the 18,000.

Joe Wetzel

provocative aggression

New York City

DEAR SIR: Your editorial ["When Will China Intervene?" Jan. 16] states categorically that "... our military planners have no intention of opening fire on China. . . ." Our military planners, however, have for years been carrying out against China a variety of actions so provocative that it can be stated with equal assurance that our military would welcome a situation where the Chinese entered the war without a first open attack from the United States.

The crux of the situation is the attitude of the USSR. By treaty, the USSR is bound to support China if the United States openly attacks. If, however, the Chinese enter the war without such an attack, the USSR is not bound to enter. So far the Chinese have put up with an unceasing series of major provocations, but as we are so fond of saying about ourselves, it may be that their "patience is not inexhaustible. . . ." I can hear the President solemnly telling the nation: "This unprovoked, premeditated act of aggression. . . ." We may not live long enough to hear the end of it.

Helen Mears

use of silence

New York City

DEAR SIR: It was good to learn from Robert H. Simmons' letter [The Nation, Jan. 9] that weekly silent vigils against the war in Vietnam are now being held in many localities. Your readers may wish to know that a two-hour silent vigil has been held at Times Square in New York City every Saturday since October, 1964—without any interruption for well over two years. These vigils . . . are now being sponsored by fourteen peace organizations. Anyone is welcome to participate (from 12:30 P.M. to 2:30 P.M.).

Otto Nathan

plea for incompetence

Harrisburg, Pa.

DEAR SIR: John Paul Scott, reviewing The Territorial Imperative by Robert Ardrey [The Nation, Jan. 9], seems more perturbed that a non-scientist should venture into his domain than in what this engaging writer has discovered and offered to the world. That is just the trouble with science and the growing trouble with The Nation. The world has been divided up into spheres of competence and God help the interloper who dares to think outside his specialty. We need more playwrights writing about science and more scientists reviewing novels. . . .

Robert B. Dennis

correction

New York City

DEAR SIR: My review of Giorgio de Chirico's Hebdomeros [The Nation, Jan. 23] mistakenly attributes the translation to James A. Hodkinson, who wrote the introduction. The publishers have informed me that the translation is anonymous, a fact omitted in the title credits. It's a shame, since it is also first rate.

Stephen Koch

EDITORIALS

Romney the Rambler

When George Romney, the automobile magnate, held a press conference, the jaded newsmen responded with unusual enthusiasm. They came not only for the liquor and the luncheon but because Romney had something to say and could be relied on to say it. He spoke scornfully of "road locomotives" and called on Americans to buy compact cars. He knew what he was talking about, he left no one guessing, and he boldly committed American Motors to his concept. The only way the Big Three could fight him off was to imitate him. And, like any individual plugging a good idea with verve and clarity, he radiated personal charm.

If George Romney, the GOP Presidential aspirant, had the same qualities as George Romney of American Motors—if he had even a fraction of them—he would be a godsend to American politics. Instead he equivocates on the crucial questions of the day. Nowhere is this more evident than in his ambivalence on Vietnam. He has received a sketchy briefing from Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge and he is leaving soon on a much publicized visit to the unhappy country. The Nation hopes he will return with something to say to the American people—anything, as long as it is specific.

Apologists for Romney say he has not made up his mind on a firm 1968 foreign policy position, hence the appearance of unmanly irresolution. When a politician is uncertain, he usually keeps his mouth shut, but Romney refuses to follow the normal course. He talks when asked, he talks when he is not asked, he issues dope stories through reputable political correspondents like David S. Broder. The more he talks, the thicker the fog. He has hawkish moments, then again he coos like a dove. He seems on the verge of calling for all-out bombing and to hell with civilians and the shipping in Haiphong harbor, but he stops at the verge. He feels the President should have secured a "broader understanding" of the issues before involving us so deeply. If this led to a sharp critique of Mr. Johnson's policy, coupled with ideas for repairing the damage, it would make some sense, but Romney does not come up with either specific indictments or specific remedies.

It is sad to contrast Romney of the later 1950s, kicking General Motors in the teeth and with two or three Ramblers in his own garage, with the Romney of today, trying to explain that he did not mean what the reporters thought he meant at any earlier press conference or interview, and leaving them more puzzled than before. But the trouble is not with Romney alone but with the GOP. One has only to look at Romney's own state. The Michigan right wing, which is now well to the right of Goldwater, hates him because he is not an unequivocal hawk on Vietnam and a complete troglodyte in economics. Richard Durant, the Grosse Pointe leader, brought in D. Bruce Evans of United Republicans of America to talk to Republicans in Bay City, Flint, Lansing and other cities. URA is for Sen. Strom Thurmond, Gov. Ronald Reagan, and others of that category. Durant is a former member of the John Birch Society. Then there is the 1976 Committee, which wants Ezra Taft Benson, Romney's fellow Mormon, for President in 1968. The 1976 Committee is headed by William J. Grede, a Milwaukee industrialist long identified with right-wing enterprises, and Charles R. Slight, Jr., a Holland, Mich., furniture manufacturer, like Grede a former president of the National Association of Manufacturers. Associated with them are Dean Clarence Manion; Admiral Ben Moreell (Ret.), chairman of Americans for Constitutional Action; and Loyd Wright of Los Angeles, former president of the American Bar Association and a right winger of right wingers. And this is only a partial listing of the gentry who are intent on building a fire under George in his own bailiwick. But if politics is too hot for him, he should never have got into it. He cannot join such bogus conservatives as these; they won't let him. What he could do is take heart, remember the past, and lay about him. Politics is not all that different from business. If he follows that course, he still may not be President, but people will again respect him.

Winning the Hearts of the People

Saigon is the capital of South Vietnam, but it is described by Time (January 20) as "a garrison without walls in a countryside alive with enemy bands." The U.S. lieutenant colonel who is head of security at the immense Tan Son Nhut airport says his job is "like defending a stockade in the days of the Indian wars." The U.S. Army decided that something should be done about it, and the solution in some respects resembled that which the Nazis applied in Lidice, Czechoslovakia, twenty-five years ago. There are differences: the Nazis shot all the men of Lidice out of hand and sent the women and children to concentration camps before razing the village. When our men set out in operation "Cedar Falls" to eradicate the settlements in the "Iron Triangle" north of Saigon, they shot only the Vietcong, and the camp is a resettlement camp. What is the same is that the four villages in the triangle have been leveled, and ours is a much bigger operation. Lidice had only about 500 inhabitants, while we have moved 6,000 Vietnamese, practically all of them women, children and old men, into what Tom Buckley of The New York Times describes as a settlement of "canvas-topped sheds thrown up on a wasteland," surrounded by barbed wire.

From this quarter, at least, the Vietcong will no longer issue from their tunnels to harry Saigon. However, some officials at the camp are said to be dubious. Except for the 286 Vietcong who were killed in the operation (a mere by-product), the rest of the men fled. In effect,

IN THIS ISSUE

January 30, 1967

EDITORIALS

130

ARTICLES

- 133 California Revolution 1:
The Dynamics of Repulsion

D. B. Luten

- 138 India Campaigns:
Cows, Corruption & Demonstrations

*Lloyd I. Rudolph and
Susanne Hoeber Rudolph*

- 143 Curran's NMU:
Headquarters vs. the Men at Sea

Dorian J. Fliegel

- 147 Awakening Olympus

Mordecai Roshwald

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 149 Playing the Game—for Fun and Profit

Rolfe Humphries

- 150 The Johnson System

Marvin E. Gettleman

- 152 The Dangers of Aid Overkill

Samuel L. Sharp

- 153 Searching for Kicks

Martin Tucker

- 154 The Old New Wave

Sol Yurick

- 156 Theatre

Harold Clurman

- 157 Films

Robert Hatch

- 157 Years (poem)

Harvey Shapiro

- 159 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor	CAREY McWILLIAMS	Washington	ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Managing Editor	ROBERT HATCH	Paris	ALEXANDER WERTH
Literary Editor	HELEN YGLESIAS	Theatre	HAROLD CLURMAN
Poetry Editor	MICHAEL GOLDMAN	Art	MAX KOZLOFF
Copy Editor	MARION HESS	Music	BENJAMIN BORETZ
Advertising Manager	MARY SIMON	Science	CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION

Volume 204
No. 5

we are telling these unreconstructed, and unreconstructable, Vietcong that we will feed and care for their families, however miserably, while they fight on.

What a dilemma—for us. And what further problems it brings to light. It has been suggested that the way to end the war is to clear the entire countryside of Vietnam and pave it, like a vast parking lot; then we can control the population. What even that would not accomplish, and what a succession of Cedar Falls will achieve no more successfully, is the oft-reiterated American objective of winning the hearts and minds of the people. The Iron Triangle was a bastion for the Vietcong, but it was also, in Buckley's words, a "fertile 60-square-mile area of paddy fields, orchards and rubber plantations." One of the refugees, a pregnant 24-year-old woman, said, "I was very poor in my village, but I didn't mind that. I wanted to stay." Her husband had been killed just before the evacuation. It is a strange way to win the hearts and minds that still survive.

Texas Ueber Alles

The Kennedys and the Johnsons are at it like the Hatfields and the McCoys, and the feud is heating up. During LBJ's delivery of the State of the Union message, the cunning camera kept turning to Senator Bob; a more limp attempt at applause has not been registered on TV in years.

The most amusing feature of the great vendetta is the way in which it has aroused the provincial passions of prominent Texans. It was foreseeable that LBJ would wait until the Hatfields had deployed their forces before launching his counterattack, but anyone knowing him could be sure that a counterattack would come. Nor is it a feeble riposte. The whole force and majesty of the greatest state in the Union (California may be more populous, Alaska have more square miles, but Texas is the greatest) has been mobilized in defense of LBJ. He is its highest avatar since the Alamo, and a lot richer than William Barrett Travis, Davy Crockett and James Bowie combined; thus he integrates the spiritual and material aspects of Texan pride. To lay rude auctorial hands on him, as William Manchester has done in The Death of a President, is to insult Texas itself. Nor is the Texas nobility of oil and land and space and politics taken in by the secondary feud between Manchester and his publishers on the one hand, and the Kennedys on the other. In the eyes of the barons, the Kennedys repented too late.

The orchestration of the Johnson-Texas counterblast cannot but command respect, however reluctant. They do things down there in such a big way. The big push led off with a series of Drew Pearson columns, larded with information that had all the marks of coming straight from Ole Hoss's mouth. Rep. Henry B. Gonzalez contributed his memories of the scene at Parkland Hospital; the horror and pathos are genuine, but have little to do with the feud. Then came the redoubtable Gov. John B. Connally, Jr., roaring that it was "common knowledge" that the trip on which President Kennedy was slain was no doing of Johnson's but of Kennedy's own making, "planned in the wake of polls reflecting declining popularity." By God, Connally will write a book himself, or have one written for him.

William S. White, a long-time Johnson idolater, writes in The Washington Post that Manchester's much touted book "turns out to be a pedestrian, if incomparably savage, exercise . . . in the sort of yellow journalism that was a great social problem fifty years ago." Sen. John G. Tower inserts this evaluation, so pure in its objectivity and sure in its historical sense, in the Congressional Record, and adds his own comment: "Dallas was and is a city of churches and schools; a clean and progressive community; a city of considerable style and erudition; a warm and friendly city unplagued by race riots or civic unrest."

In short, Dallas remains Dallas, and Texas remains Texas. Will it work? In a full-page New York Times ad, an editorial from the Dallas Times Herald is reprinted to rebut the slings and arrows of those critical of Texas. "Very patiently we have labored to close the wound," the editorial ends. "We wince only when the misinformed outsider rips the sutures." There are those who would have been willing to forget about Dallas and its gun-toters, its right-wing spitters and howlers, its morbid hate editorials and all the rest of it, but that was on condition that the Texans kept quiet about themselves for a while. Instead, their howls resound over the nation, and they rally around their illustrious son as if he were without fault. They may be doing him no service.

Why Not Hoffa?

The Teamsters' union has offered a $100,000 reward for information leading to the disclosure that the Department of Justice relied on illegal wire taps or "bugs" in securing the conviction of James Hoffa. William Loeb, the New Hampshire publisher whose newspaper once secured a substantial loan from the Teamsters and who apparently wants to demonstrate his gratitude, has put up another $100,000 on the same terms. But are either of these rewards really necessary?

In the recent case involving Joseph Schipani, the Department of Justice consented to a reversal of the conviction because illegal wire taps had been used. In this case the Solicitor General, Thurgood Marshall, stressed the point that since the Supreme Court exercises a supervisory role over methods used in federal prosecutions, he felt it his duty to inform the court of the taps. Mr. Marshall also said that the government had initiated an intensive survey of pending cases to determine if convictions had been obtained by "tainted" or illegally obtained evidence. Reports from Washington indicate that as many as 200 cases are being scrutinized as part of this general survey. This month, in a case involving seven Florida residents, Mr. Marshall informed the court that although none of the seven had been under "direct electronic surveillance," two of them were participants in conversations which were electronically monitored. This is the ninth instance in which the Department of Justice has volunteered a disclosure of this kind. Is the Hoffa case included in the survey? If not, why not? Have the records of the case been investigated to determine if any illegal wire taps or bugs were used? If Schipani was entitled to a frank statement of the facts, why isn't Hoffa entitled to the same treatment? After Fred Black's conviction (see "A Dirty Business," The Nation, December 26), the Department volunteered the information that illegal wire taps had been used. If Black and Schipani, why not Hoffa?

Blitzing the Consumer

The President is said to have readied a plan that will remove Esther Peterson, his adviser on consumer affairs, from the White House staff. In announcing her departure, the President will probably say that the work of consumer protection is being "upgraded" by being transferred to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and that new legislation designed to protect consumers is being requested. Few administrations have been more adept—or cynical—about using new legislation, without adequate enforcement provisions, to appease aroused interest groups. The Wall Street Journal recently quoted a Negro as saying: "Passing a law with no teeth in it isn't much good. They gave Negroes hope but they haven't given Negroes what they hope for."

Consumers will probably find themselves in the same position. The decision to blitz the consumer was made as early as mid-June of last year (but delayed until after the election). "Though the Administration wants to be known as the consumer's friend," reports Advertising Age, "the outpost at the White House level has proven to be a political liability. Strategists feel it produces few votes and antagonizes businessmen. . . ." Mrs. Peterson had succeeded in inducing members of the Consumer Advisory Council to delete from their report some "incendiary references" to advertising, but when the report went to the President on June 12 a majority continued to insist on calling for a Department of Consumers. (In Canada, incidentally, a parliamentary committee has just issued a report containing a long series of consumer-protection proposals including the immediate creation of a Department of Consumer Affairs.)

"The White House," according to the same source, "displayed its anger by bottling up the report, even though most of it was unusually well done. When the report was finally distributed last month, it was mailed out without any covering observation by the President. Moreover, no one has heard about the Consumer Advisory Council since the report was filed. When the terms of the council members expired, no successors were named." It would seem to be a fair inference also that the President was annoyed by the active help Mrs. Peterson gave housewives in organizing last year's successful supermarket boycott. Yet when he appointed Mrs. Peterson to the post three years ago he announced that he had made the move to "assure that the voice of the consumer will be loud, clear and uncompromising in the White House." Apparently it was so loud, clear and uncompromising that it gave him an earache.

California Revolution 1

The simplest, least disputable thing to say about California, now our most populous state, is that it is, and always has been, a revolution. Revolutions, of course, are creative and destructive, and just now it is important to take a look at the startling gains and distressing reversals which the ongoing California revolution has left in its wake since 1945. Such a survey is imperative not merely because of California's increasingly important role in national affairs but because it provides a preview of things to come. Recently the B.B.C., desiring to project a vision of the 21st century, presented a television documentary entitled "California: Year 2000." Some of the British critics came up with better titles: "Our Californian Future" was one. In general, the critics wrote glowing notices, but one, Nancy Banks-Smith, was obviously appalled by the vision. "With a spot of luck," she wrote, "I hope to die before it happens!"

But whatever feelings one may have in surveying the post-1945 scene, reflection is in order, for California is the future. So The Nation has projected a series which describes certain salient aspects of the accelerating California revolution in the period since 1945, the advances and reversals, the fine creative achievements and the mindless destruction. The series will be published in book form later in the year by Grossman Publishers. We cannot say how many articles in the series we shall be able to publish in these pages—pressure for space being what it is—but we shall publish a good sample. Included in the series are: "Disney's Fantasy Empire" by John Bright; "The Rebel Arts" by James Schevill; "California's 'Instant Cities'" by Theodore Roszak; "Revolution by Internal Combustion: California and the Automobile" by Richard Lillard; "The Freeway Revolt" by Samuel E. Wood; "California: Laboratory for Social Change" by Jennifer

Cross; "Santa Cruz: A Workable Utopia" by James P. Degnan; "The Education Explosion" by Mel Wax; "The Aerospace Industry" by Wesley Marx; "Revolution on California Soil" by Richard Lillard; "Water: The California Paradox" by Howard F. Gregor; "California Politics" by Gladwin Hill; "The Bloodiest Ballot" by Art Seidenbaum; "The Sierra Club" by Scott Thurber; "The Awareness Cults" by Donovan Bess; "The Cultural Scene" by Robert Kirsch, and "California and Australia" by R. T. Appleyard.—C. McW.

THE DYNAMICS OF REPULSION

D. B. LUTEN

Though a chemist for most of his professional life, Mr. Luten is now a lecturer in geography at the University of California. His particular concerns are the interaction of populations with natural resources and the rise of the conservation movement.

Edmund G. Brown, when he was governor, would speak with enthusiasm in election years of the growth of California. In the alternate, budget, years, he spoke with concern of the numbers problem. Late in the evening of November 8, 1966, when he conceded the election to Ronald Reagan, his own feelings were not in evidence. But Mrs. Brown stood by his side with an undisguised grin on her face. One wonders if she was thinking about 1967, a budget year. One also wonders how other Americans, the one-tenth who are Californians and the nine-tenths who are not, should look at the problems of California and its growth.

Everyone knows that California grows, and it is common to think of this as a recent phenomenon. Thus, the increase of 3.5 million (from 15.7 million in April, 1960, to 19.2 million in July, 1966) is greater than that witnessed in any other 6-year period for California or any other state. Again, between 1940 and 1950, the population grew by 5 million—surely a state record for a decade and as sure to be broken in 1970.

However, there is another way to look at population growth, a way we use all the time in other contexts. This is to measure the annual increase as a percentage of the existing population. For comparisons, it seems more rational. For instance, you will jeer at me if I say, "Imagine, the Rockefellers made a million dollars from their investments last year!" But you will be impressed if I say, "J. Doe made a million last year on a capital of $10,000." So, also, an increase in Wyoming's population by 5 million would be more startling (and more traumatic) than the California growth.

It may be objected that California's growth is not all internally generated; the major part of it has always been by immigration, some from foreign countries, most from other states. Thus, while growth before 1849 was internally generated and small, with the gold rush it became enormous. Putting aside qualms on this score, how has the state grown?

The record is unexpected: viewed broadly, the growth rate of California's population has been constant for a century. While it has grown more rapidly in one decade than another, ranging from least (2 per cent) in the depression to greatest (5.2 per cent) in the 1920s, if you look at the entire interval from 1860 to 1960, the tale is simple: the population, on the average, has grown at 3.8 per cent per year, doubling each 18.5 years, over the century. The increase totals more than 40-fold. The slow decades and the fast decades were so closely associated that the overall trend is one of spectacular regularity. The 1890s were slow but were followed by the prosperous 1900s and the deficit in numbers was made up. The depression was a period of low birth rates and, contrary to popular belief, also of low immigration. But it was preceded by the 1920s, with heavy immigration, so that by 1930 the population was "ahead of the curve." Then followed the war decade which made up the deficit, so that by 1950 the state was back on the curve. And it stayed there in 1960.

Natural increase has ranged 8-fold from a low of approximately 0.3 per cent per year for the depression decade to a high of about 2 per cent in the 1870s. The general trend has been one of slow decline, with a sharp drop in the 1930s, followed by a postwar upsurge almost to the level of a century ago. During most of these hundred years, Warren Thompson has calculated, families were too small to have maintained a constant population had immigration ceased.

Immigration, surprisingly, has varied less, ranging from a low of a little over 1 per cent per year in the 1890s to a high of more than 4 per cent in the 1920s. It has always carried the burden of growth, providing from 55 per cent (1870s) to 85 per cent (1930s).

When one looks at the state regionally, similar irregularities appear. In 1860, a third of all Californians lived in the San Francisco Bay Area and another third in the Sierra foothill gold country. Less than 5 per cent were in the south coastal region. Today, the Bay Area has shrunk to a fifth, the mountain counties to less than 5 per cent, while the south coast has grown to half.

So much for the past. Today, many of the trends persist. First, California's birth rate remains lower, but only a shade lower, than the nation's, and it has declined, as has the nation's, from a postwar peak in 1957. From this high of almost 25 infants annually per 1,000 persons in California, and just over 25 for the nation, the rate dropped in 1964 to 20.6 for California and 21.7 for the United States. Whether it will rise again within the next few years, when the postwar babies marry, is still uncertain. Californians will probably continue to have slightly smaller families than Americans as a whole.

Second, distribution of growth within the state continues to deviate widely from the average. Between 1960 and 1965, Orange County on the fringe of Los Angeles grew at 10 per cent per year, while five other counties had a very slight population loss. Four of these counties, in the northern Sierra Nevada, were small. The fifth is San Francisco, city and county, so urban that increasing metropolitan functions leave less and less room for living. Los Angeles County grows at about the rate for the entire state; the San Francisco Bay Area grows more slowly. Suburban counties grow more rapidly. All of these trends are plausible.

Although doubts may be voiced as to the urbanity of California's cities, statistically it is the least rural of the states. Close to 90 per cent of its residents are classed as urban. Among the many causes which could be cited the most obvious is the mechanization and low manpower requirement of its extractive industries. Do not, though, overlook the effect on the great cities of national publicity. With immigration providing the bulk of growth and immigrants educated by press and TV, growth gravitates to massive centers. Everyone in New York has heard of Los Angeles, but how many know of Placerville?

Third, age distribution in California is not as usually imagined: compared to the United States as a whole, California is a little deficient in elderly folk and has a small surplus of young adults.

Fourth, it is commonly thought that migrants become more and more the disadvantaged, the deprived, the poor, who escape from a bad into what they hope will be a better environment. Whether this is so I cannot say. At one time it appeared that immigrants from the Southwest came to the agricultural land of the Central Valley, were only transiently employed, and had to return to the family farm for the winter. They commonly made the seasonal migration for summer farm work several times before developing a niche of stable employment in California. How many times might such an immigrant be counted? In contrast, immigrants from the Northeast were believed to be going to California's cities, already assured of jobs or confident of employment. For example, within a stone's throw of my home, three new families arrived from out of state within a year. But all of these were corporate transfers, and were replacing equal numbers of emigrants. How shall we count these migrants?

In fact, one must hedge today on the patterns of immigration. Assessment of immigrants by automobile has been undertaken, but did the poorest arrive by car? Was the state of previous registration the state of origin, or did the person or family reach California only after several stops along the way? Disregarding these substantial doubts, immigrants today seem to obey reasonable laws of diffusion: more from populous areas, fewer from remote areas. Net annual immigration per 100,000 persons in the area of origin amounts to about 200 for the eleven Western states, around 75 for the plains, 85 for the Southwest, 25 for the Southeast, 50 for the North Central, and 30 for the Northeastern states.

One pattern that emerges clearly is that the slightly younger California population is being made still younger by immigrants. Those entering the state are rarely elderly. The proportion of persons over 40 years of age is lower than in the state's population. The fraction of immigrants between 20 and 30 is almost twice the fraction of residents of the state in that age group. Children under 5 are also more frequent among immigrants than among residents, but older children, plausibly, are scarcer. The picture, then, is one of immigration of young adults with young children.

In recent years, approximately 60 per cent of the state's growth has been due to immigration, 40 per cent to natural increase. This comes to 1,000 per day net migration, the difference between 2,000 immigrants and 1,000 emigrants. These numbers reflect the high mobility of the American population, the loss among many of them of traditional attitudes about where to live. Americans will go where they are attracted, will leave places which repel them.

At present, however, a decrease is occurring, as shown in the tabulation below.

But one year does not make a decade, much less a century. What comes next? Early last year, a brief press flurry arose when the State Department of Finance, the reputable and competent source of most of my data, released a statement that immigration to the state had ceased. Stopped dead. The test, a neat one, was that the population of school children in the third to the eighth grades was no greater than the population the year before of children in the second to seventh grades. The test is good because no children are born into this group, very few die out of it, very few drop out of school; the only change is due to migration. It assumes only that family patterns do not change rapidly, an assumption justified by experience. A week later the statement was retracted and it was explained that a change had taken place in the manner of assembling the data and that some reports had stuck in the new channels and had been overlooked. Immigration has not, in fact, ceased.

Enough of the present. What of the future? First, note that California cannot continue to grow forever, or even for a very long period, at a greater rate than the nation. Simple arithmetic shows that if California maintains its growth rate at the traditional 3.8 per cent per year and the nation maintains its rate at the 1.6 per cent of 1960, then in about 110 years, say 2070, the populations of both the United States and California would be about a billion. That is, all Americans would live in California. This seems unlikely.

No one expects such a result. Continuance at 3.8 per cent per year leads to 72 million Californians in the year 2000, 100 million in 2020. But estimates have rarely been for more than 45 million in 2000 and no one cares to project to 2020. Recent projections suggest less growth by century's end, and the State Department of Finance's current projection is for 39 to 42 million.

If there are not to be 72 million Californians at the end of the century, then California's growth rate must diminish. What will cause this to occur? The answer can be given in the form of a truism, and it must be emphasized that this answer is only a truism. It was phrased a few years ago in these terms:

California will stop growing one day because it will have become just as repulsive as the rest of the country.

The phrasing is provocative because of the twofold implications of "repulsive" meaning simply to repel like a magnetic field, but also carrying the sense of "disgusting," "repugnant," "distasteful." Taken at its face value, it says Americans will go where they are attracted, will leave where they are repelled. Today, they are more attracted than repelled by California; the day must come when as many are repelled as attracted.

Chemistry has an analogous term, the "fugacity," the escaping tendency, the tendency to flee. A gas tends to flee from a region of high fugacity to a region of lower fugacity and, as a result, its escaping tendency approaches equality in the two places. All people have tended to escape unhappy environments, to seek better ones. This is one of the essences of humanity. What else is hope? In the past its expression was slow; migration reflected bitter unrest. Today, it is easier.

The analogy suggests only that migration will continue until the escaping tendency is equal everywhere; until, on the average, for each Easterner who sees greener pastures in the West, a Westerner will see them in the East. How fast the adjustment will occur, how fast reaction to a vision of withering pastures will take place, is another matter. Willingness to migrate has been increasing for centuries, but even in the 19th century, migration was not for the timid, the secure, the provident, the affluent; rather it was for the bold, the disinherited, the wastrel, the indigent. Provincialism, ignorance of remote lands, myths of perils along the way, all of these limited equilibration. Today, most Americans see California daily on the TV screen, know that its customs, its hostilities for the itinerant differ but little from those of Maine or South Carolina, and they have a pretty clear notion of job opportunities in Los Angeles and San Jose. "If you think California is the promised land, fly out this weekend and

Year	Population (millions)	Natural Increase (thousands)	Net Immigration (thousands)	Growth Rate, per cent per year
				Calif.	U. S.	Calif. minus U.S.
1960	15.6	240	370
1963	17.3	230	370	4.0	1.6	2.4
1966	19.2	(220)*	(230)	3.7	1.6	2.1
				(2.3)	(1.1)	(1.2)

*Numbers in parentheses are tentative.

have a look. But be back for work Monday!" Or case the entire state next vacation.

By and large, it is inescapable that equilibration is more rapid today than yesterday. If the fugacity relative to the rest of the country has not changed, then migration should have increased. Since it has not, the attractive force of California must be dropping.

A reasonable corollary of this combination of increasing mobility and decreasing difference in escaping tendency is that migration will not dwindle slowly, in a "normal" fashion, but rather will drop quite precipitately, "abnormally."

This does not mean that every American is on the move. What concerns us is marginal mobility. Correspondingly, if California becomes repulsive, not all residents will be repelled. Some are immune to smog, many are protected against most aspects of repulsiveness. But the quite few marginally mobile people reflect and influence social and economic conditions and cannot, therefore, be ignored.

If growth will end with nationally uniform repulsiveness (and attractiveness), what is the anatomy of repulsiveness and attractiveness? A host of visions comes to mind. On the one hand: roses and sunshine in December, cool fog in summer, picnicking without rain, sunny beaches, magnificent mountains, coast lines, forests, vast empty lands, all near at hand; action, the metropolis of glamour always in the very pupil of the public eye; the metropolis of beauty, ringed by sea, hills and bay; great universities. But on the other: crowded, stinking, smarting air, crowded highways, whether at weekend's close or workday's end; crowded schools, crowded prisons, crowded sewers; exorbitant taxes, instability, cranks and extremism from wing to wing; dissension, incipient revolution, unrest, unrest, unrest! Did everyone who went to California go because he couldn't get along with his neighbors?

Visions and knowledge of nearer places also swing the balance. What makes the climate of the Northeast repulsive? Those midweek winter storms, when you must shovel the driveway and hit the road in the gloom! Our grandparents stayed in and read "Snowbound"; we must go to work. Where have the water shortages been close to home? In the East.

At the base of all of this must lie jobs. A man does have to make a living. Where are the jobs? Are the space age contractors hiring? Fifteen thousand new openings at Lockheed, in Sunnyvale on the San Francisco peninsula, mean 15,000 new employees, 30,000 new dependents, and perhaps another 25,000 workers, and their 50,000 dependents, to supply and distribute goods and services to the entire 120,000.

The greatest determinant of immigration must be the assurance, the realistic prospect or the vision of employment. Unemployment is higher in California than nationally. One of Governor Reagan's first campaign promises was that he would do better at creating new jobs than had Governor Brown. But, transparently, if he does create new jobs, resident Californians will not have a prior right to them. New jobs will create new immigrants. The only thing proved by high unemployment in California is that the state is still more attractive, less repulsive, than the rest of the country. The mobile American will still take a greater chance on being unemployed in California than elsewhere. This, too, will change.

Three years ago, a conference entitled "Man in California, 1980's" spent two days on the almost insuperable problems facing California in the next two decades: polluted air with the prospect of $2 billion a year to be spent merely to maintain the present distressing status, polluted water, growing imbalance in water supply; agriculture disappearing under suburbs, deteriorating urban transport and an unremitting struggle to improve highway transport; overcrowded parks, littered beaches, vanishing wildlife; urban slums, a perennial focus of unemployment; increasing crime, disturbed minds. All of these typical American phenomena, the discussion made quite clear, were to be most severe in California because of California's unremitting growth. The last act of the conference was to present a most convincing outline of the enormous task involved in attracting new industry to California, burdened by high taxes, long hauls, restrictive legislation. And yet, by virtue of the extraordinary competence of those searching for new industry, complete success on this score was to be expected. So here we have it: entire agreement that the state's problems are associated with its growth, and yet growth must be maintained. Do we conclude that a fate worse than an environment in ruins is an economy in ruins?

Growth means new jobs and new jobs mean growth. On this merry-go-round, which is cart and which is horse? And what drives the merry-go-round?

It must be suspected that claims on the national economy drive the state's economy. If California can buy from the nation what it wants, first with gold, then wheat, then citrus fruits, then retirements, then oil, then movies, tourism and entertainment, California can grow. But the gold is gone; the wheat has given way to barley to feed livestock consumed in California; Florida and Texas competition is rough on citrus; the subdivisions creep over the Class I crop land; Florida and Arizona have the retirement market; the oil is dwindling, natural gas is imported from Texas and Alberta; movies are made elsewhere; Californians spend as much outside California on vacation as outsiders spend in California; only a small portion of entertainment receipts is spent in California. What, then, is left?

Three items: First, cash receipts from agriculture are still great. Second, more of California's industrial needs are being provided locally; California needs less per capita from outside. Third, California's immigrants bring credit from the East and an insatiable appetite to consume. California has sold its resources, now it is selling its future.

"Foster City—Lagoon Living, 3 bedrooms de luxe, $31,750, $233.27 per month, taxes and insurance included, for 35 years." To the end of the century.

"How much is this mountain side (with a narrow overlook of Lake Tahoe)?" "$700 an acre." "But last year that Saxon Creek land sold for $350." "$350 last year, $700 this year; isn't that about right?"

As long as the immigration continues, California can continue on the merry-go-round, can continue to live in the land of the Red Queen. But the Red Queen is debt, and she is in splendid running condition. How long will the race last?

The answer is easy. So long as Eastern creditors believe California's growth will continue. If a state has a housing industry growing at the interest rate (say, 3.8 per cent per year) and financed from outside, then for the first amortization cycle of 25 years the region receives more credit, can buy more from outsiders, than it has to return in monthly payments. After a full cycle of payments, each month's payments just provide the credit for next month's new starts. But when growth slackens, the monthly payments will be more than the credit advanced for the current starts. And when the growth stops, credit for new houses becomes zero, but the payments will continue for another 25 years. The assumptions that the housing industry grows at the interest rate and is financed from outside are not quite true, but each of them is close enough to outline an ominous picture. When the growth stops, what will California do to pay its way, to buy what it needs from the other states, in addition to paying off its mortgage holders in those states? And if householders come to be without jobs, will foreclosure help creditors? Will the householders already have emigrated or, still in occupancy, will they offer to protect the house from the neighborhood kids if the title holder pays a nominal watchman's fee?

The forecasts of California's growth are self-fulfilling forecasts. As long as they are believed, growth will continue. When they become incredible, growth will end. The mistaken announcement last February that growth had ceased was a remarkable act of bureaucratic integrity. If the statisticians had, in fact, decided that growth was about to end, would growth have ended?

Look now at the record of housing starts, of savings and loans failures, of residential vacancies. In spite of this record, which is disturbing, if we may judge from the level of unemployment, which remains high, California is not yet repulsive.

Finally, it has also been said that when growth ends in California, the party out of power will be congratulating itself for a decade. So the final questions remain. What was Governor Brown thinking of when, after that dead political campaign, he conceded the election to Ronald Reagan? And how can California remain attractive without attracting its ruin?

INDIA CAMPAIGNS

Cows, Corruption & Demonstrations

LLOYD I. RUDOLPH and
SUSANNE HOEBER RUDOLPH

Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph, both of whom teach political science at the University of Chicago, are presently in India as Faculty Fellows of the American Institute of Indian Studies. They are joint authors of The Modernity of Tradition: Political Development in India, to be published by the University of Chicago in the spring.

Delhi

The cold weather has come to Delhi. The farmers and herdsmen along the Ring Road wear heavy wool cloaks pulled over their heads, the young men congregating in front of the Regal Cinema sport thick, fuzzy hand-woven sweaters. Middle-class householders huddle before small electric heaters and the poor before smoldering fires of wood shavings and cow-dung cakes in tiny braziers. With the cold weather has come election fever. Members of Parliament have left the capital for their constituencies; ministers must postpone less urgent decisions to tour the states. The national dailies devote large space to special reports from the states, and the director of India's Institute of Public Opinion writes columns predicting the election's outcome on the basis of survey data.

The level of excitement seems even higher than in the months before India's previous three elections. Larger, more numerous problems, and a serious case of hyper-politicization have raised the capital's chronic sense of crisis to new heights.

Food heads the list of problems, though what its effect will be on the election is difficult to predict; the Congress Party will be blamed for the scarcity and high cost of food but will get credit for relieving the distress caused by an unkind nature. It was another drought year, not nearly so bad as the year before when annual average rainfall over large sections of the country dropped to the lowest level in sixty years, but bad enough. The Minister for Food and Agriculture, C. Subramaniam, has indicated that food production may go up from last season's disastrous 72 million tons to 80 or even 85 million tons, a considerable improvement though still well below the 88 million tons grown in 1964-65.

The minimum required to feed the country in 1966-67 will be about 90 million tons, leaving a gap of from 5 to 10 million tons to be filled by imports. The annual addition of 12 million persons to the half billion total population places agriculture—and family planning—at the forefront of the nation's problems.

The 1966-67 shortage is regional, affecting Bihar and eastern Uttar Pradesh. President Johnson's widely reported delay in authorizing food shipments under the Food for Peace Act was for a time linked in the local press to his alleged displeasure at Indian criticism of U. S. policy in Vietnam. This strengthened the argument of those critical of American pressure and "interference." When Washington explained that its reluctance turned on a desire to internationalize India's food problem, its stock made a small recovery. The Administration's claim that it was also holding back food until it was satisfied that India was making a maximum effort to become self-sufficient was hard to criticize but no less resented. Being a beggar was bad enough, but proving oneself a worthy beggar was worse. The country has shown maximum concern for some years now; the government has raised the level and proportion of agricultural investment markedly, and multiplied and expanded programs. But there are no panaceas or overnight solutions in food production.

The inability of the central government to procure the small food surpluses that exist in a few states troubles Indians who worry about the increasing power and independence of state governments. A cartoon in a major daily showed central government ministers preparing a check list: "Let's see. We'll go to Canada, the U.S., the USSR, and—oh yes, Andhra." Better cooperation from Andhra and other surplus states would relieve, but could by no means solve, the problem. The whole of the estimated internal "surplus" comes, at best, to 1.8 million tons. It will, of course, be sold and eaten but not always by those who most need it.

The two pre-election sessions of Parliament spent some time on the food crisis, but the events that attracted most attention were the opposition's sweeping attack on corruption in the Congress government and the cabinet crisis that ensued when Home Minister G. L. Nanda was replaced as a result of the cow-slaughter agitation. In the monsoon session which ended in early September, the opposition gave government an unprecedented battering. Key cabinet ministers were attacked for tampering with steel licenses or favoring former law clients; Mrs. Gandhi was accused of accepting a mink coat from a shipping magnate, a charge later withdrawn. Outside the doors of Parliament an unending series of demonstrations by opposition parties and organized interest groups, from Communists demanding the government's resignation over high prices to goldsmiths demanding an end to the ban on the manufacture of 24 carat gold ornaments, forcefully reminded legislators of the public's distress. Prices, up 15 per cent in the past year, had made inflation a potentially explosive issue.

When the winter session convened in November, it seemed that the outer limits of public demonstration and criticism of government had been reached. But the scheduling of two further agitations, one by sadhus (holy men) to achieve a complete ban on cow slaughter, and one by students to air their grievances, raised political pressure still higher. The mishandling of the sadhus' demonstration was followed by the badly managed attempt by Mrs. Gandhi to shuffle her cabinet. Some say these events are only the usual indications of an approaching general election; the opposition is preparing its ground and the charges and demonstrations are part of the campaign. Others think the attacks reflect a deeper malaise.

Charges of corruption against the Congress Party are an old story in India; they go back at least to 1937, when popular governments took full charge in the provinces. Indians, like most peoples, relish political gossip and scandal; at the same time they hold public men to such high standards of probity as to make indiscriminate accusation easy. What is new this year is the shift from the usual target, the state governments, to the central government. It is unlikely that the present cabinet ministers are any less honest than their predecessors. Mr. Nehru lost two senior colleagues, Finance Minister T. T. Krishnamachari and Minister for Oil and Fuels, K. D. Malaviya, after Parliamentary accusations and subsequent investigations. Three state chief ministers whom he supported suffered a similar fate. Mrs. Gandhi has so far lost none, although the attacks have drawn blood and may yet result in resignations. But even if the present cabinet is no worse than those that went before, and may contain a higher concentration of administrative talent, the country for some reason feels its leadership less worthy of respect and support.

The present cabinet members are more vulnerable than those under Nehru. Those holding important portfolios lack the honorable scars of jail-ridden years in the nationalist movement. Parliament does not accord them the respect of founding fathers. They are attacked more viciously, and do not defend themselves with the self-confidence or self-righteousness of their predecessors. Mrs. Gandhi lacks the combativeness, Parliamentary skill and short temper of her father, who often waded in to defend a beleaguered colleague.

The appearance in Parliament of representatives speaking for a new spirit of Populist radicalism has also changed its atmosphere. The Samyukta Socialist Party (SSP), centered mainly in northern India, dedicated to a rigorous and indiscriminating egalitarianism, and manned by a flock of unruly M.P.s did most of the damage during the monsoon session, seizing the initiative from the old radicals, the Communist Party of India (CPI) and the Jan Sangh.

There is much talk in Delhi of the decline of Parliamentary dignity and much concern for the effect this may have on political conduct generally. The SSP regards Parliament as a slow-moving and ineffectual talking shop; they find "struggle"—demonstrations and direct action—more congenial and believe that it is more apt to yield results. The party is fiercely inimical to anything that smacks of privilege or un-Indian ways. In a recent defamation suit (against Time for attributing to him scurrilous remarks concerning Madame Pandit's beauty that he claims not to have uttered), Dr. Ramanohar Lohia, the SSP's leader, made plain that he had regarded Jawaharlal Nehru as excessively sympathetic to the British. Lohia's charge was aimed more at Nehru's style, his Harrow-Cambridge manner, his cosmopolitanism and scientific impatience with what he regarded as parochialism and obscurantism, than at his nationalist record. Members of Lohia's party are apt to make a minister who answers in English repeat himself in Hindi. They launch campaigns against statues of Queen Victoria and other impedimenta of the late British raj. They demand to know why government is giving money to a postgraduate institution which allows students to write Ph.D. theses on such valueless topics as President Hoover's views on public administration and, what is more, to do so in English. And Dr. Lohia, while deploring in Parliament the burning of cars during the sadhu demonstration, attacked the motorists' arrogance and lack of respect for pedestrians.

SSP members do worry about the poor and the dispossessed, the marginal tenant, the untouchable landless laborer, the petty clerk in city or town, living on a fixed salary. While the party is not taken seriously as an alternative government federally or in the states and will not poll a large vote nationally, when Dr. Lohia speaks of the international conspiracy against the egalitarian movement, he strikes a responsive chord in many breasts. The SSP summons up a vision of the late 19th-century Southern and Midwestern Populism which damned as exploitative and un-American the banks, striped pants and Anglicized ways of the East Coast.

Concern over the decline of Parliamentary proprieties is matched by concern over the increase in urban political demonstrations at the expense of constituted channels for political participation. Everybody expects that in Calcutta periodic street demonstrations will be organized by trade unions of various leftist shades, by students and by the CPI. Lately the hartal, a popular strike to close shops and other public services in sympathy with some cause or another, has been replaced by the bandh (from bandh karo, to close) which is more sweeping. Moreover, the bandhs are affecting not only Calcutta, which had a (peaceful) two-day super bandh in September, but also Bombay, traditionally more staid in its politics, and other cities. The demonstrations before Parliament during the monsoon and winter sessions were massive street marches rather than bandhs. The Right (Moscow) CPI brought as many as 100,000 marchers to Delhi, mostly from nearby states but some from those more distant. There has been speculation that the money required to finance this grand and somewhat artful affair came in part from Moscow. It is doubtful that Moscow agrees with its principal slogan, "Indira Government Resign," although its slow and niggardly response to India's request for emergency food aid (200,000 tons), and the postponement of Premier Kosygin's visit until after the election, has raised the question. However, the Kremlin may very well have been interested in strengthening the Right CPI against the Peking-oriented Left CPI. When a reporter at a press conference asked the general secretary of the Right CPI if the party was opposed to the political and material support being extended to the Gandhi government by Moscow, he failed to answer.

To the general confusion surrounding Communist motives and purposes was added the macabre affair of the obscene posters (concerning Mrs. Gandhi) which, on the day of the Right CPI march, were placed about Delhi. All parties denied responsibility, and Blitz, the muck-raking leftist weekly, blamed it on the CIA.

Behind the increase in bandhs and other forms of direct action lies the reality of great hardship for the urban salariat and enhanced malnutrition in the countryside. The drought made food scarce and expensive, while devaluation in the context of stagnant production has driven up the price of consumer goods. Government efforts to distribute food in the cities at controlled prices has alleviated but by no means solved the problems. Dealers operating fair-price shops are often without supplies of wheat or rice, which are available elsewhere at black-market prices. City dwellers on fixed small incomes and villagers living in the backwaters of food deficit states feel the pinch sharply. It remains to be seen whether their distress will send them to the polls and, if it does, whether they will vote against the Congress, increasingly the apparent source of emergency work and food.

Until the violent outcome of the cow-slaughter demonstration, Delhi and the states had pursued a mild policy toward various forms of direct action, attempting to control violence but not, for the most part, forbidding marches and bandhs. The Right Communists received permission to use the capital's huge Ramlila Ground, generally reserved for public meetings and religious festivals, to pitch their tents and assemble marchers during the week before the grand demonstration. L. P. Singh, the able secretary to the Home Ministry, traveled to Calcutta in anticipation of the super bandh, to advise the West Bengal government to use restraint. The policy of moderation arose out of the realization that many of the grievances were real and widely shared. The leaders also calculated that, in face of the impending general elections, they could only hurt themselves by giving demonstrators the additional grievance of "police brutality."

The sadhus and their unruly friends caused the government to reverse its earlier lenient policy. The former Defense Minister, Mr. Chavan, known for combining judiciousness with firmness, replaced Home Minister Nanda, who was felt to be insufficiently resolute. The students, who were next in line for a major demonstration, were put on notice to cancel their plans. The preventive measures, which included closing all colleges, stationing police at the borders of Delhi, and the arrest of the M.P.s who promised to lead the students, were so effective that only a handful remained to shout slogans and be arrested. Greater firmness seems to have restored public confidence in the government's will and ability to maintain law and order and to resist coercive tactics. The government, in turn, seems to have concluded that firmness is less damaging politically than it feared.

The test of these perceptions and resolutions was not long in coming. Mass demonstrations, followed by rioting, broke out in Andhra to force a commitment from the central government that it would build India's fifth giant public sector steel plant there. The shankaracharya of Puri temple, formerly a leading member of a reactionary Hindu party (the Ram Rajya Parishad), undertook a fast unto death on behalf of an assurance from the government that it would ban all forms of cow slaughter. At about the same time, Sant (Saint) Fateh Singh, a Muslim convert to Sikhism and political leader of the Akali Dal, a community party, announced that he would immolate himself in the Golden Temple, the Sikh St. Peter's, unless the government agreed to turn over to the newly formed Sikh-majority state of Chandigarh the Le Corbusier-designed capital of the undivided Punjab, the Bakhra Dam (highest in India) and certain disputed enclaves. In none of these instances did the government give in, although Mrs. Gandhi's eleventh-hour agreement, at the request of the chief ministers of Punjab and Haryana, to arbitrate the Sant's demands, appeared to some too high a price to pay for saving his life.

The sadhus' demonstration and the ensuing violence weakened the government in the short run but may have strengthened it for the future. Mrs. Gandhi's response to the government's humiliation before Parliament was to use the occasion to strengthen her cabinet. Central to her purpose was dropping Gulzarilal Nanda, the Home Minister. Twice Acting Prime Minister and the most senior of her cabinet colleagues, he is also patron of a national sadhu organization and a true believer in cow protection. His decision not to bar sadhus from the Parliamentary area looked, in retrospect, most unwise.

Indira Gandhi

Dropping Nanda put portfolios in motion and Mrs. Gandhi moved to settle a few other problems as well. Finance Minister Sachin Chaudhuri and Commerce Minister Manubhai Shah had been warring ever since devaluation was announced in June, 1966. To drop antagonistic colleagues and adopt a strong line of policy in this vital area seemed Mrs. Gandhi's intention. But on this occasion, her decisiveness proved her undoing. When news of the contemplated changes reached the press, both the attempt to replace Nanda with Chavan and to remove the warring economic ministers were blocked by political pressures from within the party and the cabinet and from the state parties.

In the event, she overcame the resistance to Chavan's appointment but not to other changes. Not having gained the support or acquiescence of key political figures, and without the kind of close security that so sensitive a political maneuver requires until it has been successfully executed, Mrs. Gandhi acted too quickly and too much in the open. She may have overestimated her freedom of action; if so, the result narrowed it still further, at least for the short run, by lowering her prestige, reducing her authority and tarnishing her image. But she is the stronger by Mr. Chavan.

The resurgence of opponents who find Congress too secular and insufficiently nationalist has, in recent years, become increasingly apparent. The assassination of Gandhi, at the height of the Hindu-Muslim killing which followed partition, by a Hindu who thought him soft on Pakistan and Muslims, did much to discredit all parties and organizations that favored a strong Hindu state. Nehru, too, always regarded Hindu communalism as one of the greatest dangers to India. His views, policies and actions did much to discourage it among his colleagues in Congress and to create a public ideology against it. But Gandhi died in 1948; Nehru in 1964. The war with Pakistan has clothed anti-Muslim symbolism with the respectability of national struggle against a foreign enemy. The Jan Sangh, a less fanatic and more secular version of the earlier Hindu communal parties, benefited from this Hindu resurgence in the 1962 election, and is likely to gain again in the northern, Hindi-speaking states.

The anti-cow-slaughter demonstrations are part of this Hindu revival. There are good reasons to suppose that the furor was supported, if not directly organized, by the Hindu political parties, who recognize the electoral appeal. But a much broader group supported the cow protectors, including Congressmen. The Congress Parliamentary Party, just before the sadhus' march, urged the government to press states that had not done so to ban cow slaughter. The new Home Minister, Mr. Chavan, like Nanda before him, has urged the same. The cow is a basic issue, a symbol of Hinduism in danger from the forces of secularism and modernity. The cow's defense helps mobilize India's latest potential for religious fundamentalism and revivalism. William Jennings Bryan's stand on behalf of Genesis against Darwin in the Scopes trial is the most recent American equivalent that can help to evoke the context in which such battles are fought. It is difficult for politicians to resist such fundamentalist currents frontally, and few in India are doing so. Still, a good many ministers and state governments are aware that the constitution as interpreted by the Supreme Court prohibits a total ban on slaughter. Article 48 of the non-justiciable Directive Principles provides that "the state shall endeavor to organize agriculture and animal husbandry on modern and scientific lines and shall, in particular, take steps for preserving and improving the breeds, and prohibiting the slaughter, of cows and calves and other milch and draught cattle." Efforts in the constituent assembly to narrow this language by confining animals eligible for protection to "useful" ones or to broaden it by listing bulls and bullocks were defeated.

Agriculture being a state concern, it was left to the various states to implement these "directives." Four have no legislation after seventeen years, while others have drawn the terms of protection rather narrowly. The "cow wallahs" now want the central government, through constitutional amendment and legislation, to do what the constituent assembly in 1949 refused to do: prohibit absolutely the killing of cattle.

Political support for a total ban is less strong than the events of November 7, and the publicity given to the fasts of the shankaracharya of Puri and other holy men, suggest. Indian non-Hindu minorities, Muslims, Christians, Sikhs and tribal peoples, constituting about one-fifth of the population, do not hold the cow sacred. Nor have India's scheduled castes (untouchables), one-seventh of the total population, any special regard for the cow or those who fight its cause. Indeed, Swami Karpatri, the shankaracharya of Puri's chief in the Ram Rajya Parishad (God's Rule Party) and a key organizer of the November 7 demonstration, fasted some years ago to bar untouchables from a temple in Benares. Congress' increased vulnerability to "cow wallah" pressure is related to its declining fortunes in the Hindu heartland where religious revivalism makes its strongest appeal. In the other three-fifths of the country, the rimland that encircles the Hindi heartland, greater prosperity and education provide support for the secular principles laid down in the constitution and given expression during Nehru's seventeen years as Prime Minister.

Despite evidence of widespread and organized discontent, it seems certain that Congress will capture a majority of seats in the lower house of the Parliament, and quite likely that it will win legislative majorities or be able to form governments in fourteen of India's sixteen states. At the same time, this election, fourth since independence, should mark the end of Congress' dominant role in the Indian political system. Whether Congress can survive transition from a dominant to a majority party, and if it does whether it can govern vigorously and effectively enough to revive the pace of national development, staggered by two wars, two droughts and the deaths of two Prime Ministers, are some of the important questions that this election will help answer. The challenge to the opposition parties is equally great; can they, after fifteen years in the wilderness, often as satellites of political tendencies in the Congress, use creatively and responsibly the increased power they will gain?

According to estimates by the Indian Institute of Public Opinion, Congress' proportion of the popular vote for members of Parliament, never more than 47 per cent in previous elections and 44.7 in the last, is likely to fall to 40 per cent in this one. Its vote in state assembly elections, institute forecasts indicate, will go a shade lower.

In previous elections Congress won 70 per cent or more of the seats in Parliament and legislative majorities in the states with less than half of the popular vote because the opposition was divided in ways that enabled more Congress than opposition candidates to win with pluralities rather than majorities. Of 491 Parliamentary contests in 1962, sixty-nine involved two candidates, 141 three, 126 four, and 155 five or more. The Communist Party of India, the Praja Socialist Party (PSP) and the Samyukta Socialist Party to the Congress left, and the Jan Sangh and Swatantra parties to its right often were as interested in defeating one another as they were in defeating Congress. In multi-cornered contests, Congress' nationalist heritage, its association with the names of Gandhi and Nehru, its identification with government and the allocation of resources, and its superior all-India organizational capability gave it a marked advantage.

The opposition's opportunity to do better in this election lies in the capacity of its various parties to make electoral arrangements that will result in the Congress facing fewer opponents in most constituencies. Given a decline in Congress' popular support, the higher level of consolidation among its electoral opponents and the fact that eighty-seven of the 361 seats it won in 1962 were "marginal," a loss of seventy seats seems likely. S. K. Patil, Congress boss in Bombay, predicted in mid-December that the party would lose 20 to 25 per cent of its seats. The opposition parties may gain by a higher percentage, since the seats in the lower house have been increased from 496 to 520. By the same token, net Congress losses may be lower, depending upon how the new seats are divided among government and opposition parties.

The absence of a nationally united opposition reflects the incompatibility of Congress' opponents and the capacity of Congress to forge a national consensus. Some find Congress too Socialist, while others find it insufficiently so. Its "mixed" economic policy builds through planned development an ever-larger public sector, restrains but does not discourage a lively private sector, and ministers to a massive peasant sector. By these means it assimilates, partly through design, partly through inadvertence, almost the whole political spectrum.

It seems likely that in this election, as in the previous three, to him that hath shall be given. Those who control the government, its prestige, power and resources, have an advantage in competitive democratic politics and nowhere more so than in India. There are still peasants who believe that British raj has been replaced by Congress raj, and give it the respect to which the government is entitled. Businessmen who might prefer more conservative policies realize that Congress will win again and wish to retain some influence over economic policy and allocation of licenses and foreign exchange. And there is a tendency, more apparent in some states than in others, to use administrative discretion in the allocation of resources and patronage to favor the governing party, a phenomenon not unknown to the Johnson-Humphrey Administration. If there is a lack of enthusiasm for Congress among intellectuals, the modern middle classes and organized public opinion generally, it remains true that the party retains the support of that vast voting public not easily visible to the modern political eye, the propertied peasants who dominate the countryside and the state governments.

For Mrs. Gandhi, however, the 1967 election will be a critical test. The more seats Congress loses, the less her chances are of staying on as Prime Minister. Kamarah Nadar, the powerful and taciturn president of the Congress Party, has had a larger voice than she in the selection of party nominees; these men are more likely to follow his than Mrs. Gandhi's lead in the selection of the party's Parliamentary leader after the election. Her political future is very much at stake.

CURRAN'S NMU

Headquarters vs. the Men at Sea

DORIAN J. FLIEGEL

Mr. Fliegel, now studying in the field of contemporary American social problems at Amherst College, has worked and traveled for a total of six months aboard merchant ships.

The 45,000-man National Maritime Union is the largest American union for unlicensed seamen. For these men, spread out around the world on their ships, seafaring is a job in which it is physically impossible to escape the conditions of work. The union is their primary means of relating to society; it is also their primary source of frustration. I have listened to the problems of seamen while working with them. The sense of powerlessness they feel toward their working lives is profound. The seamen are cynical about the "one party-one man" administration of Joseph Curran, now in his thirtieth year as the only president the union has ever known. They realize that the union is not democratically run. They believe their officials are more concerned with personal power and loyalty to Curran than with the well-being of the membership. That is the voice one hears from the rank and file on the ships.

If the seamen have accepted the situation, they have done so because the union has absolute power over their economic lives, and because they believe, in the final analysis, that the system is delivering the most that they can expect. But rank-and-file discontent is not without its representatives. Last spring, five men opposed the Curran administration in the NMU national elections and were defeated. Under the provisions of the Landrum-Griffin Labor Reform Act of 1959, they immediately filed protests with the Secretary of Labor, charging fraud. Accordingly, Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz has filed action in the New York Federal Court, seeking to upset the election. The Labor Department's case takes notice of the charges of election irregularities, but concentrates on a provision in the NMU constitution which restricts candidacy for national office to members who have already served in certain designated posts—a provision which reduces the pool of possible candidates to 400, or less than 1 per cent of the membership. The suit notes further that 4,800 seamen were at sea during the period when nominating papers could be filed, and that 2,400 were at sea at the time of the election, with no provision made for them to cast absentee ballots.

Striking back vigorously, Curran claims that the union is being persecuted for its dispute with the government over maritime policy, and holds that the eligibility rule for national office is only a realistic recognition of the need for basic experience. He concludes by observing that, under Landrum-Griffin, the conditions of the workman have advanced much too far toward those prevailing in the Soviet Union, and that "the right of free men in a free labor movement is at stake."

One of the five unsuccessful candidates, James M. Morrissey, has not been content to wait for court action. Morrissey began in August to write and distribute his own newspaper, The Call. His program asks for a return of the NMU to democracy through rank-and-file control, and his openly declared strategy during the summer was that the opposition should organize for the NMU's 14th National Convention, then two months away.

On September 14, two weeks before the convention, Morrissey was attacked by three large men with lead pipes, who beat him and broke his skull. He had just left NMU national headquarters, the Joseph Curran Building in New York. Morrissey's "Open Letter to All Convention Delegates," urging them to gain control by rejecting the Curran-appointed committee members, was not well circulated. His message went unheeded.

The national convention, held in the Grand Ballroom of the Hotel Commodore October 3-6, was a complete victory for the administration. Curran handled the job of chairman so well that the revolt, if it existed, never materialized. He used his personal toughness and his well-coordinated administrative organization to get passed exactly what he wanted and only what he wanted.

Since I had recently been on an NMU ship, the unanimity at the Commodore astonished me. If there was any opposition among the seamen, their delegates did not present it. The issues generated by the Curran administration were distant from the concerns seamen express to one another in the fo'c'sles and mess rooms.

Precisely because conditions at sea are still rugged and perilous, because they exact a psychological price in the monotony and abnormality of the life, because men exhibit at close range the most vicious kinds of pettiness, the values of equality and human dignity become vital. The NMU, built in the tradition of radical trade unionism, was organized around these values.

Seamen, who have always been shortchanged by society, have a direct sense of what has happened to them. They understand the importance of the union. Since its founding in 1937, wages, conditions and the public image of the merchant seaman have all improved. From 1936 to 1954 alone, base wages increased fivefold, the basic work load decreased 30 per cent, and living conditions improved from the inhuman to the tolerable. At the same time, the number of married seamen increased from 8 per cent to 64 per cent. Today the NMU likes to picture the modern seaman as a suburban family man.

Few union movements have so altered the bleak conditions of work, but the initial conditions were so miserable that the spectacular success of the union has brought the merchant seamen only up to the level of shore-side trade unionists. "Old-timers" who remember working conditions during the depression have become the exception. The majority of the men on the ships today are concerned primarily with what their union is now achieving, and what it has become. In this context the questions of wages and union structure are most important.

A remarkable letter from the crew of the tanker S.S. Texaco Nevada, addressed to Curran and circulated among the crews of other NMU ships last July, started a flurry of rank-and-file discussion. The letter begins:

We have gotten no report on wages and overtime review from our agents and patrolman, who claim they know nothing about it. We want a wage and overtime increase. Since 1961 there have been two social security increases, dues increase, and constant cost of living rise without increase in take home pay.

Since 1961 NMU seamen have worked under a contract which has a number of soft spots from their point of view and which does not expire until 1969. Seamen have not had an increase of take-home pay in five years. Yearly percentage wage increases specified under the contract have not been paid to them, but have gone directly into a general twenty-year pension fund for which many members cannot qualify. Base wages are extremely low. On nonpassenger ships, for example, one-third of the crew, men with the lowest ratings such as ordinary seaman and messman, are paid $300 per month. After they pay union dues, the base earnings of these men for a forty-hour week are close to the minimum wage.

Figures first made available in detail to the rank and file in Morrissey's paper show that the West Coast maritime unions secured contracts in 1966 that prescribed base pay running in many cases $100 to $200 more per month. In these contracts the overtime which the NMU members must work extra for, and often do not get, is automatically guaranteed and computed within the base pay. Finally, these contracts include higher overtime rates and specify still higher wage levels for 1968, a year before the present NMU contract runs out.

Joseph Curran

In the light of such facts, what particularly embitters NMU seamen is the class difference between them and their union officials, whose salaries and privileges have wonderfully mounted. At a salary of $86,000, on which the NMU pays full taxes, Curran ranks second among union executives to Jimmy Hoffa, and the NMU is twenty times smaller than the Teamsters. Curran also has a personal chauffeur at $13,000 per year, and a personal assistant, William Perry, who runs the national office in Curran's absence (frequent), with a salary and expense account that total more than $30,000. Members are further outraged by the expensive building program the union has undertaken and by the hierarchy of union officials with salaries in the $20,000 range, large expense accounts, new Lincoln Continentals and pension, severance and strike pay plans that dwarf benefits received by working seamen.

Even at this high price, the situation might be acceptable if the rank and file had a sense that their officials were truly their representatives. But the trend of the last fifteen years, with the polarization of power around Curran and in the national office, has resulted, seamen fear, in a hierarchy of officials who owe loyalty only to Curran. A major issue has become the question of patrolmen.

When a ship returns to home port, the union patrolman comes aboard to settle any disputes which may have developed between the crew and the company during the course of the voyage, and to do union business. Until 1963, patrolmen were elected by the membership in each port. Curran charged that this system led to "irresponsible" men winning office, and initiated a successful move to have the patrolmen appointed by the president. One of his primary examples of the need for an appointive system was the case of Joseph Padilla, an elected patrolman who used his position to campaign against the union administration in 1962. Padilla claims he was physically beaten in that campaign while attempting to speak aboard a ship, and his suit against the union is still tied up in the courts. Padilla, who ran for national office in the last election, is also one of those who are now protesting the results.

In the letter from the S.S. Texaco Nevada the crew states: "It is a well-known fact that our Patrolmen have little interest in settling beefs, since he is no longer an elected official. Which may be beside the point but nevertheless is true."

But it is not beside the point. The allegiance of the patrolman is vital, for in his person the union structure meets the rank and file at the job. A patrolman has a great deal to say about whether a man is in good standing with the union, even whether he can remain on the ship. Seamen can remember too many shipmates who lost their jobs for being militant in their criticism of the union. For example, Morrissey himself first became disenchanted with union officials when in 1953, while serving as patrolman, he was given an order to fire a boatswain who had been critical of the union leadership.

Why then did the concerns of the men at sea about the undemocratic structure of their union, the weak contract, the class privileges of the officers, and the need for more democratic structures not penetrate the convention? Curran has built an effective organization which excludes criticism from within. Furthermore, his definition of union policy is itself a defense of the system he has organized. Any successful rank-and-file movement must recognize it as such and answer it.

In his opening address to the convention Curran laid down the basis of his policy. The American merchant marine faces an ominous future. Since World War II it has declined from first to sixth place among the maritime nations of the world. It now carries less than 9 per cent of the country's foreign commerce. One of the main factors in this decline is the device of "runaway flags" whereby American-owned ships are registered abroad to avoid American wages and taxes. This practice has put Liberia ahead of the United States in the size of its merchant marine, with Panama and Honduras close behind.

Union leadership, wishing to reverse this decline, has altered its traditional economic tactics, which once centered around the strike. As Curran states: "We want gains in our contracts, but we have to make sure first that we have jobs to apply these contracts to. We have a vital stake in the preservation and well-running of our industry." On this basis, Curran describes the extension of the contract of 1961 until 1969 as a major achievement in labor-management relations.

Curran's strategy has defined neither the government nor the shipowners as an enemy, but calls simply for tougher government restrictions against "runaway" shipping, and a broader-based subsidy for American ship operators. According to NMU officials the major problem the union faces is the indifference and ignorance of the public and the government.

Thus the Curran administration sees its task primarily in terms of political action. To this end Curran has linked the NMU program with the welfare of the nation through a rigid anti-Communist position. He points to the rise of the Soviet merchant marine, which is already larger than that of the United States, and at its present rate of growth will overtake the British by 1975 as the world's largest. The positive way to fight Communists, Curran says, is to build fleets and compete with the Soviet Union.

The existence of a class system within the union between officials and members is justified as political expediency. Bernard Raskin, public relations chief and editor of the NMU paper, The Pilot, has said that salaries are high because "we feel that our officers should be paid in accord with executives in industry . . . poorly paid union officials don't carry as much social and political prestige."

The last point is crucial to the policy of Curran's administration. Since the union must make gains through political action, the interest of the members can be served only by officials under the Curran banner, who, having the unified backing of the membership, are able to act as free, prestigious and powerful agents within the society. Thus Curran defines union strength as unified support of Curran. Opposition to Curran and his policies is opposition to the welfare of the union, and even to the welfare of the nation.

In an open letter to the delegates entitled, "Target NMU," Curran associated the leaders of the present rank-and-file opposition with past Communist conspiracies against the union. Without naming Morrissey or his paper, Curran spoke of him and his associates as "elements which use anti-labor laws to do as much damage to the union as possible," and concluded: "We do not intend to answer the collection of slanders, distortions and lies which are in the publication these people are distributing."

Morrissey, just dismissed from St. Vincent's hospital, observed the convention from the balcony of the Grand Ballroom, guarded by a plain-clothes man. For a number of delegates, I imagine, Morrissey had been given his answer.

In an unusual move on the first day of the convention, Curran broke the monotony to announce that a reporter from the Daily Worker had been admitted. He did not point out this embarrassing guest, and the effect was profound: no outsider, with or without a press badge, could find a delegate willing to discuss openly anything critical of the union.

Beneath the superficial banquetlike joviality of the convention the atmosphere was strained. Out of 454 delegates, the representative from the rebellious S.S. Texaco Nevada was suddenly discovered to have allegedly forged his past union dues receipts and was denied his seat and publicly condemned. Two delegates—one who rose to suggest that the business of the meeting was being railroaded, the other a Negro who appeared to be suggesting that the NMU improve the run-down neighborhood where it has built its spectacular new $3 million Joseph Curran Annex—were shouted down. The only member of the insurgent group seated on the floor as a delegate was Richard "Dutch" Haake, who had attempted to run against Curran but had been disqualified. Both union officials and delegates saw him as potentially capable of leading a floor fight. Yet as Haake explained to me:

My personal dilemma is whether to make a move in the convention. I'd be willing but it may be suicidal. I have my family to think of. . . . I see only twenty who would dare to go down the line with me, fifty perhaps who would go part way. Besides I have to keep my eye on the election appeal. The only way to fight against this group would be with the secrecy and rights of a national election run with government supervision.

Haake elected to remain silent for the entire four days of the convention.

Curran and the officers looked at times like men under siege when delegates unknown to them got the floor, but their wary glances changed to smiles of mutual congratulation when time and again nothing developed. The core of Curran's support came primarily from delegates who were part of or allied with the administration's organization. Some fifty-five delegates representing thirty-two ports were in fact members of Curran's administration and repeatedly made key motions. In addition there were the men whom Curran had appointed to the various committees to which the delegates submitted their proposals. Some anti-Curran proposals were thus submitted, but not one of them emerged from the committees. Finally, the presence of a large and strategically stationed "master-at-arms" squad exerted a sobering effect.

Curran was justified in being pleased with what he called "the best convention ever in demonstrating the unity of the union." Final proposals for constitutional change will further strengthen the control of the administration by giving the national office additional power to establish penalties against seamen not cooperating aboard ship with union regulations. The convention passed resolutions backing all aspects of Curran's policy. Finally the convention backed Curran's desire to put off opening contract negotiations for at least a year.

The voice of the rank and file on the ships was not heard at the convention, partly because seamen, skeptical of their power, sent delegates who had no intention of testing it. After all, so goes the most common argument, no democracy is perfect, no administration without self-interested officials. Sailors have no illusions about the moral perfectibility of man. But this is exactly the point from which Morrissey's paper can build its force among the rank and file and become a threat to the administration. For Morrissey is seeking to explode the theory that "one party" rule does about as well as can be hoped by making available detailed information on wages and conditions in other seagoing unions, information not available in The Pilot. And by publishing information on the salaries and privileges of union officials he has pointed out the cost of the present system.

In 1960, in one of the original trials of the Landrum-Griffin Act, Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell initiated a suit against the NMU to invalidate the national elections of that year because of evidence of illegal practices. The suit was dropped in October of 1961 after Secretary of Labor Arthur Goldberg made the union promise, in effect, that it would not happen again. It was during this period, in the summer of 1961 when a general maritime strike was in progress, that the NMU broke with the other major union, the Seafarers' International Union, and dropped the demand for the right to organize the crews of "runaway flag" ships. The NMU then signed the contract which has lasted until now and has caused so much criticism from the rank and file.

Many of the opposition see a relationship between the signing of a weak contract and the government's willingness to drop its case against Curran. Moreover, the insurgents fear that the pattern is repeating itself. In 1966

Curran would certainly have been justified in seeking wage increases within the existing contract, yet at the national convention he succeeded in putting off negotiations until next year. Furthermore, he has already indicated his willingness to accept wage increases within the guideposts recommended by President Johnson.

These are conservative positions for a union leader to take when rank-and-file discontent is growing. But Curran has taken them precisely when the government is seeking to nullify the elections and supervise a rerun.

For the leaders of the opposition the convention proved to be an impossible setting in which to challenge Curran. Yet they are still confident that the majority will be with them once the men are given information in detail which makes explicit the cost of the present "one party-one man" system. The opposition must now count on the possibility of government intervention and a rerun of the spring election.

Morrissey's program is no cure-all. A democratic structure for the NMU will not solve the problem of a declining merchant marine industry nor the ultimate problem of automation. But, beyond bettering wages and conditions, unions exist to give the worker a sense of his role in the industry through the democratic process of electing the officials who negotiate for him. A "one party-one man" system can never serve that function.

AWAKENING OLYMPUS

MORDECAI ROSHWALD

Mr. Roshwald, author of Level 7, a novel of a future war, teaches at the University of Minnesota.

Olympus has been undergoing a veritable renaissance. The once mighty gods of the Greeks are resuming their former position. No longer have they to weave dreams out of memories of old glory: new vistas are opening before them. All this may surprise the reader. Aren't gods supposed to be immortal? If so, how can they be reborn? Or, if renaissance is not taken literally, why the awakening all of a sudden?

To answer these questions we must first make the reader acquainted with some basic laws of the pantheon. Indeed, gods are immortal; they have to be by definition. Yet being immortal does not necessarily mean being alive and kicking. In fact, the Olympian family went into a prolonged hibernation with the ascendancy of the Judeo-Christian monotheism. For monotheism—again by definition—cannot coexist with a jolly company of quarrelsome gods. Under the impact of the purposeful, single-minded, aloof God from Jerusalem even the self-confident Zeus, not to mention minor deities, retreated step by step, till in despair they sought and found solace in sleep.

Their sleep has been long—too long. For while of the God of Jerusalem it was said that a thousand years in his sight "are but as yesterday when it is past," the Olympians felt that a hundred years weighed more than a week, and they had been asleep for a good many centuries.

But, while gods can go into hibernation at will, they are not free to awaken. In that respect they resemble the sleeping princess who could be roused only by a princely kiss. In the case of the deities the trick is done by simple humans, by mere mortals: they wake the gods up when they evoke them in prayer, in worship, in animadversion at least. True, from time to time a poet, even in the dark ages of Christian devotion, would refer to Zeus, to Apollo, to Aphrodite, but this rather occasional turning of the mind was not sufficient to wake the gods. All it did was induce pleasant dreams or at most made them turn in their beds.

That was the situation until recent times when all of a sudden the evocation of the Olympians was resorted to by a different type of men—men of action, not poets—and therefore in a manner that startled the gods out of their slumber like an alarm clock ringing at 6 A.M. on a Sunday morning. For this waking up was not done by animadversion, or prayer or worship; it was effected by the most potent of potions—POWER.

Ironically, it came about because of the devoutness of the mortals to their Christian God. The generals and admirals who had to baptize one of their offspring could not bring themselves to name it the "Almighty," though almighty it may have seemed to them. Nor could they possibly call a rocket "Jesus": imagine yourself talking about the deployment of one-megaton Jesuses! Even the name of one of the angels, or, for that matter, a saint, seemed inappropriate: somehow one did not think of a missile as a saintly creature. The fallen angel—perhaps: he seemed powerful enough and sufficiently far from saintliness. But there was the rub: it was not fitting for the United States Air Force or Navy to be associated with the Evil One. You could no more call a particularly effective missile Lucifer or Mephistopheles than, for different reasons, you could christen it Michael or St. Peter.

The military were at a loss until one of them, who in his college days had been a member of Mu Alpha Delta, had a brilliant idea: if Greek letters were good for a fraternity to whose members Greek was Greek, why not borrow the names of the Greek gods for the rockets? Divine names were appropriate for the new titans and yet these would offend nobody's religious feelings, for the Greek gods were long dead. Or so he thought.

In fact, the moment the first rocket was baptized "Atlas," or whatever the name was, the Titan jumped up rocketlike from his slumber. Then there was no need for the humans to wake up the others. For another theological rule governing the Greek pantheon is that one awakened god starts a chain reaction which wakes up all the rest in no time. For this purpose, the Titans and the Olympians are connected by a "hot line."

And so the Greek gods are awake again and, after their old custom, annoying one another with petty jealousies and intrigues. That Atlas should have the distinction of commanding an ICBM could not be forgiven by more prestigious deities. And so, in search of new status symbols, they started once more to interfere in human affairs.

Versed in intrigues as they are, it was a minor enterprise for the Greek gods to make the mortals dance to the Olympic tune. A whisper in an American general's ear and another rocket came into being to glorify another deity. A whisper to a Russian general, and a Communist counter-rocket moves the spiral of competition one spin higher. Rockets and counter-rockets; missiles from the ground, missiles from the sea, missiles from the air. . . . There are many gods in search of status and there is no end to divine ingenuity in fomenting competition among human beings—ad majorem deorum gloriam.

The competition in Olympus is no less fierce, though. For it is now no longer enough to be honored with a rocket, any rocket. Now the game is to be one up, to have a rocket which will make a former rocket obsolete.

Thus Polaris will soon be replaced by Poseidon: twice the pay load and accuracy and eight times the killing power of the once mighty North Star. But Poseidon's brother, the mighty Zeus, has already set his intrigues in motion in the Kremlin to get the Russians to produce a Socialist answer to Poseidon. Once the Reds are set on the right track, the Americans will build the anti-missile missile, Nike-Zeus. (That Zeus is ready to share this distinction with the rather minor goddess Nike has a threefold explanation: inveterate liking for female company, tribute to our own, progressive, democratic era, and, for the sake of political impartiality, show of respect for the hyphenated Marxism-Leninism.)

Zeus is already rubbing his powerful hands with glee at the prospect of outdoing Poseidon and his Russian counterpart. But behind Zeus's back lurks Atropos, the unavoidable fate. A hardly noticeable smile is playing round her narrow, tight lips. She knows that the trump card is in her hand.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Playing the Game — for Fun and Profit

KOUFAX. By Sandy Koufax (with Ed Linn). The Viking Press. 293 pp. $4.95.

PAPER LION. By George Plimpton. Harper & Row. 362 pp. $5.95.

THE GLORY OF THEIR TIMES. By Lawrence S. Ritter. The Macmillan Co. 291 pp. $7.95.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

The Collected Poems of Rolfe Humphries was published in 1965 by Indiana University Press.

"A professional, whether paid or unpaid, is the man that counts. An amateur is a clumsy bastard." So wrote the late Stanley Woodward in the autobiography he called Paper Tiger and, one way or another, this theme is developed and varied in the three books under consideration here. Koufax recounts the progress of its protagonist from amateur to professional; its concluding chapter presents in full and poignant detail the struggle for the professional to escape from the unpaid into the paid-what-he-deserves category.

One thing about the "as told to" or "with" kind of book is that we can never feel sure whose voice we are hearing. How much of this one is Koufax, how much is Linn? To whom do we attribute the occasional flashes of insight, the moments of nice and witty prose, the expert non-clumsiness? The early parts of the book are more than a little on the dull side, the figures seem pasteboard rather than real, the tone conventional, duly pious, just not engaging. Nobody comes very much alive—not Sandy himself, or his family, or the sand-lotters, supernumeraries, scouts; we have read this sort of thing before.

With Act II (if we translate into dramatic terms) our involvement becomes more natural, requires less conscious effort. "Six bad years," the author reminds us, "and six good ones. Six years of drought and six years of plenty." We had almost forgotten, and it is salutary for us to be reminded, for how long Koufax was, in the Woodwardian sense, just another clumsy bastard, with seasons of 2-2, 2-4, 5-4, 11-11, 8-6, 8-13, years when he was called on to start few games, and finished fewer, years when he was shelled out of there in seven, eight, nine, consecutive efforts. The story of these years proceeds with a minimum of excuse making, alibi offering, self-pity—of course, Walter Alston did not understand him absolutely—and an increasing command of the tone and attitudes, if not the full accomplishment, of the professional.

With the years of success, the scope narrows, the intensity increases, the concentration focuses, and we come to identify with the complete absorption of the skilled performer in the detail of his craft. He recalls how, and, more important, why, he pitched as he did to not quite every batter in not quite every inning of not quite every game, but certainly enough so that we get the idea, the feel of it all. Some of this, I have little doubt, is actually remembered, for a great memory is one of the requisites, not only an attribute, of the real professional. More of it is recalled through the keeping of records, the charts of every performance. I do not mean the kind of silly nonsense the radio and TV announcers proclaim—how this is the first time a batter whose name begins with L hit the third pitch in the second inning for a bloop double to right field on the first Thursday in October in the north temperate zone. No; but the relevant record—where the pitches were, high, low, tight, wide, curve, fast ball, swing, take, fouled off, hit to whom, past whom, grounder, line drive, pop-up, shot. Through all this narration we sense not only the skill of the performers—their devotion to the game, the dramatics, comedy, pathos—but also what these men are like; John Roseboro, for example, Gil Hodges, Willy Mays. Above all, we get the sense of delight, of rejoicing; this is what these men really like to do, and of course they like doing it supremely well.

Once the reader gets over being irked at George Plimpton's gall in horning in where he does not really belong, his book gives pleasure for the same reasons as the Koufax-Linn job. Plimpton is the editor of the Paris Review and in an earlier book, Out of My League, he took on baseball. This time the players are football pros, members of the Detroit Lions in the year 1963; the author aspires to be their last-string quarterback, to play, however briefly, in a real game; he does get as far as one series of downs in a pre-season intersquad exhibition scrimmage, and he is terrible. But nobody cares about him, really; the least interesting parts of the book are those where he describes his humiliations or traumas, or is making himself out a sort of lovable type whom the players more or less deemed a great guy, and even adopted and protected after their fashion. But the sight and sound of the real pros is of major interest—the highly technical lingo of their business, its bruises, its heartaches, its laughs, its tribulations. And Plimpton does a very good job in his treatment of individuals: Night Train Lane, John Gordy, Gail Cogdill, the 300-pound rookie Lucien Reeberg. There's a very moving bit about Earl Morrall, long after practice was over, staying out and throwing the ball around with a bunch of kids, one of them a rascally little thief. "They'd stay until the moon came up—and they'd play by its light," Morrall is quoted, "and I'm not so far from wanting to stay down myself. There are not so many better ways of fooling around." For this, and for much more in the same vein, we can forgive him the impudence, the abundant pictures of his good-looking self, the ignorance of what the word bemuse means; and can even look forward (I'd not put it past him) to the next item in the series, where he wants to give us the feel of riding in the Kentucky Derby, what goes on in the jocks' room and along Shed Row, and so gets his 195 pounds on the back of some $1,500 plater, with a 3-furlong handicap, at Churchill Downs on the first Saturday in May.

"They told their stories," writes Lawrence Ritter in his introduction to The Glory of Their Times, "with pride and with dignity, and also with joy." They, this time, are twenty-two professional baseball players, most of whom played in the major leagues during the first two decades of this century. Tommy Leach, who played third and the outfield for the Pittsburgh Pirates from 1898 to 1918, is the oldest; the youngest is Paul Waner, outfielder for the same club, from 1926-45. The stories were told on tape recorder, and subsequently edited by Mr. Ritter, who does not tell us on what principle he selected the men he did, how he found them, where they live now. (I suppose too many of us might make nuisances of ourselves if we knew.) A splendid book, copiously illustrated (the Koufax book might have been improved by more illustration, and the Plimpton book improved by more Lions and less Plimpton in the pictures) and provided, beginning and end, with box scores, headlines, and even ads—Macy's in 1902, was attracting customers in July, before the move to their new quarters in the fall, with offerings of men's bathing suits, two piece, heavy cotton, plain navy, strongly sewed, priced at 59c; and ten years later you could get the Ohio Forty Motor-Car somewhere on 50th Street for $2,150.

But do not think this book is quaint, or its appeal solely to the nostalgic. For myself, whose father was with the Giants in '83, who remembers Bob Emslie visiting our home in Yeadon, Pa., who saw my first big-league games in Philadelphia in 1902 or 1903, a box score with the names of Hartsel, Seybold, Davis, Murphy, Powers, Waddell and Plank is pretty evocative and moving. Lave Cross, 3b, and Monte Cross, ss., were before that 17-inning game with Detroit whose box is photostated in the front matter; Ritter may well expect fan mail from other men the country over whose memories go back as far as mine, or farther.

He brings old heroes back to us, so we see them as they were. Not only that, but as they are now; and, in addition, we see more of what they used to be than we ever realized. "They recreated their lives," Ritter writes, "with warmth, insight, and compassion." With magnanimity and generosity, also; and with literacy. Where Plimpton had us see the Detroit Lions as individuals, through his closeness to them, through what he observed and recorded, our editor here has let the characters present themselves; there is a common idiom, to be sure (there would have to be, considering the vernacular of the craft), and there is a common tendency to use like as a conjunction and ever as an intensifying adverb. But Marquard does not come out sounding like Snodgrass, or Smoky Joe Wood like Rube Bressler. Some of them are dead serious, some clown it up a little. None of them sounds like a dese-and-dose thug; and Sam Crawford, from Wahoo, Neb., contributes at least one sound item of perceptive literary insight, his admiration for Balzac as a great writer.

"Of course, it's ridiculous to think that only college men are gentlemen," says Harry Hooper, the old Red Sox outfielder, "or are intelligent." But he does go on to remind us that the college-educated man was by no means a rarity in baseball during the first two decades of this century. Of the dozen or so whom he cites, two speak out here, Davy Jones from Dixon College, and Chief Meyers who matriculated under the single name of Tortes, at the age of 22, at Dartmouth.

"And this," he says, "is quoted from Chaucer: once a Dartmouth, always a Dartmouth." Here on the Hanover plain, in the days of the vogue of the anti-hero, trying to instruct his future fellow Dartmouths in epic ways, in the terrifying dilemma confronting Achilles when he must choose between a short and glorious life and a long inglorious one, I am struck by the notion that the Chief and his peers were blessed in having it both ways—the bright renown of their careers in sport, and the relative obscurity that followed. Into that obscurity they had satisfactions to carry, and, one hopes, some preparation for tranquillity and ease. "Life has been good to me since I left baseball . . . things have gone well, very well, through these many years. In contrast, my years in baseball had their ups and downs, their strife and their torment.

But the years I look back at most fondly, and those I'd most like to live over, are the years when I was playing center field for the New York Giants." That was Fred Snodgrass; remember him? Or hear Bob O'Farrell, catcher for the Cubs, who came into the league the year before Snodgrass left, and departed in 1935: "Of course, when you play every day it gets to be sort of like work. But somehow, way down deep, it's still play. . . . It is. It's play."

"Games are childish," our wives remind us, "when are you boys ever going to grow up?" Sure, sure; we know. But why not? To whom else, in our degenerate times, is vouchsafed so happy a combination?—collaboration, rivalry, supreme skill in the craft, joy and pride in the skill, innocence. Not in the solemn professions; not even in the arts; not in trade. Let's turn to Goose Goslin for the benediction: "It was just a game, that's all it was. They didn't have to pay me. I'd have paid them to let me play. Listen, the truth is it was more than fun. It was heaven."

The Johnson System

LYNDON B. JOHNSON: The Exercise of Power. By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak. The New American Library. 597 pp. $7.95.

LYNDON B. JOHNSON AND THE WORLD. By Philip Geyelin. Frederick A. Praeger. 309 pp. $5.95.

THE JOHNSON ECLIPSE: A President's Vice Presidency. By Leonard Baker. The Macmillan Co. 280 pp. $5.95.

MARVIN E. GETTLEMAN

Mr. Gettleman is assistant professor of history at the Polytechnic Institute of Brooklyn. He has edited Vietnam: History, Documents and Opinions (Fawcett), and is co-author (with David Mermelstein) of the forthcoming Lyndon Johnson's Great Society (Random House).

Writing just before the Presidential election of 1964, Washington journalist I. F. Stone dismissed a whole crop of pseudo-biographies of Lyndon Johnson as little more than sycophantic caricatures. He called for a contemporary Theodore Dreiser to narrate the saga of this legislative wizard and Presidential titan from Texas. Though a new Dreiser has not yet appeared, necessary material is being assembled for him by an enterprising group of Washington journalists.

Leonard Baker, Washington correspondent for Newsday, a Long Island

daily, has provided a fascinating insider's account of the frustrating thousand days of Lyndon Johnson's Vice Presidency during which the Texan attempted to retain in his new office a measure of the immense power he had wielded as Senate Majority Leader. Although the Vice President enjoys some constitutional authority over the Senate, Johnson's former colleagues resented and soundly rejected his bid early in 1961 to continue participation in the deliberations of the Senate Democratic caucus, a sobering moment for the man who had been such a ruthless manipulator. This humiliation at the hands of his former Senate intimates prepared Johnson for the Vice Presidential role of underling that he was obliged to play—eclipsed by the intellectual style and ambition of the Kennedys.

Baker's decision to begin his study of Johnson's political career with the formal accession to office on January 20, 1961, seriously weakens his account of the thousand days. For Johnson, by that time, already had made his greatest contribution to John F. Kennedy's Presidency as his Vice Presidential candidate; his campaigning in 1960 had been instrumental in putting Kennedy into the White House. Once in office, Johnson made little use of his talents to push New Frontier legislation through Congress.

However, what may be overlooked by Baker's book is admirably made up for in the more ambitious exposé of Johnson's wheelings and dealings by Rowland Evans and Robert Novak, nationally syndicated columnists specializing in attacks on the New Left. Evans and Novak have produced a massive work, more lavish with inside dope and rich in Washington lore than anything hitherto published. The theoretical aspects of their analysis are rudimentary and unsophisticated. The notion that a "single theme, the theme of power" runs through the political career of Lyndon Johnson is a superficial truism that will raise few eyebrows. However, the account of how that power was used is the real contribution of the Evans and Novak book.

Close analyses of such episodes as the Senate's censure of Joseph McCarthy, and the Civil Rights Act of 1957 reveal what the authors call "the Johnson System." The System was a subtle amalgam of stratagems, including aborted quorum calls, night sessions, and a planned stop-and-go legislative pace. The System, Johnson found to his regret, was inapplicable outside the Senate, and even in that august body nobody but he could use it.

The System was held together by the periodic activation of a "network" of reliable Senators loyal to Lyndon. It will be a surprise to liberals, who have been wondering how Hubert Humphrey can do what he is doing these days, to find out that early in his Senatorial career Hubert Humphrey became Johnson's pliant satellite. Humphrey was recruited as early as 1952 into a body diverse enough to include Republican Sen. Margaret Chase Smith of Maine, and the Virginia Bourbon, Harry Flood Byrd, who were almost invariably willing to vote as Johnson instructed, and to reap the substantial rewards that he dispensed in the form of patronage, committee assignments and other emoluments.

In writing their book, the authors must have had to give up any hope of being admitted into the inner sanctum of Johnsonian journalistic favorites, of which William S. White is the acknowledged dean. They reveal too much that is damaging. Despite an announced determination to write of the public man, they cannot avoid spilling whole vats of beans which reveal the obsessive vulgarity and immense egoism of the private Lyndon Johnson. Every reader will find his favorite story: mine concerns Johnson's 1954 miscalculation of support for a tax amendment which was apparently beaten by one vote. "The Minority Leader shouted across the Senate floor to the conservative Delaware Democrat, J. Allen Frear: 'Change your vote!' Surprised, almost stunned by the command, Frear hesitated. Johnson shouted again, 'Change your vote!' Frear did, and the amendment carried."

It is by such tactics that Johnson earned the reputation of legislative wizard. But his career was not marked, like that of his predecessor in the White House, by a steady ascent from one triumph to the next. Evans and Novak explore the many detours and frustrations weathered by Johnson. They find the President constantly haunted by his unstable political base in Texas, but able gradually to shed identification with oil interests, with Texas shenanigans, and eventually with the South as a whole, to emerge as a truly national political leader by the early 1960s.

The story of Lyndon Johnson's exploits in foreign policy are related in the closing chapters of the Evans and Novak book. Despite the venom with which they expose his maneuverings in domestic matters, they are sympathetic to what they describe as merely all-too-human blunders abroad. Equally hostile to the style of Johnsonian diplomacy but in favor of its ends is the shrewd account of Lyndon B. Johnson and the World by Wall Street Journal columnist Philip Geyelin. Early in his book Geyelin quotes Johnson as saying that the trouble with foreigners "is that they're not like folks you were reared with." Both books contain half-mocking descriptions of Johnson's attempts to handle international affairs as if he were dealing with dissident political factions in Texas. (Incidentally, both books err fundamentally in their adoption of the widespread myth of Johnson's "Populist" roots. No use seems to have been made of Lyndon Baines Johnson: The Formative Years, published by the Southwest Texas State College Press and written by three Texas State professors, which would have helped in getting the Texas origins of Lyndon Johnson into better perspective.)

As journalistic efforts these books are high-level, serious productions, not to be confused with the spate of superficial biographies and slender accounts of LBJ's "inner circle," or the "Johnson treatment," current a year or so ago. Yet the Evans/Novak and Geyelin volumes may fairly be charged with adopting a level of analysis, especially in regard to foreign policy, that does not advance our understanding beyond that achieved by political practitioners like Johnson himself.

It would be an exaggeration to say that Johnson's policies in Asia and Latin America are actually defended. The barely disguised contempt that these working journalists entertain for the President (Leonard Baker excepted) spills over into hostile conclusions about the ineptitude of his conduct of foreign affairs. Geyelin, for example, laments the Texan's tendency to look upon the Dominican Revolution of April, 1965, as some sort of re-enactment of the 1836 assault on the Alamo. Evans and Novak similarly deplore the way in which Johnson explained his Dominican actions. But the authors seem to support the substance of these actions.

In the case of Vietnam too, Johnson is sympathetically portrayed as responding to an agonizingly difficult situation not of his own making. Geyelin shows how the struggle in the Indo-Chinese jungles was a conflict that no one wanted, but by a series of decisions which seemed unavoidable at the moment, the war became the President's own albatross. Evans and Novak are even more prone to defend Johnson's Vietnamese policy in terms of pragmatic necessity.

Harsh judgments on the methods Johnson uses, but not on the substance of what he does, are the results of a particular mode of inquiry. These books

Launching the monumental DELACORTE WORLD HISTORY SERIES...

a brilliant and unique interpretation of the entire history of modern colonialism — from its origins to its final days in the postwar world

The Colonial Empires

By D. K. FIELDHOUSE,
Fellow of Nuffield College, Oxford.
Illustrated. $8.00, now at your bookstore. This is the first volume in the thirty-five volume
DELACORTE WORLD HISTORY series.

DELACORTE PRESS

contain analyses restricted mainly to the elucidating of how power is exercised. By this approach, the authors hope to give an air of objectivity to their work. But by confining themselves to the workings of the political machinery and the tactics of its operators, the authors are implicitly adopting the standards of Washington decision makers as their own value criteria. Nowhere in the three books under review do they escape from the confines of their method to ask: in whose interest is power exercised? And this is after all the key question.

Sometimes the authors, especially Evans and Novak, have to go to great lengths to avoid dealing with the crucial issue of interest. Although they are perceptive in viewing Johnson's Texas political base in terms of the oil interests dominant in that state, they refuse to draw any conclusions from the evidence of concern for Johnson's national political career on the part of national business interests. Particularly superficial is their treatment of the unprecedented support given a Democratic-reformer candidate by directors of America's great corporations. Evans and Novak view the matter as the visceral "front-lash" of a business community duped into believing that Barry Goldwater was a dangerous threat. No deeper interpretation is attempted because of the dogged determination of these journalists not to stray from what C. Wright Mills has aptly called "middle-level analysis."

A deeper, historical perspective would reveal Lyndon Johnson (Texas idiosyncracies aside) as the mid-20th-century representative of a business-oriented ideology committed to the use of government power for domestic reform, as well as counterrevolution abroad. With this in mind it becomes more difficult to entertain the popular illusion that once the uncouth Texan is replaced in the White House by some more stylish gentleman, our problems will be on the way to solution.

buries his argument in page after page of facts and figures, some interesting and well told, some confusing and not quite relevant, and occasionally peppered with errors which, though secondary, tend to undermine the credibility of the more serious things he has to say. After reading and rereading the book, it is still not clear to me what evidence Brynes offers in support of his thesis, except for the truism that competitively extended foreign aid is a form of big-power conflict, and as such fraught with danger. What worries Brynes is that the recipients of aid (or some of them) develop a taste for what a former foreign minister of Ghana once called "polygamous" expectations from all donors, and that even certain forms of developmental aid (not to mention direct military assistance programs) encourage young nations to try small-power violence which threatens the whole world because "small wars have always led to large." So stated, it simply is not true, certainly not "always" (a most unhistorical word). Small wars are indeed bad, but their implication becomes universally threatening only if they tend to suck in big powers with quasi-ultimate means of destruction. In spite of the brittleness of relations between the two superpowers at present realistically capable of destroying us all, the evidence indicates that they are determined to avoid such catastrophic involvements.

The remedy suggested by Brynes is to remove the sting of imperialism by an internationalization of development aid programs, by putting them under United Nations auspices, or using the channel of the World Bank (whose objectivity as against the built-in bias of national American agencies the author seems to overestimate if only by ignoring the World Bank's sources of capital formation and its methods of determining soundness of requests!). Brynes also suggests that small nations in the process of developing be offered what he calls a "peace bonus," under an all-or-nothing rule: "should the peace be broken by any of the developing nations none of them is to get anything . . . until the aggression stops." The United States is in a position to make such an offer attractive, according to Brynes, by announcing the earmarking, say, of a fifth of its defense budget for the bonus, a move that powerfully would call attention to our primary concern for peace everywhere and, but for an occasional compulsive aggressor, keep the smaller nations "cool" through fear of forfeiting any claim to the bonus.

Since the author himself admits that it would be premature to discuss the

The Dangers of Aid Overkill

WE GIVE TO CONQUER: A New Look at the United States Foreign Aid Program. By Asher Brynes. W. W. Norton & Co. 219 pp. $4.50.

SAMUEL L. SHARP

Mr. Sharp is professor of international relations at The American University in Washington, D. C. He is currently in Germany on sabbatical leave.

No, Virginia, Uncle Sam is not Santa Claus. This is not a direct quote from the book under review, but the message is there and it may not be a bad idea to puncture once more the notion that foreign aid programs are an exercise in competitive charity. According to Asher Brynes, all unilaterally extended aid, whether by the United States, the Soviet Union or mainland China ("a shabby superpower" itself in need of development aid), is essentially imperialistic, even if "actively profitless." It is imperialistic, he states, because its aim is "to create, maintain, and defend spheres of influence."

Thus the old game of international statecraft is continuing in new forms, disguised as philanthropy. But even this is not really new, as we find out from the author's own review of the historical antecedents of foreign aid programs. The Romans already were in the habit of "relieving the poverty of the barbarians," ostensibly, as Gibbon says, out of generosity or gratitude, but actually to buy clients and allies. What is new, in the opinion of Mr. Brynes, is the systematic and universal scope of American aid programs. Their very globality has "provoked" the Soviet Union and Communist China into similar gestures, although neither is really equipped to sustain such efforts. Hence the Communist powers engage in flashy though limited programs, mostly by jumping in to capitalize on occasional failures of American endeavors, or the frustrations of recipients suddenly cut off from expected subsidies or faced with American insistence on internal reforms.

Because of its wealth, and its traditional belief in the feasibility of progress through deliberate improvement measures, the United States has been engaged in what the author calls "aid overkill," a pursuit potentially as dangerous as the stockpiling of thermonuclear weapons. Brynes is only mildly bothered by the lapses, errors, confusion, extravagance and occasional graft that are part of the execution of aid programs. His central thesis is that by offering aid to a number of poor countries on an almost universal basis, the United States may be backing into a third World War.

If correct, this is certainly an important point to a world capable of destroying itself. However, in spite of his repeated insistence that peace, rather than universal economic betterment, is our main problem, the author somehow feasibility of such a proposal, his book must be taken for what it represents in essence: a rediscovery of the basic fact of international life under a system of competitively operating nation-states, namely, the intrusion of nonrational considerations and the resulting unwillingness to concentrate on peace as "absolutely good." Like so many nice people, Brynes is impatient with the mere recognition of the impracticability of all-out war, a point of view he finds "plainly . . . insufficient now." Perhaps, but feasible. And fewer people will die from "aid overkill" than from that other variety.

A great deal of knowledge and sincere passion have been invested in We Give To Conquer, but it has tried to cover too much and to tie together several themes, such as the questionable wisdom of foreign aid programs ■ presently administered, and the primacy of peace as a global concern. The connection has not been satisfactorily established.

The author also would be well advised to check some of his facts more carefully. Pilsudski was not "prime minister of Poland" when pressured by Hoover to appoint Paderewski. He was chief of state. Czechoslovakia does not include territory that "belonged to old Germany," unless the author means territory grabbed by Hitler and restored to the Czechs after World War II. Nor has the Soviet Union added to its territory parts of "Balkan states" other than Rumania during the war or, for that matter, at any time. To use Brynes's own thesis, small errors lead to big ones, though not "always."

Searching for Kicks

THE ORIGIN OF THE BRUNISTS.
By Robert Coover. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 441 pp. $6.95.

MARTIN TUCKER

Mr. Tucker is a member of the English Department at Long Island University and is the co-editor of a three-volume reference work, A Library of Literary Criticism: Modern British Literature (Frederick Ungar).

When Timothy Leary climbs on the stage of the Village Theatre on Second Avenue in New York, I feel like a romantic Irishman who's with O'Leary in the grave. Tim Leary himself prophesies his downfall, though he is a bit immoderate in urging his parishioners to buy other people's books on psychedelics. When I heard him several weeks ago, he made sure to mention the title of his book in the same breath he warned his audience that the movement would go beyond him.

The movement has grown so fast, as a matter of fact, Leary said with his boyish charm, that "now we're accused of making too much money—which, incidentally, is not true." Leary revealed he had just come back from a visit to Michigan State University, where he had been invited to speak before several fraternities; he had gone from one Greek letter to another instead of from pad to pad. When the rich and the establishment invite you in, Leary was telling his audience, it is an end, and a beginning had better be on the way.

I've started off with Leary and his romantic messianism, because if his is the new religion, its origins are not that different from the origins of another—and much more conventional—religious movement, the ferment of hopes and illusion described in Robert Coover's first novel. Coover's subject is a matter more familiar to the average reader, the evangelical fervor engendered in a coal-mining community after a catastrophic mine disaster. While the geography of Coover's novel is removed from Leary's Eastern-based religion, the human territory of both are much the same. Both Coover's and Leary's characters take trips—one to a blissful pot, the other to a mythical Mount of Redemption. Both get high on religion, even if one of the religions is based on getting high first. And both are searching for kicks, though one dignifies it with a bath of Christian euphemisms.

All religions are founded by well-meaning people who have a passion to communicate; any effective religion goes beyond its originators to its disciples. The religion Leary has helped to spawn may well move out of his hands into a less tolerant grasp. The Brunists of Coover's novel fell into the clutches of hysteria, exploitation and euphoria before it had its second coming. Even though worlds of socio-economics—and fact—separate the psychedelic and the Brunist experience they have a lot in common.

Coover's literary brilliance is displayed in his first chapter, the description of the march to the sacred place where the Brunists go to meet their final judgment. Through an association of dates and a message left by the Rev. Ely Collins, who died in the mine disaster, the group has come to believe that the world will end on the 18th or 19th of April. On their way to the Mount, the Brunists find they must march through a carnival tent jerry-built to light them up as they pass through; when they reach the top of the hill, photographers and newspaper men swarm over them. In their exaltation over the sister of their prophet, a girl who has just been killed by an automobile—their "Madonna" whose crushed body they have carried to the top of the hill—they sing and dance. They run naked around the dead girl, kissing her dead mouth, "clearly expecting her to rise up off her litter." They grovel in the mud, and whip themselves and one another with tree branches. And finally their energy concentrates on a sacrifice—a newspaper man who has mocked them and deceived their "Madonna." They kick and whip him, stomp and crush him.

And then they disperse. The Last Day is followed by every other day.

Coover's first chapter is followed by the past—by an investigation into the causes of the rise of the Brunists. The "origins" began on an average night when hundreds of men descended into the coal pits outside West Condon. One of them was a recruit, an 18 year old, on his first day on the job. His new and pressed dungarees, his clean appearance, annoy one of the men who organize a party to initiate the "dude." The "dude" is rescued by a has-been, a man who once had chances to blow the coal dust away by going into the big world of basketball; in the "dude"

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

1-30-67

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

he perhaps sees his own lost hopes. But while the under-30 has been able to rise to a crisis, he is not able to face gratitude. When the "dude" thanks him, the older man shrugs it off and lights a cigarette. The roof falls in, and ninety-seven men die. Only one man, Giovanni Bruno, survives.

Bruno had wandered away from the others because in his panic he feared others might block his way to escape. His fear saved him. When he is found and carried aloft, he is considered a message from God, a savior.

The first of Bruno's supporters is a quack, who through her occult readings is convinced that though her Guide inconsiderately forgot to foretell her of the disaster, He does speak to her of Bruno. Another is the widow of the Reverend Collins who died in the blast. The legion grows—all who are looking for a message, a communication. The movement envelops the local prostitute, the meek man full of subterranean rage, and teen-agers looking for an unconventional release of expression. And last but not least it tempts its mockers. The hero of the novel is Tyger Wilson, an ex-basketball ace who runs the town newspaper and regards every enthusiasm with a distrustful leer. Wilson seizes his opportunity, inveigles himself into the group, and writes reams of lurid copy on the Brunists for the wire services.

The Old New Wave

LA MAISON DE RENDEZ-VOUS. By Alain Robbe-Grillet. Translated by Richard Howard. Grove Press. 154 pp. $4.50.

SOL YURICK

Mr. Yurick is the author of the novels, The Warriors (Holt, Rinehart & Winston) and Fertig (Trident).

Robbe-Grillet is a brilliant writer who is tiresome; he has written four novels that are stylistically indistinguishable; only the subject changes. His newest novel is again a textbook of ambiguity, a budget of slight coincidences which turn out to be literary exercises on how to shift perspective. As in all detective stories we are supposed to enjoy not so much the solution, which Robbe-Grillet makes sure will be banal, but the act of detection. This five-book indulgence amounts to tedious didacticism, the manual writer demonstrating how to do one small thing superbly.

The setting this time is Hong Kong, but it might be the glamorous Hong

But in gaining his story, Wilson undergoes a kind of conversion. His laughter is interrupted by doubt; in the prophet's beautiful sister he finds an innocent who has no area of corruptibility. Wilson destroys the sister by his cynicism and saves himself for a larger, more tolerant view of humanity.

The strength of Coover's novel lies in his wide range of human characters, his perceptiveness of their paradoxical nature, and his scope in painting a small town. He can capture a group scene beautifully; he can detail a revivalist meeting with accuracy and without gimmicks. What he fails to do is establish a central character who can carry the weight of the novel's tremendous detail. Tyger Wilson's cynicism and his downfall and his salvation are all worked out in fairly sentimental terms. His love affair with Marcella is believable but unconvincing. And his final decision to stay in the town he has mocked and denigrated—to make peace with his "origins"—is right in conception but wanting in execution.

In his insights into the passion for communication, the need for wonder, the love of surrender—whether in the Hindu sun, the tent camp of a coal-mining town, or the psychedelic pad—Coover has created a novel worth reading and displayed a talent worth watching.

Kong of the jaded mind. There are prostitutes, Communist agents, entrepreneurs in dreams and flesh, drug traffic, voyeuristic theatre (which is life which is theatre in which the author is the audience who are the actors who in life . . . etc.); perversion (or then again it might be anti-perversion); murders, interchanges of people and events. All this takes place in a brothel called the Blue Villa or "Le Grande Monde": how heavy-handed. The Maison de Rendez-vous is merely located between the boards of the book.

All literature attempts to pique interest by the device of the mystery. The entertainment mystery conceals the human agent. The philosophical mystery hides a revelation. Conrad, dissecting an onion, sought to find mystery in a code of behavior which was already outmoded. Faulkner learned from Conrad and badly digested Joyce. Beckett, trapped in the ennui of ambiguity, almost disappeared in wordplay. Now Robbe-Grillet. It has been said by mystics that the universe is a sphere whose center is everywhere. For Robbe-Grillet the universe is a sphere whose surface is everywhere; there is no center, and therefore he can only mystify. Or possibly Robbe-Grillet's novels are really only notebooks: the author getting ready to write, trying out the variations. The writer in Camus' The Plague, who couldn't get past the first sentence, has triumphed after all; his indecision has been made into a new wave of art.

Is it a new wave? Are we given a new theory of reality? The scientists have already shown us that all experiments must take the observer into the account of results. In this sense Robbe-Grillet succeeds only in being fashionable. We all know that motivational certainties are subject to a variety of amusing or horrifying interpretations. We quiver to the excitement of the possible. Here Robbe-Grillet trails those old conservatives, the therapists. But can we deny that something has happened in fact and this is the most important thing of all? The brutal world of engineer-reality mocks gameplay. The policeman's night stick—no matter from how many angles it is viewed, or even if we doubt its very descent—is not even slowed, and Zeno's paradoxes are knocked out of the bemused and impotent head. Possibly, therefore, Marx, denying idealism, understood fiction best of all. Is the new wave that far behind?

With his fine mind, this meticulous craftsman must be writing about something profound! Possibly Robbe-Grillet has set out to inform us that the acts which give body to the great mythic processes are unimportant? He has not succeeded. The possibility of insight and cathartic growth is denied by the use of elegance, ritual, mask and attitude alone. How carefully he works to flatten the effects of sensuality, passion, dirt, violence, so that we may be intrigued by a stylization reminiscent of medieval symbolic painting in which the lineaments of agony are more important than the agony itself, in which sense-data become pale reflections, more important to observe than to experience. Possibly Robbe-Grillet is trying to tell us how trivial human experience is. Such a commentary might be tragic if he were concerned with pain instead of shading shape-shifting abstractions with residues of emotion. Jorge Luis Borges, who is also intrigued by variations, transcends this decadence by his concern for the human within the gameplay: the comparison demonstrates how shallow is Robbe-Grillet's dogmatism.

Richard Howard has translated this puff with elegance and musicality.

WOMEN OF CONSCIENCE CONFRONT THE PENTAGON AND CONGRESS

a nation-wide call to Save the Children

Despite eye witness reports in the New York Times, Ladies Home Journal, Redbook and Ramparts revealing the shocking facts, and unbearable pictures of America's cruel war against innocent civilians and children . . .

Despite Catholic, Protestant and Jewish groups joining the growing list of organizations crying out for a halt . . .

The Pentagon continues, unchecked, in the daily burning and bombing of the villages of Vietnam.

The U. S Congress remains silent—refusing to accept its responsibility for the destruction committed in our name.

WILL YOU BE SILENT TOO?

If you believe all children are born with the right to live and grow . . .

If you believe all children must be protected from acts of cruelty and abuse . . .

YOU MUST SPEAK OUT!

TAKE A DAY FROM YOUR OWN CHILDREN . . . TAKE A DAY FROM YOUR JOB join with thousands of women from all over the country
WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 8 WASHINGTON, D. C.

To the Generals in the Pentagon and the Representatives in Congress We Women Will Say:

STOP
STOP
STOP
STOP
STOP

- the bombing of Vietnam . . . immediately and unconditionally
- allowing the Generals to make foreign policy
- using our taxes for burning children and bombing villages
- drafting our sons to kill and be killed
- consenting to immoral and illegal acts of war

If you are not coming on the N.Y. train, meet us in front of the Pentagon at 12:30. Bring letters from your community to show your congressman the growing demand for a halt to the bombing.

For details about the day's program in Washington, write to:

799 Broadway, New York, N. Y. 10003
222 State St., San Francisco, Calif. 94114
Box 19737, Los Angeles, Calif. 90019
20 S. 12 St., Philadelphia, Penna. 19107
2016 P. St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20036
5436 Hyde Park, Chicago, Ill. 60615

. . . or write to us for the nearest address.

WOMEN STRIKE FOR PEACE
799 Broadway, New York City 10003

I want to go to Washington, D.C. from N.Y.C. on Feb. 8 when WOMEN CONFRONT THE PENTAGON AND CONGRESS. I want round trip train tickets @ $10 per ticket. $..... enclosed. Special train leaves Penn. Station 7:45 a.m. Returns before 10:00 p.m.

- ☐ I will meet you at the Pentagon at 12:30 on February 8.
- ☐ I cannot go to Washington, but I am enclosing $..... so that someone else may attend.
- ☐ You may lobby my congressman in my name for: An unconditional halt to bombing in Vietnam; No appropriations for the war; Open hearings on the conduct of this war.

NAME (print)
ADDRESS
CITY STATE ZIP

THEATRE/Harold Clurman

"No conflict, no drama" is a classic axiom. It seems to be borne out even today when the conflicting forces are not readily identifiable. Protagonist and antagonist appear to merge. Avant-garde plays reflect (I can hardly say "dramatize") conditions rather than situations. A man in a state of collapse is in a "condition"; if he does something to recover, or if someone comes to help him, we have a situation. The lack of purposive action makes many contemporary plays on the whole less interesting to wide audiences than the older drama. It is in the nature of human-kind to act, and once you begin to do so you are likely to encounter hardship, hence conflict. That is why drama interests us: we participate in its "stories." Quiescent drama is rarely rousing. Yet even in such drama there is some implicit conflict: the conflict may resolve itself to the difficulty of staying inactive.

I have been thinking on these matters because many of the plays I have recently been reading by would-be playwrights are little more than yammers of prostration in which four-letter imprecations are hurled against nothing in particular—not even destiny or God—and I have come to the conclusion that the artists who most firmly hold my attention are those in whom the conflicts they depict arise in the first place within themselves. When such conflicts are settled once and for all, when the warring elements within them are completely subdued, they have for me very little of interest to say. Peace of mind in the artist is gratifying only when we realize the desperate struggle that he has gone through to achieve it. And even then we must not be certain that the battle has come to a full stop.

The impression we gather from most of Ibsen's critics is of a grim and resolute moralist. He was a dogged and implacable warrior who knew what he wanted. When so presented on the stage, he becomes gray and slightly dull, worst of all, "old-fashioned."

There can be no question about it: Ibsen was a severely logical artist. He came of age in the heyday of scientific rationalism. This was the weapon with which to annihilate the hierarchy of bugaboos. He would give no quarter to the constriction of social-ethical notions that no longer corresponded to the facts of the industrial era. He was going to batter falsity down with moral and intellectual rigor. He wasn't joking about it.

Such characters now strike us as unsympathetic, insufficiently human. We prefer greater flexibility. Humor, we believe, is the saving grace. Chekhov maintained that Russian actors couldn't play Ibsen because Russians (those in Chekhov's time at any rate) were more vulnerable, softer, less consistent—delightfully or frantically bewildered. Compared to characters in Turgenev, Chekhov or even Gorky, Ibsen's people are unyielding.

But just as we are eager in our theatre today to discover the comedic aspects of Chekhov's plays so that we may not suffer their intrinsic sadness, so we are beginning to look for Ibsen's lighter side. In both cases we fall into error. For Chekhov's laughter arises from tenderness and compassion; it is not escape from pain. It is an embrace of our total human experience in which the tragic and the comic are complementary, the two being more semantical-ly than substantively differentiated.

Comedy in Ibsen is a symptom of a laceration in Ibsen's spirit. Chekhov smiles because he forgives and accepts. Ibsen is tougher; he is too "logical" for such an attitude. He is fighting all the time, and—this is his pathos—he is generally fighting himself. He says "either, or." Since neither the one nor the other quite satisfies him because he contains both, his laughter is harsh, a godlike judgment, proud and inexorable. Ibsen is relentless, constantly punitive. Neither Chekhov nor Ibsen is "funny."

In a little-known play, Emperor and Galilean, Julian the apostate says: "The old beauty is no longer beautiful, and the new truth is no longer true." Throughout his life Ibsen was haunted by a vision of grandeur which was being destroyed and had to be destroyed, while he felt trapped in a world which diminished manhood. He was torn by the conflict between justice and love. He sought the ideal and demanded the practical. He was divided by contrary impulses, and each of his plays is the justification of one or the other of his urges: Christianity and paganism, aristocracy and democracy, individualism and socialism.

Brand insists on self-abnegation and wrecks everyone as well as himself. Peer Gynt wants to be triumphantly independent and constantly compromises with all that stands in his way, finally becoming attenuated into a dry and empty shell, waste matter for the Buttonmolder. Hedda Gabler, a general's daughter, desires a life of glorious splendor and finds herself reduced to a middle-class housewife. Solness dreams of building towering mansions but succeeds only in constructing ordinary dwelling places. In devotion to his art, Rubek in When We Dead Awaken renounces passionate fulfillment through the love of a woman and finds that in doing so he has failed both as artist and man. Gregers Werle in The Wild Duck pursues truth unrelentingly in the belief that it will save, only to find that it may ruin.

All this may explain something about the APA production of The Wild Duck at the Lyceum. It is decent and intelligent enough. It is not so trim a

PINTER'S "THE HOMECOMING"

"AN EXTRAORDINARILY IMPRESSIVE PLAY. ONE WHOSE EQUAL WE ARE NOT LIKELY TO SEE AT ALL SOON. NOT TO BE MISSED. A REMINDER OF HOW EXCITING THE THEATRE CAN STILL BE."

NEWSWEEK

THE ROYAL SHAKESPEARE COMPANY IN THE HOMECOMING

PRICES: Mon. thru Sat. Evgs.: Orch. $7.50; Front Mezz. $6.75, 5.75; Rear Mezz. $4.75, 3.75, 3.00. Wed. & Sat. Mats.: Orch. $5.75; Front Mezz. $5.25, 4.75; Rear Mezz. $4.25, 3.25, 2.50. Please enclose stamped, self-addressed envelope with order. List several alternate dates.
MUSIC BOX THEATRE 239 W. 45 St., N.Y. 246-4636

YEARS

In the traffic outside the window
 Ella Fitzgerald's voice —
 A car radio at 2 AM —
 Like all those years
 Coming back, coming back
 Zoom, they're gone, with the traffic,
 With the voice. The jazz of that time
 Riding out the nothing war,
 The nothing books, the nothing years.

HARVEY SHAPIRO

production as that of Right You Are because the latter is, for all its twists and turns, a simpler, more linear play. The Wild Duck demands far more from its actors.

The weakling Hjalmar Ekdal, your "average man," and his sensible peasant-like wife, both brilliantly drawn and on the whole comedic figures comparatively easy to project, never fail to register. But Gregers Werle, presumably the butt of Ibsen's criticism (directed, it may be, against himself), carries the real challenge of the play, and it is rarely met in performance. The reason is that directors try to make a pathetic caricature of him. His idealism is naive to the point of folly; his motivation neurotic. But though there is a certain mockery in Ibsen's portrait of Werle, he must not be made petty. (Dr. Stockman, the "enemy of the people," may also be given a humorous touch as a fumbling innocent, but in the end he must retain something of the heroic.) The bourgeois realist Ibsen was ultimately interested in nothing less than the grandiose: his "cottages" are really cathedrals. The weakness of the APA production—and one should not be scornful of it on this account—is that its Werle is a slight, almost an inconsequential, personage.

Werle may be cramped, even a little absurd, but he is still Ibsen and, despite all, a mighty being. For what does Werle say about himself as the curtain falls: that he is forever destined to remain "the thirteenth man at the table." Yes, says Werle-Ibsen, I may be a troublemaker, a spoil sport, even "crazy," but my function is incessantly to go on clamoring for the truth and the ideal, even if I never attain them or am never able to ascertain their exact nature.

I have seen The Wild Duck in many different productions. It is still worth seeing at the APA-Lyceum.

Debonair and cultivated Michael Flanders is attractively sophisticated in humor; Donald Swann suggests a state of embarrassment because of what he understands but will not utter, while he seems at the same time to be quite pleased by this condition and hopeful that it may go unnoticed.

At the Drop of Another Hat is not "theatre," though it is housed at the Booth, and is more than ordinarily agreeable. Matisse once said that he wished his paintings to be as restful as an armchair. Flanders and Swann provide us with an armchair which keeps us alert and rested. They make excellent hosts.

By an error for which he was not responsible, Harold Clurman was made to refer to Miss Cecil Dawkins as "Mr." in his column of January 16. The editors apologize to Miss Dawkins and Mr. Clurman.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

The problem in reviewing Lincoln Center's four evenings of New Cinema (week of January 15) is not to let irritation with the pompous avant-institutional presentation rub off on the works themselves. Most of the films shown (in the first two evenings, which were all I could attend by press time) are capable short works (from three minutes to half an hour) and would embellish any commercial showing that needed a little padding of the feature. But many of them are not new in the literal sense and none that I saw offered any inventive or artistic novelty. The occasion seemed to be a celebration of the unremarkable. Janus Films, the co-sponsor, was given a gold-plated send-off for a series of packages it intends to send out on the college circuit; Lincoln Center once more gave the impression of sweating to fill its real estate.

On the first evening, I actively disliked only one picture, Corrida Interdite; and that partly because the cult worship of torturing bulls to death offends me, and partly because I am tired of the device of running film at reduced speed and calling the effect ballet.

The program offered two animated cartoons—Enter Hamlet (U.S.) and The Do-It-Yourself Cartoon Kit (England) that were funny at a sight-gag level, and a very short (three minutes) fable in line, Two Castles (Italy), that was a wry comment on human tomfoolery. It was probably the best moment of the evening.

Renaissance (by the Polish Borowczyk, but produced in France) reconstructed the corner of a living room that had been destroyed by a hand grenade by running the film backward, and Allures (U.S.) was an abstract fireworks display that made me wonder how much you would have to pay for a really good kaleidoscope. The program note refers to the "overwhelming emotional effect" of Renaissance and finds in Allures "the subliminal rhythms of the inner cosmos," which is saying a lot for a couple of routine, if skillful, trick films, and shows how exciting the trade of blurb writing can be.

The three larger offerings, the mini-features of the first evening, were by François Truffaut, Roman Polanski and Chris Marker; all three were made in France. In Les Mists '67 (The Mischief Makers), Truffaut weaves the summer idyll of a gang of pre-adolescent boys plaguing a young couple in love. The children are beautifully directed in the style of a host of French films that have learned from Generals Without But-tons, the lovers behave as though they were well aware that their embraces were being spied upon, the ending is mawkish (arbitrarily sad). This pleasant banality is made endurable by the punctuation of Truffaut's wit.

The Fat and the Lean (Polanski) is a parable about how we skinny dopes slave to take care of you fat slobs, while all the while our eyes yearn for Paris on the horizon. Two tramps enact the pantomime, Polanski himself playing the lean one with much gymnastic virtuosity. It was repetitious and ponderously obvious, and I kept wishing that people would let Beckett make his own films.

The evening ended with La Jetée (The

The Sunday Ramparts

A new weekly newspaper of national significance, published by Ramparts Magazine. For free sample copy, write Ramparts, 301 Broadway, San Francisco 94133

SPRING SEMESTER IN THE CLASSROOM

^{THE}NATION

"Student boredom is one of the great barriers to learning. Where a course can be enlivened by social controversy and by knowledge passionately felt and applied to the critical problems of our time, the interest of the students comes alive. That is why in over fifteen years of teaching in Midwestern and Eastern colleges I have often turned to The Nation for a classroom subscription to supplement the factual, but passionless, American government textbook."

—Marc Karson, North Central College,
Naperville, Ill.

"Don't walk into your classroom unprepared for a discussion on current issues. Read The Nation to make sure you have both viewpoints on today's problems and issues. Knowing only one side of an issue is the quickest road to dictatorship."

—David Blais, North High School,
North St Paul, Minn.

For the convenience of teachers, who want to use
The Nation in the classroom, we offer a special classroom rate.

65c per month per student in bundle orders of ten or more delivered to the same address. Desk copy is supplied free to the teacher. Simply fill out the coupon below for immediate service.

THE NATION, Education Department
333 6th Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

Please send me copies per month
for months. (Minimum order ten copies per month.)

☐ Check enclosed

☐ Bill me

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP No.

1-30-67

Deck) which Marker may intend to carry a timely message but which gets tangled in a sleight of hand about time. The film begins and ends at Orly in the present tense, but the main action takes place after World War III, and concerns the desperate efforts of the doomed survivors to send a messenger for help into the future or the past. There is a small romance in the misty-melancholy tone of Robert Nathan, there are a few eerie moments, mostly occasioned by hypodermic needles and futuristic eyeglasses. The denouement should be guessed early by anyone with a working knowledge of time travel.

At the second evening, the audience threatened to mutiny during the projection, surprisingly enough, of a film describing the execution of a set of doors for St. Peter's, Rome. The combination of Carlo Levi's portentous text, John Huston's unctuous voice, a grandiloquent score and the hammy notions of the artist, Giacomo Manzù, as to how the rigors of creation might most effectively be enacted provoked hoots, boos and ironic applause. Janus representatives in the house no doubt reported back to the home office that this picture is a non-starter.

Also on the bill was an animated rendition of Beckett's Act Without Words (France), which employed a Tinker Toy puppet in the solo part and thus destroyed the meaning of the piece—man's defeat by a dehumanized society.

The jewel of the evening was The Most, Ballentine and Shepard (Canada), which is the now-famous 1962 documentary on Hugh Hefner, his philosophy, his girlie empire, the sycophants who surround him. Hefner, his fanatic's eyes glittering, avers that he is the Scott Fitzgerald of his decade and by any normal definition a genius. The half hour catches him putting out Playboy, apparently with the help of a secretary, a cleaning woman and a model, and presiding over an orgy of what he calls sophisticated relaxation at his Chicago town house. The liquor flows, the girls wiggle, the bathers gambol in the subterranean pool (I was alarmed by the absence of a sober lifeguard), and the hired hands testify that they "love the guy."

The key to a man like Hefner (Huntington Hartford is another, as a rollicking TV profile once proved) is that he does not demand the instant destruction of the film. Indeed, he "performs" himself with a fatuous self-satisfaction that reduces an audience to gasping, incredulous laughter.

THE NATION / January 30, 1967

Crossword Puzzle No. 1186

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Money in the container might surprise you! (4-2-3-3)
- 9 The hockey coach's concluding remarks might be at the bottom of the business. (6, 4)
- 10 Coward, for example, one might now find on Sixth Avenue. (4)
- 11 On the wrong basis, tease the type like Wilde? (8)
- 12 In Utah, it is considered a romantic spot. (6)
- 13 Love might make the heart; problems might make the head. (5)
- 15 Lean, only more so, as one who might be on the run around the hotel. (8)
- 16 Rash would certainly be no description for the brachycephalic! (8)
- 19 Painting style of "Composition in Green"? (5)
- 21 Make a mistake, and it might provide a job for one of the 9. (6)
- 22 In the tropics, a strange fruit! (8)
- 24 Meal ticket? (4)
- 25 All nature, I find, is presenting one view. (10)
- 26 Might is provide the additional power needed to hold up a Valkyrie? (12)

DOWN:

- 2 A lousy baker's stand-in — Danish didn't come out well with him. (6, 3, 5)
- 3 Jersey might provide suitable work for one. (7)
- 4 Relative point in fine surroundings.

(5)

- 5 The sort of horse likely to be found in vaudeville? (7)
- 6 The sun might at a different time in winter, coming in on all sides. (9)
- 7 One might have to get madder to find it, with a number attached to the article on the weak end. (7)
- 8 Life's staff being unavailable, this was a less professional comment during the rioting. (3, 4, 3, 4)
- 14 It involves take-off and landing at some distance. (5, 4)
- 17 Some distribute a limited number of suits, while others handle a full line of clothing, appliances, etc. (7)
- 18 The body's cold, but still shows some movement. (7)
- 20 If the head of such a power were turned, the results would be far from certain. (7)
- 23 There might be a tack on each side of such a leg. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1185

ACROSS: 1 Comprehension; 10 Ordered; 11 Trapeze; 12 Epochal; 13 Retinue; 14 Tuesday; 15 Soprano; 16 Hassock; 20 Peanuts; 23 Brittle; 24 Lying in; 25 Narrows; 26 Chimera; 27 Opening nights.
DOWN: 2 Old rose; 3 Parched; 4 End play; 5 Extorts; 6 Start up; 7 Oceania; 8 To beat the band; 9 Never on Sunday; 17 Stirrup; 18 Outworn; 19 Keelson; 20 Pelican; 21 Residing; 22 Unguent.

PUBLICATIONS

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 a year. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53848.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 644—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

DOES UNCLE SAM WANT YOU? Escape from "Freedom," a new pamphlet explains Canadian immigration procedures. Send 50¢ plus handling to SUPA Anti-draft Program, 658 Spadina Avenue, Toronto 4, Canada.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 111 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

EDUCATIONAL

Training for Leadership in Social Change The Upland Institute

One-year graduate level professional training. Studying theory and strategy of the great traditions of social change. Field experience with institutions of social change in Philadelphia area. Co-educational, non-sectarian. Admission requirement: B.A. or equivalent training and experience. Write:

JOHN W. THOMAS
THE UPLAND INSTITUTE
Chester, Pa. 19013

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

OFFICE WORK desired by young man, all-round clerical experience in mail room and shipping. Box 600, c/o The Nation.

$2.95
each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF
The NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.

- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.
- Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office
3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send
check or money order,
MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N.Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER
UPON REQUEST

Ramparts

1967

Double Issue/75¢

"Ramparts magazine greeted the New Year with a straight left jab to the public jaw."—Time magazine

This extraordinary issue of Ramparts was attacked last week by both Time magazine and the Department of Defense. Small wonder.

It was the fourth such anti-Ramparts outburst from Time in almost as many months. The point is, Ramparts has again shaken up the public conscience with a 24-page special report on "The Children of Vietnam" in the January Double Issue. This report, introduced by Dr. Benjamin Spock, includes 16 pages of chilling color photography, chronicling the most inhuman side of the war. "A million children have been killed, wounded or burned in the war America is carrying on in Vietnam," says William Pepper in Ramparts.

Also in this Double Issue: "The Case for Three Assassins," a special supplement on the murder of President Kennedy; the first inside look at the Minutemen's nationwide network of organizations; a report on LBJ and the oil lobby; and the story of the latest of the heresy trials, entitled "Bishop Pike's Not for Burning."

Next month watch for Robert Scheer on Robert Kennedy; a frightening look at our "Defense Intellectuals"; the homosexual "tyranny" over our culture; the press in Saigon, and more.

Subscribe now: all cash orders will receive the January Double Issue (now on newsstands) ■ a bonus.

(SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER)

RAMPARTS Editorial Rooms 5118
301 Broadway, San Francisco, California 94133

GENTLEMEN: I would like to receive anything that continually gets Time so outraged. Please send me:

- ☐ six issues for $2.67, or ☐ twelve issues for $5.00, or
☐ a lifetime of issues for $100.00
☐ Check enclosed ☐ Bill me N

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

[The January issue is on sale on newsstands, now]

TO THE WOOLF HOUSE STANLEY POSS

THE NATION

FEBRUARY 6, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME
MAR 2 1969
LIBRARY

Vietnam

THE LOGIC OF WITHDRAWAL

HOWARD TIRM

California Revolution 2

THE KNOWLEDGE BONANZA MEL WAX

RHODESIA: Sanctions on Trial

JOHN HATCH

Thompson's Frost / QUENTIN ANDERSON

Kramer's Chicago / DAN LEVIN

Britain's Graffiti / ELMER BENDINER

Gourmet Theologian / GABRIEL YAHANIAN

12-18-67H PLB-62B
PORTER LIBRARY
KANSAS STATE COLL OF
-PITTSBURG
PITTSBURG KS 66762

PORTER LIBRARY
FEB 6 1967
KANSAS STATE COLL OF PITTSBURG

LETTERS

too much gravy

Long Island City, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: R. A. Musgrave's thoughtful piece ["National Taxes and Local Needs," The Nation, Jan. 16] omits any mention of the main objection to sharing federal tax collections with the states. That is the prevalence of corruption in the state legislatures. Aside from the few house-keeping chores they perform (the licensing of saloons and doctors, and the extraction of loyalty oaths from suspect occupations such as teaching), the states are chiefly engaged in the manufacture of gravy for the politicians and their businessmen friends. . . . My best guess is that not more than one-tenth of returned federal taxes would be applied to stated purposes. . . .

Emmett Swisshelm

communications gap

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Douglass Cater, of Mr. Johnson's staff, informs me that he has never suggested that U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe II should clear his speeches with the White House.

The quote attributed to him in "Guidelines to Frustration" [The Nation, Jan. 16] was given to me by a responsible member of Mr. Howe's staff who said that he was present when the remark was made. Mr. Cater insists that my informant misunderstood him.

Robert Sherrill

Jews in Russia

New York City

DEAR SIR: In his article ["Kosygin in Paris: Differences Within Amity," The Nation, Dec. 26], Alexander Werth writes with astonishing presumption that only "a minority of old-fashioned, orthodox or Israel-conscious Jews" resent the measures taken by the Soviet Government against Jewish cultural expression, and that "approximately 2 million Jews (of the less than 3 million in the country) . . . do not in the main want to rank as Jews." I cannot imagine what authority Mr. Werth has for this allegation. . . .

Those of us who seek wider rights for Soviet Jews frequently are confronted with the argument that we have no mandate from Soviet Jewry. . . . And it is true that there is no way of knowing adequately the desire of Soviet Jews except by a host of inferences. We don't know, and neither does Mr. Werth. This indeed is our principal complaint. There is no permitted address for Soviet Jews, there is no central organization, no representative body, no one to ask.

Soviet authorities insist that the paucity of Jewish facilities in the USSR reflects a lack of desire among Soviet Jews for them. But the available facts of Soviet life decisively refute this claim. In 1959, almost half a million Jews recorded Yiddish as their first language. Every time a Yiddish book appears its supply is exhausted immediately upon publication and copies become unobtainable. Yiddish concerts—intermittent and inadequate though they are—because they are the single cultural medium still available to Jews, invariably attract overflow audiences. The festival of Simchath Torah each year finds Jews crowding the streets as the simplest form of affirmation of this Jewish identity.

In any case, there is no need to rely on conjecture, or even on the contradictory anecdotal accounts of travelers in the Soviet Union. (Reports of Jews with shadowed eyes who implore, "Do not forget us" are offset by other reports of somebody else's cousins who say, "We're fine the way we are.") No one desires that Soviet Jews be coerced into a feeling of fellowship or identity that is not authentic. We therefore propose a simple test: We challenge Soviet authorities to let there be established in the Soviet

(Continued on page 181)

EDITORIALS

A Better Purpose

In exactly 915 words, Archibald MacLeish has managed to sum up twenty years of cold-war history (The New York Times, January 21). "Like a badly constructed concert hall," he writes, history has occasional "dead spots where the music can't be heard." We are caught in one of them today, as shown by the confusion and lack of clear purpose in our national life, the frustration, the boredom, the stalemated reforms, the backbiting, the eclipse of social idealism. And the reason is clear. "We can't make out the tune of the time because we are still back behind it in the 1950s with the dilapidated bulk of 'Anti-Communism' against our faces." Like all the "anti-isms," "anti-communism" is not a policy but an expedient to conceal the fact that we have no policy. An "anti" policy does not define a goal or point a direction; it merely insures an automatic response to whatever initiatives the opposition undertakes. Containment—an attempt to formalize an "anti-Communist" position—has meant a "redefinition of the American purpose in the world as the negation of the Russian purpose"—or, more recently, the Chinese purpose or the Cuban purpose, or any revolutionary purpose. "If we could bring ourselves to look around, it might occur to us that we are not, whatever the ushers may have told us, in the best seat in the house. Some, of course, have already noticed. Even fifteen years ago when the place was first proposed to us a few protested. 'Anti-Communism,' which meant McCarthy at home and Containment abroad, looked like a queer location for the United States, a nation not previously given to squatting in the lee of anything."

But can we now bring ourselves to take that "look around" or would it be too painful? Are we willing to abandon the pursuit of affluence long enough to take such a look at ourselves and our position in the world? Mr. MacLeish hopefully notes that "the perspective alters" and indeed it does. But "anti-communism" is still the prime determinant of American policy, or lack of it. Dean Rusk's demonstrated inability to define American purpose in Vietnam in other than "anti-Communist" clichés is a measure of our continued entrapment by the compulsive ideology that masquerades as "anti-communism." Senator Fulbright complains that Mr. Rusk won't admit that Vietnam is a civil war; but how could he make such an admission? How then would he justify our presence there? Similarly the circumstance that a policeman—Mr. Hoover—is permitted a right of veto over even such a minor modification of our rigid "anti-Communist" position as the proposed consular treaty with the Russians is another measure of the extent to which we are prisoners of an ideology we neither acknowledge nor discuss. Since our adherence to this ideology, we have steadily lost the freedom of action which we possessed in 1945.

But Mr. MacLeish is right: the perspective alters. Under the impact of new realities, the hypnotic effect of "anti-communism" has begun to abate. An indication that the winds are shifting slightly is to be found in an article by Max Geltman, "The Decline of the Anti-Communist Left" in a recent issue of National Review. Mr. Geltman is keenly distressed that the shrill voices of the "anti-Communist Left"—really the cold-war liberals—have turned strangely silent. A group of American intellectuals who, fifteen years ago, helped to establish the moral and political climate for McCarthyism have now adopted a modified posture. Examples abound—you have only to scan the signatures on the petitions and published statements calling for an end to the war in Vietnam.

There are other indications. For example, the current issue of Partisan Review contains an interesting symposium on "What's Happening to America," from which one learns: "There is a good deal of anxiety about the direction of American life. In fact there is reason to fear that America may be entering a moral and political crisis." Quite true—and the crisis has been maturing for fifteen years. Today we are told that Vietnam is a "bitter heritage"; so it is, the heritage of two decades of intensive "anti-Communist" activity at home and abroad.

The perspective alters, but our policy makers are still prisoners of the ideology in which they have imprisoned themselves. The "anti-Communist Left" may be less venomous than it was and, now and then, some of the scaffolding of McCarthyism is dismantled. The Supreme Court's recent decision invalidating New York's teacher loyalty program is a case in point. But as Mr. MacLeish notes: "McCarthy has disappeared—but only to be replaced by the apparently ineradicable rock of McCarthyism. And Containment has turned into the disaster implicit in it from the start—the disaster of Vietnam." Nor is the end in sight: in the intervening period the power of the Right has steadily grown as the power of the Left has steadily declined. As a result of this change in the relative power of the two wings, the Center position has swung much further to the right. A well-organized and heavily financed element now exists well to the right of Goldwater. On today's spectrum, the late Sen. Robert Taft would appear as left of Center.

Fifteen years ago a few political observers were willing to protest that "anti-communism" could never define an American purpose. Today there are more, but still not enough. At some pain and discomfort, The Nation insisted then—and has continued to insist—that the only answer to communism is, as Mr. MacLeish puts it, "a better purpose of our own." And the pity of it is that with all the frights and alarms, crises and debacles of the last twenty years, we have always had a better purpose at hand. The Revolution of 1776, not the Revolution of 1917, is, as Mr. MacLeish points out, today providing "the dynamics of the waking world from the west coast of Africa to the islands of Japan." Perhaps, by some miracle, we may yet recapture the spirit of that revolution.

IN THIS ISSUE

February 6, 1967

EDITORIALS

162

ARTICLES

166 Rhodesia: Sanctions on Trial

John Hatch

170 Vietnam: The Logic of Withdrawal

Howard Zinn

175 Retirement Benefits:
Pension Plans on Thin Ice

Anthony Prisenorff

178 California Revolution 2:
The Knowledge Bonanza

Mel Wax

BOOKS & THE ARTS

182 Frost's Way: Making the Most of It

Quentin Anderson

184 Real American Life

Dan Levin

185 The Harvesters' Vase (poem)

Ned O'Gorman

186 Bright Graffiti

Elmer Bendiner

187 To the Woolf House

Stanley Poss

188 Gourmet Theologian

Gabriel Vahanian

189 Art

Max Kozloff

190 Poem

David Shapiro

191 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Science
CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION

Volume 204
No. 6

The Big-Guns Budget

Mr. Johnson's budget is a multiple effort such as one would expect from a politician seasoned in dispensing rewards and foreseeing the effects of what he gives, and what he withholds. It contains potential goodies for each Congressman: opposition cannot be disarmed, but it can be minimized. The aged and other deprived groups are given special treatment, special commiseration, special promises. The space boys receive about the same funds as in the earlier stages of Apollo, which at the present stage of the moon race is more than enough. A show of moderation is based on cutbacks of atomic missiles. The Johnson flank is protected by a start on an anti-missile defense, and so on.

The submittal of the Presidential budget is of course a ritualistic exercise. Its underlying aims are political, despite its economic façade. The President can only make recommendations. He does not spend the money (nor adjust the taxes); all that is up to Congress. When the President submits the budget, he lays down the preliminary outlines for debate. For the moment he is on the spot, while Congressmen wring their hands at his extravagance and his wild ideas, and others dutifully praise him for his loving solicitude toward the common man. The same Congressmen who are now calling him names will soon be voting for pork-barrel projects for their own districts, and logrolling with their colleagues. When it comes to "defense," they will be appropriating funds that the Administration has not asked for and will not spend.

"Defense," current spending for war, preparation for future wars—these are the solid parts of the budget. These are the parts that Congress will not cut. The knife will be out for everything that contributes to peace and welfare—the two sides of the same coin. The economizers will zero in on all these items and pare them just short of the point where public outrage might be aroused. If they stop short of making a shambles of the Great Society, it will not be from statesmanship or good will but from prudence. To batter LBJ too hard would not be safe, but they will know how far to go.

This is not a guns-and-butter or even a guns-and-margarine budget. The guns will remain and the margarine ration will be lowered. With $73 billion for defense, including $22 billion for the Vietnamese War, the hawks will still not be satisfied. The gentlemen of the Air Force Association, representing some of the big arms contractors, listened the other day at New York's Twenty-One restaurant to Barry Goldwater calling for more war and more military spending. The Army and Navy contractors will be equally importunate.

Nor should it be forgotten that the budget is based on the premise that the defense of civilization in Southeast Asia will continue at the present level. "The national defense program for the current and coming fiscal year," Mr. Johnson intoned, "bears the deep imprint of our commitment to preserve the independence of South Vietnam and to bring peace to that nation." He added that this part of the budget would be for the entire year, "barring unforeseen developments in Vietnam or elsewhere in the world. . ." He also said: "In Vietnam, as throughout the world, we seek peace, but will provide all the resources needed to combat aggression." (Italics added in both cases.) With such a blanket commitment, unforeseen developments can be foreseen.

In short, this is a war budget by a war President, and not much else.

The Perils of Overexposure

It would not be fair to say that the Kennedys seek publicity. They don't need to. Their present plight, however, is a horrible example of what overexposure can do to the image of a once popular group. Actually the application is only to Jacqueline Kennedy and Sen. Robert Kennedy. The old people no longer count except within the family, and Sen. Edward Kennedy has been on the sidelines of the current squabble.

The Manchester-Kennedy controversy reflects no credit on anyone involved. The latest episode, in which Manchester, before high tailing it to a jolly retreat in the Caribbean, fired a gratuitous parting salvo at Mrs. Kennedy, at the unhappy Bobby, at Richard Goodwin and others, only added to the unpleasant effect of the earlier proceedings. His two principal targets have temporarily been driven from the country. Bobby is leaving for London and Paris; Mrs. Kennedy, after her own trip to Southern waters, plans to visit Asia.

The commissioning of an authorized account of the terrible events of 1963 was a mistake to begin with. Mrs. Kennedy's pouring out her heart on tape to Mr. Manchester was a second mistake. Apparently, she has never heard Somerset Maugham's aphorism: "You can't be a writer and a gentleman too." If Maugham, who was a gentleman and at times a distinguished writer, couldn't manage it, how could Manchester?

The subsequent attempts on the part of the Kennedys to control the text of the book and its serialization gave the impression of an arrogant use of money and power. They may have been within their legal rights, but that is not the point. Apparently most of what they objected to was of little moment one way or the other. The public was not in a mood to go along with them, whether they were right or wrong. The John F. Kennedy aura was blown away by the exchange of recriminations.

At a given point of idolatry the public turns from adoring its idols and begins to examine their feet. Once celebrities reach a certain level of overexposure, there is just as much mileage to be gained from cutting them down as there was from building them up. The writers and broadcasters who provide this sort of fare are familiar with the reaction, and when some of them sense the turning point, the others follow. All of the overexposed live in the shadow of an obloquy. It is one of the hazards of publicity.

When the assault begins, no holds are barred. A British journalist now accuses the Kennedys of trying to establish a power base at Harvard through the John F. Kennedy School of Government. This is scurrilous nonsense. Harvard was there before the Kennedys, before the U.S. Government; it is well able to protect itself against wealth and power, from whatever source. Yet now, because of some mistakes in taste and judgment by a prominent family, not only is the family the butt of any scribbler, but a Harvard dean, and even the president of the university, must speak in its defense. Really, it's too much.

Winter of Discontent

Brandt, es ist aus. . . . Thus begins a sharp and bitter little poem addressed to the head of Germany's Democrats by F.C. Delius, a poet of the younger Berlin set. He belongs to the group of writers who supported Brandt—both in federal politics and against the power wielders in the apparatus of his own party; now, this group feels, Brandt has betrayed them: Brandt, it is over. . . .

It is an open question, however, when this betrayal took place, and whether it was not partly self-betrayal. The Berlin climate of the last few years was kind—suspiciously kind—to a politicking intelligentsia; Brandt, Arndt, Professor Schiller mingled freely with Günter Grass, Hans Werner Richter, Uwe Johnson and the younger set mentioned above. It looked as if, for the first time, the old curse of German authoritarianism, which relegates writers and thinkers to the sidelines of society, could be attacked successfully. And the bitterness resulting from the new SPD “sellout,” the Grand Coalition, was correspondingly great.

But was it really a sellout? The Grand Coalition was certainly an attempt to forestall the worst: a general and widespread distrust of the “system,” in other words, of democracy. Can it succeed? Cartoonists spoofed the coalition as a society wedding—Kiesinger as the groom and Willy Brandt as the bride; they may not be far off the truth. The coalition is, fundamentally, a nonpolitical way out; it tries to replace the old father figure (Adenauer) by the image of a “happy family.” It tries to reconcile democracy to the German petty-bourgeois mind which still abhors “bickering,” “sterile antagonism” and the like—in other words, abhors the fundamental principle of democracy: institutionalized conflict.

Herbert Wehner, the powerful SPD boss, contends that his party has to be made respectable by participation in government before it becomes truly acceptable to the floating vote. He also asserts that the coalition should be a passing phenomenon; that it should pave the way to a true Anglo-Saxon democratic system by adopting, for future elections, the two-party setup and the abolition of splinter representation in Parliament.

But does the German mind understand what a two-party system must be? Does it realize that both parties must become “democracies”—establishing within their own realms some sort of majority-minority consent before they become viable as political alternatives? There lies the new and very necessary field of action for the German intelligentsia.

But to occupy that field, the progressive spirit in Germany must overcome its old handicaps: perfectionism in political demands, dogmatism in principle, feebleness in action. The political climate in West Germany has moved to the right; not as much as international publicity has made out by trumpeting NPD successes but perceptibly enough to cause real worry. The nation cannot afford any longer to ignore its intellectuals—and the intellectuals cannot afford any more to stay aloof. C. AMERY

Up to Our Necks in Thailand

The early history of our involvement in Vietnam could be rewritten as current history in Thailand. Only one qualification is necessary: in Thailand new heights of deceit, double talk, obfuscation and plain lying have been reached. As in Vietnam, we are sending in troops (preponderantly airmen for the present), building bases, “advising” the Thai military, financing the ruling class lavishly, introducing the GI culture—including admiration for local womanhood—and making this sizable country (it is about as large as France) the fifty-first state, as Senator Fulbright has called it.

There are also a few differences from the story of Vietnam. One is that we did not need to put in our own boy to rule the country; no Ngo Dinh Diem was necessary. When we came on the scene the Thais already had a royal house of ancient lineage and a military dictatorship headed by Field Marshal Sarit Thanarat, who amassed a personal fortune of $140 million in five years, largely from our bounty. Sarit died, leaving not only this goodly estate but wives and concubines to a number remarkable even for Thailand.

As everyone knows by now (though no loyal Thai or loyal American will publicly admit it), since 1965 the major part of our air attacks on North Vietnam have originated at Thai bases. Eleven U.S. fighter-bomber squadrons are now stationed there. Although it is no longer denied that these forces have wrought considerable havoc, both military and civilian, in North Vietnam, their operations are relatively small stuff, as are the air operations over Laos. A modern fighter-bomber may be the peer in payload of a World War II heavy bomber, but it is rated as a tactical weapon.

The Strategic Air Command naturally wanted to exercise its muscles in Southeast Asia, and has been doing so since 1965 with B-52 raids on South Vietnam and the demilitarized zone between the two Vietnams. But these giants had to fly from Guam, nearly a 5,000-mile round trip, and some of them will now be more conveniently based at our airfields in Thailand. In fact, a number of B-52s are already there and have engaged in operations, although this is stoutly denied by the Air Force.

Since the United States can admit to being in Thailand for only one purpose—the defense of Western civilization against communism—we needed there the equivalent of the Vietcong in South Vietnam, and an insurrectionary force was duly detected in the northeast section of the country, adjacent to Laos. As earlier in Vietnam, the State Department denied that we were fighting the restive peasants; all we were doing was supplying helicopters to ferry Thai troops into action.

By U.S. accounts, Thailand is the most fiercely independent nation in the world, a kind of Switzerland of Asia. It has never been a colony and will never bend the knee to a great power. It is because of this almost neurotic sensitivity that we are forced to deny that we have 40,000 men in the country and that the bases are ours. It is a question whether this immemorial attitude of Thailand-for-the-Thais will long endure. It may be that the Thais will gradually be colonized, American style; they have only to look to the southeast to see how it comes about. But what matter? The top Thais are getting well paid for the services we render them.

Reagan's Lesson

The firing of Clark Kerr by the University of California Regents is the latest and most extreme example of the irresponsibility that has come, in just two weeks, to characterize the Reagan administration.

The San Francisco Chronicle of Saturday, January 21, carried the headline:

UC REGENTS FIRE KERR
—BIG VICTORY FOR REAGAN

And so it was—in his battle to hamstring the university and destroy the state's tradition of free education for all. It has often been said that the University of California demonstrates that it is possible to have both class and mass, for it is certainly the most distinguished state university in the country and one of America's greatest educational institutions. (See article by Mel Wax, p. 178.)

Reagan has advocated charging tuition, and many think that Kerr's strenuous opposition to this policy was one of the main reasons for his abrupt dismissal. But it has also been known that Reagan was out "to get Kerr," on the matter of handling the students during the recent strikes. Kerr is "soft on students," which is close enough to being "soft on communism" to warrant the guillotine in Orange County.

In addition to sacking Kerr and advocating tuition, Reagan has also requested large budget cuts, for both the university and the state-college system. Quite probably he is maneuvering: he will reduce the size of the cuts he is requesting (and perhaps even the tuition he advocates) and thus will emerge as a "moderate."

Regardless of what happens in the future, the immediate result of all this is that neither the university nor the state colleges can attract new faculty members, since the salaries are no longer competitive and the political climate is no longer so "sunny." This has long been a problem, especially in the state-college system, where faculty members carry heavy loads for only mediocre salaries. As a result, only about 50 per cent of its teaching staff have doctorates. Last year the system had half a dozen openings for presidencies—and had to go begging to fill them.

Thus, the educational system in California, in the control of such luminaries as Max Rafferty and Ronald Reagan, is plunging into a smog of despair. And "who shall lead it out?"

RHODESIA: SANCTIONS ON TRIAL

JOHN HATCH

Mr. Hatch is Commonwealth correspondent for the New Statesman and director of the Inter-University African Studies Program, University of Houston. He is the author of Africa Today—and Tomorrow.

London

On the evening of December 5, 1966, we waited outside the cabinet office in Salisbury, Rhodesia, a crowd of some 1,000, to learn whether Ian Smith and his cabinet had clinched the deal with Harold Wilson or were to fight on against the world. It was a hot, tropical night—during the day the temperature had risen to nearly 100°F. We had been there since morning, for the deadline agreed upon with the British was now eight hours past. A few black faces mingled with the white, but Africans kept mostly to the fringes. Despite the importance of the decision, there was an unreal, amateur air about the scene. We could even see Ian Smith's back through the open window as he sat at the head of the cabinet table. Occasionally, as the long hours ticked away, he would turn to the window and wave to us. For some minutes he was on his feet, clearly reading a document to his colleagues.

It was 8 P.M. when the double doors on the ground level swung open. To a shout of "Good old Smithy," the Rhodesian Prime Minister led his cabinet out into the forecourt beneath arc lights, flash bulbs and television cameras. He stood in the center of a semicircle formed by his colleagues to read the statement responding to the document produced two days earlier with Mr. Wilson aboard the British naval ship, Tiger. His first two sentences indicated agreement. A murmur through the crowd suggested that they believed the quarrel with Britain to be at an end. But his next word was "however. . . ." Then we knew that it was to be rejection. For Mr. Wilson had made it very plain that there was no longer room for reservation or amendment. Indeed, the rest of the statement represented a total rejection of the method laid down by Britain for the Smith regime to return to legality. It concluded with a ringing cry, "The fight goes on." At that, one man in the crowd called for three cheers for John Vorster, South Africa's Prime Minister; another shouted "out with the moderates"; and members of the cabinet grinned self-consciously.

Beaton, Toronto Telegram: Ben Roth

This was the climax to one of the most astonishing episodes in British colonial history. To explain the significance of the drama we need to recall the events leading to this tableau outside the cabinet office in Salisbury.

Rhodesia is legally a British colony. However, it differs from all other colonies in that it has never actually been ruled by a British Government. It was colonized toward the end of the last century by Cecil Rhodes's British South Africa Company. Agents of the company made agreements with the chiefs of African tribes, in particular with Lobengula, King of the Matabele, to prospect for minerals. When the Africans found that white men were also beginning to take their land, they objected and several wars took place. The African tribes, mainly the two groups known as the Matabele and the Mashona, were conquered. The BSAC then ruled the country until 1923 when its charter, granted by Queen Victoria, was due to expire.

In that year the British Government stepped in. It allowed the 35,000 Europeans to vote in a referendum on the alternative of becoming a self-governing colony or joining South Africa. In the proportion of about 4 to 3, the white settlers chose self-government. They were allowed their own parliament, civil service, police force and armed forces. Only external affairs and a veto on discriminatory legislation remained in the hands of the British Parliament.

This remained the position until 1953. By that time the European population, swollen by many refugees from postwar Britain's austerity, had grown to nearly 150,000. In 1953, Southern Rhodesia was joined with Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia in the Central African Federation. Injected with the rich copper profits of its northern neighbor, the economy boomed again. Immigrants from Britain and South Africa flocked into Salisbury and Bulawayo, where manufactures and service industries rapidly augmented the tobacco farming and mineral mining which had formed the country's staples.

But the federation failed. Despite the fact that it was ostensibly based on "racial partnership," the Africans soon found that this principle had been aptly described by the first federal Prime Minister, Godfrey Huggins, as the partnership of horse and rider. In Nyasaland and Northern Rhodesia African political parties grew strong enough to break down the federal structure and establish their own independent, African-governed states, which in 1964 became Malawi and Zambia.

This left Southern Rhodesia (now known as Rhodesia) on its own. It had about 225,000 European inhabitants and 4 million Africans. But before, during and after federation it had been governed by the white community. Indeed, despite the radical changes which had taken place all over Africa during the 1950s, no African was allowed to sit in the Rhodesian parliament until the end of 1962. Even then, only fifteen out of the sixty-five seats were filled by Africans, and they were elected by only a tiny section of the African population. This was partly because of the limited franchise, partly because African nationalists boycotted the constitution in protest against its undemocratic character.

With the grant of independence to Malawi and Zambia in 1964, Britain was left in an embarrassing position regarding Rhodesia. Inevitably, seeing their two neighbors becoming independent states, Rhodesian whites demanded complete independence themselves. They pointed out that the African ministers of the two new states had virtually no experience of administration; while they, themselves, had governed their country for the past forty years.

Yet throughout the decolonization period from 1947 on, British Parliaments had always adopted the principle that independence would be granted only after the whole population of a colony had expressed its desire to end colonial status. This had invariably been achieved through an election held on the basis of universal adult suffrage. But the Rhodesian franchise had always been heavily qualified in favor of the white man. Only a handful of Africans had ever been able to attain the financial and educational standards demanded for the right to vote. It was a small white oligarchy that demanded independence from British rule. The Africans, so far as they were able to express their wishes, urged that Britain retain its ultimate authority until the majority—obviously African—had gained the power to rule. This was what Britain had done in all its other dependencies, but in Rhodesia it had neither soldiers nor police nor civil service to insure that its wishes be carried out. Moreover, 225,000 Europeans were living in Rhodesia, compared with only about 70,000 in Zambia or 50,000 in Kenya, the other two principal multi-racial colonies. And many people in England regarded these Rhodesian whites as their "kith and kin."

This was the situation during the last year of Britain's Conservative government under Sir Alec Douglas-Home; it remained the position when Harold Wilson took over in October, 1964—with a majority of three!

Both Conservative and Labour governments refused the demands for complete independence. Each government insisted that before it would grant independence certain conditions must be fulfilled. The way must be clear for progress toward eventual majority rule, with safeguards to insure that there should be no turning back after Britain had surrendered sovereignty—as occurred in similar circumstances in South Africa. There must also be some immediate advance in African political status, abolition of racial discrimination, and the new constitution must be acceptable to the country as a whole. And, since the British Parliament alone could grant legal independence to Rhodesia, the British Government's policy represented the terms which any Rhodesian regime would have to fulfill in order to obtain constitutional sovereignty. In the event, the Smith regime decided that it would not accept such terms, but would take unconstitutional action. On November 11, 1965, Ian Smith declared Rhodesia independent, in defiance of British authority. The Wilson government immediately termed the declaration an act of treason, the Smith regime illegal. It called on all other states to refuse to recognize the regime, and no state has recognized the illegal government during the ensuing fourteen months.

It might have been expected that the other African states, hostile toward the white supremacy administrations of southern Africa, would have eagerly joined Britain in action against Smith and his colleagues. But two issues divided black Africa from Harold Wilson. In the summer of 1965, Julius Nyerere of Tanzania had quarreled with Wilson at the Commonwealth conference because the British Prime Minister refused to give an undertaking that he would not grant Rhodesia independence before majority rule had been established there. By the time Smith had declared unilateral independence in November it seemed to most Africans that nothing short of British military intervention could prevent white domination. Yet Wilson, with his meager majority of three, feared unpopularity with the British electorate and openly disclaimed any intention of using force. The Africans read these two lessons as proof that Wilson's government intended to make a deal with Smith's insubordinate regime, being unwilling to use the methods Britain had employed in the past against Africans and other non-whites in rebellious colonies.

So Tanzania and some other African states broke off diplomatic relations with Britain at the end of 1965. The key African position was held by Zambia. This northern neighbor of Rhodesia was heavily dependent on the rebellious colony for coal supplies to its vital copper industry, for the railway line which carried most of the copper exports, and for provision of most of its imports.

President Kaunda of Zambia was prepared to cut off some trade to help the British sanctions policy against Smith, but was not willing to sacrifice his infant country's economy permanently on the altar of a policy he did not believe could succeed. The past year's experience has left Kaunda very angry with Harold Wilson. When, even after Wilson's majority was increased to ninety-seven in last March's elections, the British Prime Minister began to conduct talks with the Smith regime, Zambian suspicions of British intentions were confirmed. When I met President Kaunda over breakfast one steamy December morning, he made it plain that he and his colleagues were in the process of developing their potentially rich economy independently of British desires. In particular, they are turning their communications as fast as possible from the south to Tanzania and the Congo in the north. But, in the meantime, they look first to Zambian interests, even to the point of accepting South African supplies as substitutes for Rhodesian.

The Zambians are enthusiastically confident about their economic prospects; but I found Kaunda deeply worried lest the conflict with Rhodesia should disturb the racial peace which he is painstakingly building. Already some of the 70,000 Europeans in Zambia have shown overt or covert support for the Smith regime. Some Africans in Kaunda's party have retaliated. Riots have taken place on the Copper Belt; during one of them a European woman was killed, though accidentally, when a stone was thrown through her wind-screen. But Kaunda cannot afford to lose his skilled white workers, and he rightly feels apprehensive that confidence is ebbing as the ripples of the Rhodesian conflict spread to the north.

It was in this context that the meeting took place on H.M.S. Tiger at the beginning of December. Inevitably, it roused African suspicions to explosive levels. Again it confirmed the belief that Wilson was more concerned to reach any kind of settlement with Smith than to replace white supremacy by democratic rule. Nor were these suspicions confined to Africans. Several members of Wilson's government and more backbenchers were ready to resign in protest against the deal. When the document produced in this bizarre conference at sea was published, it was seen that Wilson had been prepared to sacrifice any appearance of democracy in the constitution he offered to Smith. Its acceptance would certainly have led to a furor in the Labour Party and have severed relations between Britain and Africa for many years.

As it turned out, Wilson was spared resignations and diplomatic ostracism by Smith's rejection of the document he had participated in drafting. Frankly, when those of us who have been concerned over the years to prevent Rhodesia's following the South African pattern heard Ian Smith pronounce the words "the fight goes on," we breathed a sigh of relief. For we recognized that now, unless there was further backsliding, Britain would be forced to follow the policy spelled out at last September's Commonwealth conference. This included asking the UN Security Council to declare mandatory sanctions on specified Rhodesian imports and exports, and a declaration that now Britain would withdraw all previous offers to Smith, refusing to grant independence before ma-majority rule had been established. And this latter pledge, known as NIBMAR (no independence before majority African rule), I knew to be crucial to future British-African relations. Only a week before, Julius Nyerere had told me in Dar es Salaam that this pledge, and evidence that it was to be carried out, would restore his trust in Britain.

Why, then, if the Tiger offer appeared so favorable to the Rhodesian whites, did Smith and his cabinet reject the settlement? The answer is that they did not believe they could secure the constitution they were offered. The document was in two parts. The second, outlining a constitution under which Wilson would grant independence, was eminently acceptable to Smith. Indeed, he said at his TV press conference that if it had been offered last year he would not have declared UDI. But, according to the first part of the offer, to reach the constitutional settlement Smith would have to resign his independence and agree to four months' interim rule under the governor. Moreover, during this period a commission would have tested public opinion on the new constitution. Smith and his colleagues reckoned that public opinion—which would include the 4 million Africans as well as the 225,000 whites—would reject the constitution. It may be that Wilson thought the Rhodesian public would prefer the new constitution to Smith's present rule; or he may have estimated that the commission, on which Rhodesians would sit, would have been of such a character as to recommend acceptance. But Smith and his ministers were not prepared to take the chance. They feared that once they had surrendered independence the Rhodesian public would reject any constitution which restored it to them. They therefore were prepared for public opinion to be tested on the draft constitution only before they handed over power to the governor. They believed that in these circumstances, when the choice would appear to be between continued white autocratic rule or the new constitution, there would be a chance of public acceptance of the settlement. If not, they would still hold the reins of power. Whatever Ian Smith's own views on the Tiger—and he is a weak, indeterminate man who likes to agree with whoever he is talking to at the moment—as soon as his cabinet saw the document it was unanimously rejected.

But the Tiger incident has created a new situation. After the first brash cries of defiance, opinion among many whites began to waver. The business community, always opposed to UDI, although making it work, was strongly apprehensive of UN sanctions. The farmers—both tobacco and mixed—are in a bad way. Last year's tobacco crop paid them 23 pence a pound compared with 35 pence the year before. And, for the first time, the white community had believed when Smith went to the Tiger that a settlement might ensue. When they asked themselves whether they preferred a settlement to a fight to the finish, most answered that they hoped that the quarrel with Britain could be ended—though not by handing over government to Africans.

Since the rejection of the Tiger document, Wilson has moved forward along the lines laid down by the Commonwealth conference. The Security Council has approved sanctions on selected Rhodesian trade, though disappointing the Africans by not mentioning the use of force or confrontation with South Africa and Portugal if they refuse to apply sanctions. On December 20, after a painful delay, Wilson also announced that independence would not now be offered to the Rhodesians before majority rule had been introduced. Immediately, President Nyerere declared that his country's quarrel with Britain was over.

What happens now? A great deal depends on how seriously Britain and America apply the sanctions. If sales of tobacco, chrome, asbestos, pig iron and meat are denied to Rhodesians, they will find it difficult to gain foreign currency to buy essential imports. And South Africa will find it increasingly expensive to support the Smith regime.

Scarfe, London Daily Mail; Ben Roth

But oil is the vital issue. So long as the South Africans continue to supply Rhodesia with oil, the economy can be kept going, though on a lower plateau. Africans will judge the sincerity of Britain and America in replacing a white oligarchic regime with eventual democracy by their policy on oil. If they command their oil companies—and their South African subsidiaries—to stop the supply of oil; and if they warn South Africa and Portugal that they do not intend the UN will to be flouted, then the Smith regime can be defeated. Already, the Nationalist Cape Town daily, Die Burger, has told Smith to drop UDI. This will then be seen as a victory for the West's determination to secure democratic, nonracial societies. If there is any fudging of the issue, any appeasement of South Africa, any further negotiations with Smith, then the West will be damned as hypocritical and racist. It is not, then, just the future of Rhodesia or even of southern Africa which is at stake here; the reputation of the whole Western society is on trial for proof of its sincerity toward racial equality.

Vietnam: The Logic of Withdrawal

HOWARD ZINN

Mr. Zinn, a frequent Nation contributor, teaches courses in political theory and civil liberties at Boston University. This article will appear as a chapter in his forthcoming book on Vietnam, to be published by Beacon Press in March.

Senator Hickenlooper of Iowa was questioning George Kennan at the Senate Foreign Relations Committee hearings in early 1966:

HICKENLOOPER: Now, there are problems facing us and others. . . . How we disengage ourselves without losing a tremendous amount of face or position in various areas of the world.

KENNAN: Senator, I think precisely the question, the consideration that you have just raised, is the central one that we have to think about; and it seems to me, as I have said here, that a precipitate, sudden and unilateral withdrawal would not be warranted by circumstances now.

A bit later in the questioning:

HICKENLOOPER: Do you think the rather immediate withdrawal of the United States forces and our activity in South Vietnam from that country could be used effectively as a propaganda tool and weapon in Africa and in the emerging nations of Africa?

KENNAN: Senator, it would be a six months' sensation, but I dare say we would survive it in the end, and there would be another day. Things happen awfully fast on the international scene, and people's memories are very short. . . .

Kennan's testimony on the matter of withdrawal is important because it is representative of a large body of influential opinion which says flatly we must not withdraw, but then cannot really give persuasive reasons why we should not. Prestige, Kennan says, is the "central question" if we withdraw, but then he adds that it would be a "six months' sensation" and "we would survive it in the end."

In Triumph or Tragedy, Richard Goodwin argues that withdrawal "would damage the confidence of all Asian nations, and of many other nations, in the willingness and the ability of the United States to protect them against attack." But it seems that most Asians and "many other nations" disagree completely with Goodwin; they would like us to leave Vietnam. And one can readily see why: we are "protecting" Vietnam by killing its people and destroying its land. Who else would want such protection?

Toward the end of his book, Goodwin makes an odd statement. He says: "In the South we have no choice but to continue the war. We are under attack and withdrawal is impossible and unwise." Are we not "under attack" because we are there, and is it not true that if we withdrew we would no longer be under attack?

General Gavin, who preceded Kennan as a major witness before the Fulbright committee, had an exchange with Sen. Frank Church of Idaho:

CHURCH: Now, if we had not intervened in the interim

since . . . and if we had not made the pledges that have been made to the Saigon government, and committed American presence and prestige there; in other words, if you were again faced with the same question . . . would you still be of the same opinion that the vital security interests of the United States from a military standpoint do not require the deployment of American troops in Indo-China?

GAVIN: Yes, sir. I would say so. "Vital" is the key word there.

It turns out that a remarkable number of high-placed officials agree that the United States should never have become involved in military intervention in Vietnam. But now that we have done so, they feel an important matter of "prestige" is involved. For instance, in a roundup of opinion in the Senate which New York Times reporter E. W. Kenworthy made in the summer of 1965, he found that "many of these silent Senators" told reporters off the record that they wished the United States "had never gone into Vietnam; they would like to get out, even at the cost of a political compromise amounting to defeat, but they will not advocate military withdrawal under fire."

We are dealing here with an odd logic: that it was wrong for the United States to get involved in the first place, because Vietnam is simply not "vital" for American security, but that we must not withdraw from a move that was both wrong and costly because now our "prestige" is involved. This must mean that the stake in prestige is enormously important. It was so important to Sen. Frank Church that when Gavin said he still felt no vital United States interests were at stake, Church immediately said:

I wanted to get that on the record, General, because there has been so much discussion of withdrawal, and I do not know anyone around this table, certainly no member of the Foreign Relations Committee, that has advocated a withdrawal . . . under the present circumstances . . . in Vietnam. But . . . we have made a very great commitment of American prestige and a very solemn political commitment that has to be thrown into the balance. . . .

Not one member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee would advocate withdrawal, even those as critical of United States policy as Fulbright, Morse, Church, Gore and Clark. The "solemn political commitment" to General Ky could hardly be considered more solemn than the nation's commitment to the Geneva Accords, to the United Nations Charter, to the Constitution of the United States, all of which have been ignored by United States policy in Vietnam. What is left is "prestige," and it must be that even for the Senators criticizing the Administration this weighed so heavily in "the balance" Church spoke of that none would call for withdrawal. The factor of "prestige" would then have to outweigh all else that stemmed from the admitted original error of engagement in Vietnam: billions of dollars, thousands of lives, and also untold dollars, lives and dangers in the future.

To balance all that the prestige factor would need to be of overwhelming significance. Let us see.

Kennan himself, in his testimony, talked about "the damage being done to the feelings entertained for us by the Japanese people" by the present policy, and said "the confidence and good disposition of the Japanese is the greatest asset we have had and the greatest asset we could have in East Asia." Does not the loss of United States prestige in Japan—"the greatest asset . . . in East Asia"—rank at least equal to the "six months' sensation" that Kennan said would be the cost of our withdrawal? And if to Japan we add Great Britain, France, indeed, most of Western Europe, as well as Africa and Latin America, where our prestige has suffered heavy reverses as a result of the Vietnamese policy, does it not seem likely that the result of withdrawal would be a net gain in prestige?

History does not show that a nation which liquidates a bad venture suffers a serious loss of prestige where it can compensate in other ways. Proud, powerful England surrendered to the ragtag thirteen American colonies, removed its armed forces ignominiously, and did not suffer for it. More recently, and more pertinently, France moved out voluntarily from Algeria and from Indo-China; today it has more prestige than ever before. The Soviet Union pulled its missiles out of Cuba; its prestige has not suffered, and many people who feared World War III was coming feel a certain gratitude for its prudence. Hans Morgenthau, who has spent a good part of his scholarly career analyzing international relations and who made his reputation as a hardheaded "realist," not as an "idealist," has written: "Is it really a boon to the prestige of the most powerful nation on earth to be bogged down in a war which it is neither able to win nor can afford to lose? This is the real issue which is presented by the argument of prestige."

So far I have been talking only about prestige as a flat, one-dimensional quantity. But more important is its quality. There is a kind of prestige this nation should not worry about losing—that which is attached to sheer power, to victory by force of arms, devoid of moral content. Which is more terrible: to have people in the world say that the United States withdrew from an untenable situation, or to have it said, as is now being said everywhere, that the United States is acting foolishly and immorally in Vietnam?

For George Kennan, there is no vital reason for the United States to stay in Vietnam, even knowing its withdrawal would probably lead to a Communist-dominated Vietnam, except for prestige. As he told the committee:

If it were not for the considerations of prestige that arise precisely out of our present involvement, even a situation in which South Vietnam was controlled exclusively by the Vietcong, while regrettable and no doubt morally unwarranted, would not, in my opinion, present dangers great enough to justify our direct military intervention.

Vow of poverty

Abu, London: Ben Roth

And if, upon examination, this "prestige" turns out to be empty (using Kennan's own example of Japan, plus what else we know), there is hardly anything left to support our "direct military intervention."

Then why, instead of simply urging immediate withdrawal, do Kennan, Gavin and Morgenthau advance the "enclave" theory: that United States forces should stop bombing and retire to a few strong positions on the coast? All of them, not believing that a United States presence in Vietnam is vital, are really suggesting this as a halfway step to withdrawal. The presumption is that holding on to enclaves would also hold on to a bit of prestige, and unlike "precipitate, sudden, unilateral" withdrawal, would give us time to negotiate our way out of Vietnam.

This proposal, however, comes too late in the history of the conflict in Vietnam. By now, the war against the Vietcong is mainly an American war; by September, 1966, United States forces were larger than the regular forces of the Ky government. With American bombings ended and troops withdrawn the Saigon government would collapse. Would it serve American "prestige" to stand by in enclaves while the Ky government fell apart to be replaced by a government which—whether Buddhist-neutralist or Vietcong—would ask or tell the United States to leave?

It would be far less ignominious for the United States to decide to leave on its own—before it is asked by a new government in South Vietnam. Speedy withdrawal need not be shameful; this is not a Dunkirk situation where decimated troops, harassed on ground and air, scramble into boats and flee. The United States controls the air, the ports, the sea; it can make the most graceful, the most majestic withdrawal in history. Of course it could not do this in a day or a week; it would need to pull its troops from the interior to the coast (so that temporarily there would be something like "enclaves"), and then transport them away from Vietnam as quickly as ships and planes could carry them.

The enclave proposal comes too late in another sense. The supposition is that United States troops could be concentrated in enclaves while negotiations proceeded, at the end of which they would come home. But what would be the point of this? At one time, it might have been argued that this would create the show of force on the spot which would enable the United States to negotiate from a position of some strength. But this implies there is something to negotiate for. If there once was, that time is past. Earlier in the war, the National Liberation Front might possibly have settled for some solution less than a dominant position in South Vietnam. For instance, right after Diem's assassination in November, 1963 (according to The New York Times and the Manchester Guardian, and cited in the American Friends Service Committee's Peace in Vietnam), Hanoi was willing to discuss a coalition, neutralist government in South Vietnam. But at that time Rusk turned down a French proposal for a neutral, independent South Vietnam, and the following July the United States rejected a suggestion by U Thant, accepted by France, the USSR, Peking and Hanoi, to reconvene the Geneva Conference. On July 24, 1964, responding to de Gaulle's plea to reconvene at Geneva, President Johnson told the press: "We do not believe in conferences called to ratify terror, so our policy is unchanged." (See Schurmann, et al., The Politics of Escalation in Vietnam.) By April, 1965, the negotiating position of Hanoi had become hardened into four points which included settling Vietnamese affairs "in accordance with the program of the National Liberation Front."

It is an old story in the history of rebellion. The American colonists would have been ready to accept some solution less than independence in early 1775, but by January, 1776, they were committed to no less than independence. Negroes in Montgomery, Ala., were ready at one point in the 1955 campaign on bus desegregation to accept merely a modified form of desegregation; but by the time their movement had crystallized, they would accept nothing less than total integration. Richard Goodwin points (in Triumph or Tragedy) to the increasing militancy of the other side, despite our ferocious bombing, and says:

We cannot know the will of men we do not understand. From Thermopylae to the Japanese-infested islands of the Pacific and Hitler's Berlin bunker, history is full of individuals and fighting forces who chose to fight against impossible odds and accept certain death.

Goodwin points to the dilemma of negotiations at this stage: the Vietcong will not accept any settlement that does not give them "a role in the political life of the country"; and at the same time, "it is unlikely we will permit any government to come to power which would inflict on us what some would see as the 'humiliation' of requesting our withdrawal."

By now, the Vietcong (and their friends in the North) have sacrificed too much to settle for anything less than a South Vietnam in which the NLF plays the major role, and from which United States troops completely withdraw. And if this is the only possible successful outcome of negotiations with a determined revolutionary foe, what is the point of negotiating? It might be argued that such a settlement might be made in effect, but tied with enough pretty bows and frills to make it look as if the United States had gained something from it. The world will hardly be deceived; the deception will last a short time, and there will be a much longer time—no matter what we do—for other countries to contemplate the fact that the United States had, whatever the niceties, departed from Vietnam.

True, there are certain developments to be hoped for when the present government and its American military support are gone. But none of these—except one—depends on the presence of United States soldiers. That one positive thing which the United States can do, as it departs, is to take with it those government officials, army officers and others who fear for their lives when a new government comes in. These people could be resettled in any of a dozen places. Are we required to stay in Vietnam, as some have suggested, in order to "meet our pledges" to the present officialdom, when this seems to require killing their fellow countrymen in large numbers? Surely our job is not to go around the world protecting semi-feudal dictatorships from the wrath of revolutionaries. It is a historical fact that revolutionaries, after victory, are merciless with those of the old regime. After World War II, Frenchmen executed—without benefit of trial—thousands of former Nazi collaborators. (We might note that the United States Government, which seems very concerned with what might happen to Vietnamese officials, was silent when 250,000 Indonesians, said to be Communists, were massacred.) With a bit of inconvenience, we can save many of those in Vietnam who are in danger.

The other desirable developments cannot be guaranteed, indeed can only be thwarted, by United States military presence. One of these is the establishment of a government in which not only the NLF but Buddhist, Montagnard and other elements play a role. This we will have to leave to the Buddhists and others to work for; they are quite militant and capable of pressing for their rights. The United States cannot negotiate, for any future component of government in South Vietnam, a strength which does not exist. If it does exist, then the Vietnamese must negotiate it for themselves. The presence of the United States can only distort the true balance of forces, and only a settlement which represents this balance can be stable.

What was fundamentally wrong with the Geneva Agreements was that the great powers dominated it and falsified the real relationship of forces. All the North and half the South were under Vietminh control, and the division of the country into two equal parts was bound to fail. Not only the United States but also the Soviet Union and the Republic of China were responsible for this development, because their own national ambitions required a peaceful settlement, even at the expense of the Vietminh. Neither communism nor capitalism, it seems, can be depended on to look out for the interests of other nations.

We say we want economic well-being for Vietnam. But this, too, is more likely to be hurt than helped by our military occupation. We can be quite sure that an independent South Vietnam, first alone and then in union with the North, will engage in the kind of economic experimentation and development that Communist countries in different parts of the world have done, and quite successfully. This is part of the modernization process that other, non-Communist nations of Asia and Africa are going through. It will be hard, progress will be uneven, and there will be sacrifices, unjustly distributed perhaps. But that is how it was in the West in its period of swift industrial growth.

What else would we presumably like to get out of staying and negotiating: political freedom? This is hard to come by in any part of the economically undeveloped world, whether Communist or non-Communist. We have not been very successful in developing it in those parts of the world dominated by the United States, though we fondly include them in "the free world." Vietnam will probably have to go through a long evolutionary struggle for freedom, as have most countries in the world, whether Communist or not.

Rius-Politica, Mexico: Ben Roth

There is a good deal of evidence to show that political liberty is related to economic security. As nations grow less desperate in the struggle for necessities, as education spreads, as young people speak out, society becomes more open; this has been happening in the Soviet Union and in Eastern Europe. It means that the best way we can show our concern for both the economic well-being and the political freedom of the Vietnamese is to take the billions that have gone for death and turn them to the service of life. We should offer several billions in economic aid to North and South Vietnam, with no strings attached; or, better still, we can put that money into a UN fund which will then go to Vietnam under international sponsorship.

A United States military presence is a danger to the Vietnamese and to us. Its withdrawal is neither "abdication of responsibility" nor "isolationism." Our bombing and shooting are irresponsible. In the future, we can show our responsibility by giving economic aid, when invited. We can be isolationist in the military sense; we can be internationalist in the economic and cultural fields.

The United States, thus, cannot gain anything for Vietnam by negotiating, and it should not gain anything for itself. Since this country does not belong in Vietnam it has no moral basis for negotiating any status for itself—certainly not military bases or troops; Vietnam has had enough of that.

There is something intrinsically wrong in the idea that the United States should participate in negotiations to decide the future of Vietnam. We are an outside power, and the fact that we have inundated the country with combat soldiers does not thereby give us any moral right to decide its fate. Perhaps might makes right, as a historical fact, but it should not make right; and it is the duty of citizens to assert the "shoulds," however statesmen behave.

This is true also for China, the Soviet Union, England and all other great powers. To have the future of Vietnam decided by these outside parties at an international conference is as much a violation of self-determination as was the settlement of Czechoslovakia's fate by Hitler, Mussolini, Daladier and Chamberlain in 1938 at Munich. Whatever negotiation goes on should be among the Vietnamese themselves, each group negotiating from its own position of strength, undistorted by the strength of the great powers. This would give the present government virtually no voice in the future of the country, because it has—without United States backing—virtually no strength. It would give the Buddhist groups an important voice because they represent significant numbers of people, whose support any future government must have. And it would undoubtedly give the National Liberation Front the major voice. (In September, 1966, the NLF reasserted its willingness to work with other Vietnamese groups in a future government, and to desist from reprisals against former foes. This has been a basic part of its program, as Staughton Lynd and Tom Hayden point out in the book, The Other Side, reporting their trip to Hanoi.)

In this light, to ask whether the United States will be willing to negotiate with the Vietcong seems strange. Rather, the question is: should the Vietcong be willing to negotiate with the United States? From a standpoint of moral principle it should not; from the standpoint of military reality it may have to. But it is the oppressive power of our country which forces this violation of moral principle, and it is the duty of American citizens—whatever the reality of power—to try to bend the power of government toward what is right.

For the United States to withdraw unilaterally, leaving the negotiating to the various groups in Vietnam, would avoid the present impasse over negotiations. This impasse is founded on a set of psychological realities which protract the war. The NLF, imbued with the spirit of patriots driving off an invading army, is willing to continue its guerrilla tactics until the United States is worn down. Besides, the Geneva experience taught it to distrust international agreements; it is confident of its skill in the jungles of Vietnam, not so confident it can outmaneuver great powers at conference tables.

To wait until all of the sensitive and stubborn elements are fitted together in that intricate mechanism of negotiation—the NLF, its sympathizers and advisers in Hanoi, the split personalities of the Johnson Administration, plus its client government in Saigon—is to consign thousands more each month to injury or death. Does it really absolve us of guilt to say that “they” won’t talk with us, and so we must continue killing? Does “their” stubbornness end our responsibility? No actor in this complex situation has more freedom to act, has less to lose by so acting, has greater resources to fall back on, than the United States. The sanity of unilateral withdrawal is that it makes the end of the war independent of anyone’s consent but our own. It is clean-cut, it is swift, it is right.

Some say that the Administration, even if it decided on such a move, could not do it, because it is not feasible “politically”; that is, the American public would not accept it. According to this argument, the “prestige” that everyone talks about our losing by withdrawal is really prestige at home.

But the argument is feeble. The Johnson Administration has not gained prestige from its Vietnamese actions. The national polls show that the public has gradually, steadily, lost faith in this Administration. In September, 1966, less than half of those polled throughout the country voiced support for the Administration’s Vietnamese policy. It is true that the polls do not show a substantial number of Americans in favor of withdrawal. But it is also true that most Americans are tired of the war and wish we would get out, one way or another. Many think this is best done by military escalation; others by de-escalation; but the idea of ending the war is the most common feeling.

Withdrawal has not drawn large support, because it has not been put forward either by the Administration or by its most prominent critics. And so the public has been forced to choose within a limited set of respectable alternatives. If the Administration were to advance a new alternative, it would soon gain the respectability that any proposal gets which is made by the leaders of government.

It may be sad to note, but the American public (and probably any public anywhere) is extremely changeable and open to suggestion, especially when the suggestion comes from above. When Woodrow Wilson said the

Abu, Tribune (London): Ben Roth

United States was too proud to fight in World War I, the public went along. When he then said the United States must fight in World War I, the public again went along. FDR said he would keep the nation out of war and was re-elected. He took aggressive steps toward the Axis and we became involved in the war; he was re-elected again. When Truman got us into the Korean War, the American public supported him. When Eisenhower got us out, the public was even more enthusiastic.

The President is the most powerful molder of national opinion; he has access to television, radio, the press. Everything he says carries the weight of tradition and patriotism with it—even when he changes his policy, as so many Presidents have done in the past. Political sociologist Seymour Lipset (in Transaction, September-October, 1966, “The President, the Polls and Vietnam”) analyzed the national poll results: “Though most Americans are willing to keep fighting in Vietnam, they clearly would prefer not to be there and are anxious and willing to turn over the responsibility to someone else. . . . The President makes opinion, he does not follow it.”

The memory of the public is short; it takes little time to adjust to new realities. It accepted American toughness toward the Soviet Union. It also accepted American agreements with the Soviet Union on nuclear testing. The President has it within his power to make a policy politically feasible; the nation tends to rally around him, especially in foreign affairs, whatever his policy is. We must remember, too, that President Johnson, running on a platform of peace in Vietnam, defeated Goldwater by an overwhelming majority when Goldwater was asking military escalation in Vietnam. That constituency for peace still exists, waiting for Johnson to give the word.

Of course it takes courage to change a policy, to withdraw suddenly from a situation in which one has become more and more involved. It takes courage to fight off the snipers, the critics, the militarists, the fanatics. It requires either open or implied admission of error. But this is what genuine leadership is.

President Johnson has repeatedly asked his critics: "what do you suggest?" I am suggesting that the President should appear on national television one evening, announcing beforehand that he will make a major policy speech on Vietnam. If he goes before the nation, announces the withdrawal of American military forces from Vietnam, and states cogently, clearly, the reasons for this withdrawal, the American people will unite behind him, the editorials of support will blossom everywhere, and the angry cries of the fanatics will be drowned in an immense and overwhelming national sigh of relief.

Many critics of our policy, who know very well that the United States should leave Vietnam, do not want to ask immediate and unilateral withdrawal. That is not because they find powerful reasons against it, but because it is not a good "tactic," not "popular," not acceptable to the President and those working with him.

I believe this reasoning is based on a false notion of how political decisions are made—the notion that citizens must directly persuade the President by the soundness of their arguments. This makes two assumptions which I think are unfounded. One is that the interests of the citizens and the President are the same, so that if they both think straight they will be led to the same conclusions. Robert Michels long ago made the classic case for the fact that once we elect our representatives, they develop interests of their own; the history of human misery under government does much to support his view.

The other assumption is that the President is a rational being who can be persuaded by rational arguments. We have seen—and our recent foreign policy illustrates it—how our highest officials have become the victims of myths which they themselves help to perpetuate.

The so-called "realists" who urge us to speak softly and so persuade the President are working against the reality, which is that the President responds to self-interest rather than to rational argument. In a country where political power passes easily from one major party to another, even a minority can create a new self-interest for the President. But this cannot be done by those who dilute their passion and say only half of what they believe. The critics must begin to speak their full minds, to declare boldly what the logic of their criticism demands: that the U.S. is doing no good in Vietnam, that it is doing a frightful amount of harm, that it should immediately withdraw.

RETIREMENT BENEFITS

PENSION PLANS ON THIN ICE

ANTHONY PRISENDORF

Mr. Prisendorf is a reporter on the New York Post.

Private pension plans—those set up by employers for their personnel—are meant to be a vital element in achieving "the right to a meaningful retirement," as President Johnson said not long ago when he proclaimed the start of "a great new era for older Americans." But the sad truth of the matter is that because so many pension plans fail, only about 40 per cent of the 25 million nonagricultural workers enrolled in these plans will actually receive the cash benefits to which they are entitled. What this means in terms of the country's total work force of 80 million is that only one out of every eight wage earners can count on retirement benefits to supplement social security.

These arresting percentages, based on the findings of the Internal Revenue Service and the Department of Labor, make it apparent that the whole nation has a major stake in the future of private pension plans. Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz emphasized this point early in his testimony last August before a hearing of the Senate Finance Committee that was exploring ways to protect employees' pension rights. "By 1980," Wirtz said, "coverage of these plans is expected to increase from the approximately 25 million employees now covered to about 42 million. Over the same period, the present $85 billion held in these funds will probably grow to $225 billion. I can only point out that these are figures of magnitude which in my judgment warrant the country's most serious attention to this problem."

Even more pertinent to every taxpayer is the fact that the federal government indirectly subsidizes the nation's 34,000 private pension plans by more than $1 billion a year. The $6 billion that corporations contribute annually to these plans is tax-deductible as a business expense, a concession granted by the government to stimulate the continued growth of the plans. And employees who receive retirement benefits do not pay taxes on them until they begin to draw them, usually when their incomes and consequently their tax rates are lower.

The basic flaw of the plans is that they do not afford those covered adequate protection against the loss of their accrued benefits. Employers customarily reserve the right to discontinue contributions at any time, and do not assume contractual liability to make up the difference if the assets are insufficient to pay the benefits. If the plan is terminated for any reason, the employer has no further legal obligation to contribute to the fund.

And terminations occur in alarming numbers. Although neither the Internal Revenue Service nor the Department of Labor can say exactly why, they do know that since 1954, 4,243 private pension plans, covering 183,699 workers, were discontinued. The classic illustration of what can happen occurred in 1964 when the Studebaker Corp. closed its South Bend, Ind., plant after twenty years. Through a negotiated agreement with the United Automobile Workers, the company had paid steadily into the pension plan for the previous fourteen years, amassing $25 million for benefits. But 10,500 workers were waiting to lay claim to that fund. Consequently, 3,600 who had already retired or had reached retirement age, in this case, 60, were given first priority. Then, 4,000 employees who were between the ages of 40 and 59 and had worked for Studebaker for at least ten years, were given 15 per cent of their rightful benefits. The remaining 2,900 workers received nothing.

Aroused by the impact the Studebaker plant closing had on the economic well-being of South Bend, Sen. Vance Hartke, an Indiana Democrat, introduced bills in August, 1963, and again in March of the following year that would have provided for federal insurance of private pension plans, the insurance to be self-supporting and at no cost to the public. It would guarantee workers with vested rights in plans that they would receive up to $500 a month if the plan lapsed by the bankruptcy, closing or merger of the company, the most common causes of terminations. Premiums for the insurance would be paid by the corporations; the rates, determined by the Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, would be based on the ratio of assets to liabilities in each plan. To assure maximum participation in the insurance program, the bill would have amended the Internal Revenue Code so that only those corporations subscribing to the insurance could qualify for favorable tax treatment.

In tepid response to Senator Hartke's persistent legislative efforts, Sen. Russell B. Long, a Louisiana Democrat and chairman of the powerful Senate Finance Committee, held a hearing on August 15, 1966, for "exploratory" purposes. The committee called more than fifty witnesses, from government agencies, major corporations and organized labor. From the outset of the hearings, it was evident what course of action the Johnson Administration had charted for the bill. In his opening remarks, Senator Long acknowledged that pension plan "shutdowns" raise serious questions. The Hartke bill, he then said, "does not get at these issues directly, but it does present a possible approach, which is appropriate to explore, to assure that workers actually get the pension benefits they earn." The bill expired with the 89th Congress, but Senator Hartke promises "to keep the issue alive" by offering another bill in the present 90th Congress.

Even before Senator Hartke had recognized the need for pension plan reforms, President Kennedy had taken the initiative. On March 28, 1962, he created a seven-member Cabinet committee, headed by Secretary Wirtz, to "review legislation and administrative practices relating to [private pension] programs." In its January, 1965, report to President Johnson, the committee concluded that while social security "will continue to be the nation's basic instrument for assuring reasonably adequate retirement incomes to workers, their widows and dependents," private pension plans should continue as "a major element in the nation's total retirement security program." It went on to say that the social purposes served by private pension plans constitute the "basic justification" for continued indirect public subsidy through favorable tax treatment.

The Cabinet committee made two recommendations of potentially far-reaching consequences. It said that the minimum standards of funding (accumulating sufficient reserves to assure beneficiaries that they will get what they have been promised) should be raised so that contributions to these plans "realistically relate" to the indicated benefits. In this connection, the committee thought that the overall funding process should be subject to constant review by the Internal Revenue Service. Closer scrutiny, it felt, would minimize the risk of mismanagement, and would further discourage "overfunding," a technique corporations use to abuse tax concessions.

The second, and perhaps more important, recommendation concerned vesting—a legally binding promise to pay a worker, upon retirement, benefits that correspond to his length of service. The procedure is also intended to protect employees who have built up substantial "credits" in a pension plan, but who may leave the company before retirement age. The Cabinet committee conceded that any form of benefit—pension or seniority—tends to reduce labor mobility "by tying workers to a particular employer." Nonetheless, it felt that pension plans that lack vesting provisions, or adopt unrealistic vesting criteria, have an even more deleterious effect on the labor force for three major reasons: skilled workers are tied to a declining industry longer than the prevailing job market requires; employees are inhibited from shifting to other companies, thereby curtailing their usefulness and earning power; and laid-off workers are discouraged from seeking new fields as long as they still hope to return to their former jobs and their accrued pension rights.

Vesting, as it exists today, is not geared to the facts of employment. When the concept was advanced in 1875, employers saw it as an effective lure to reduce the mobility of the country's labor force during Reconstruction. Today, however, technological advancements in manufacturing are displacing workers faster than they can meet the 19th century qualifications for vesting. Further, the cancellation of one relatively minor defense contract can utterly disrupt the livelihood of thousands of workers and their families. In the two-thirds of the private pension plans that offer some form of vesting, to qualify for the first level, an employee must have accumulated ten, fifteen, or even twenty years' service, and must have reached the age of 40, 45, or in some cases, 50. Aware that these arbitrary conditions are no longer practical, the Cabinet committee recommended compulsory, uniform vesting requirements—50 per cent vesting after fifteen years, full vesting after twenty, with no age qualification; it urged further that only plans that adopt these conditions be considered eligible for tax concessions. To offset anticipated objections from corporations that such recommendations would be too costly, the committee said that eliminating the age requirement would have only a slight effect on the cost of a pension plan "since relatively few workers withdrawing before age 40 are apt to have much more than fifteen years' service."

Even so, the vesting recommendations came under strong attack, surprisingly enough, from the President's Advisory Committee on Labor-Management Policy, composed of men prominent in the fields of labor, management and public affairs. This group agreed that vesting is "desirable," but thought it should not be mandatory or a condition for tax concessions. "A vesting requirement may unduly burden the maintenance of existing plans or hamper the establishment of new plans, and may interfere with decisions regarding the allocation of resources available for pension benefits."

Despite the committee's recommendations, now two years old, and Senator Hartke's legislative efforts to bring about pension plan reform, the only discernible action on the part of the Administration—beyond the hearing on the Hartke bill before the Senate Finance Committee—has been a joint study now being conducted by the Department of Labor and the Internal Revenue Service to determine why so many plans fail. The Hartke bill's dismal record thus far may be due, at least in part, to the ill will that the President reportedly bears toward the Indiana Senator. One of the President's protégés, Senator Hartke incurred Johnson's wrath by breaking ranks and joining the Senate's "Peace Bloc" on Vietnam. In their book, Lyndon B. Johnson: The Exercise of Power, Rowland Evans and Robert Novak give an ample illustration of the President's sentiments: "When another Democratic Senator delivered a speech on Vietnam, Johnson telephoned to congratulate him on a constructive suggestion, and gratuitously remarked that he was 'not like that obscenity Hartke.'"

According to Merton C. Bernstein, professor of law at Ohio State University, President Johnson "has pussy-footed on pensions" and has treated the Cabinet committee's report "as if it were an orphan" because the Administration has been unwilling "to do battle without supporting troops." Organized labor, "the logical interest group to back such proposals, is missing," Professor Bernstein contends. A consultant to the departments of Labor, HEW and the Treasury, as well as counsel during the 86th Congress to a Senate subcommittee on railroad retirements, he is well qualified to make such an assessment. [See Bernstein: "The Pension Mirage," The Nation, June 15, 1964.] In a speech last August before the American Risk and Insurance Association, Bernstein said that organized labor has been reluctant to press for pension plan reform because "the institutional interests of some powerful unions are in conflict with the retirement security interests of many of their members." Moreover, Bernstein maintains, several unions with weak plans do not want to allocate the resources that pension reform would require. As a result, he said, the opposition to the Cabinet committee recommendations from "some important unions . . . leads the AFL-CIO not to press for either the Cabinet report or other pension reform." However, at its December, 1965, convention, the AFL-CIO did adopt a policy resolution which reads: "We renew our demand for the enactment of pension [insurance] legislation. We call upon the appropriate congressional committee to begin hearings and to report a measure to afford full protection to workers against the catastrophe of the loss of accumulated pension credits."

Although the Hartke bill was introduced while the Cabinet committee was conducting its study, there is no specific reference to the bill in the report. But the committee did make a brief comment on the general concept. While pension plan insurance "appears attractive" and is "worthy of serious study," the committee said, it raises a number of difficult questions, which the committee felt itself unqualified to answer: "Is a plan's termination an insurable risk? What types of termination could be included? Is experience available on which to set a premium? How would such an insurance program be administered?" To be consistent, representatives of HEW, the Labor Department, and the Treasury, which took part in the Cabinet committee study, recited these same questions at the Senate Finance Committee hearing to explain why they withheld endorsement of the Hartke bill.

Corporations, however, did not feel constrained to exercise caution or discretion. Without exception their officials criticized the bill as an un-American attempt to overturn the free enterprise system. Characteristic of this discourse was the statement of the United States Chamber of Commerce, which said the Hartke proposal created "a climate of uncertainty about a federal take-over of the voluntary pension plan system." The National Association of Manufacturers resorted to outright intimidation: "Any increase in cost resulting from unwarranted federal regulation . . . would inhibit the start of new plans, thereby depriving many employees of pension coverage."

Choosing to ignore the corporations' protests, Walter Reuther, president of the United Automobile Workers, admonished the Johnson Administration for insisting on exhaustive research before taking a stand on the Hartke bill. "Data collected will be of great value in implementation of a sound and effective program," he told the Senate committee members. "But the filling of every last data gap should not be allowed to become a basis for delaying responsible consideration and early action on the legislation here under discussion."

Private pension plans are an indispensable supplement to adequate retirement incomes that will fulfill President Johnson's rosy expectations for "older Americans." But the plans are riding for a fall, says Bernstein, unless those primarily responsible for their design—banks, employers, insurers and unions—"develop a broader conception of the role of private plans and recognize their responsibility to achieve their potential." The alternative, he warns, is "for private plans to take their place alongside the dodo bird and the dirigible, which simply could not adapt to changing circumstances."

Whenever Senator Hartke explains his pension insurance bill to his constituents, he compares its merits to those of the bank deposit insurance provided by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. It should be remembered that in 1907 William Jennings Bryan made an impassioned plea for this type of insurance, but his admonitions went unheeded by lawmakers until twenty-six years later, when the country was wallowing in the depths of the depression. "Those who do not remember the past," observed Santayana, "are condemned to relive it."

CALIFORNIA REVOLUTION 2

THE KNOWLEDGE BONANZA

MEL WAX

Mr. Wax is an urban affairs writer for the San Francisco Chronicle.

San Francisco

Outside California the state's seventy-eight junior colleges and eighteen state colleges make, perhaps, less of an academic, social and psychedelic splash than do the nine campuses and 87,000 students of the University of California. But within the state's tripartite system of higher education, established under the 1960 Master Plan for Higher Education, they loom very large indeed—and larger every year.

Right now, for example, nearly 600,000 full- and part-time students, ranging from overblown teenie-boppers to overaged grandmas, are enrolled in two-year junior colleges, and the number grows by more than 10 per cent a year. And 172,000 students in the four-year state colleges are studying everything from aeronautics to zoology. Some are heading for master's degrees; others for doctorates.

There is nothing like this, anywhere else in the world. If you're fortunate enough to be a Californian, you can now advance from kindergarten to doctor of philosophy in tuition-free public schools that are said to compare in quality with the best anywhere in the Western world. In quantity, there is no comparison at all.

But less than one week after Ronald Reagan was sworn in as governor, he was hung in effigy by the students of Fresno State College. He had recommended a 10 per cent cut in higher education budgets, and had added the suggestion that it might be a good idea for university and state college students to pay tuition. Students, educators, politicians, and even such stalwarts of conservatism as Republican regent Dorothy Buffum Chandler, of the powerful Los Angeles Times dynasty, were furious.

While California's sun-kissed students are charged no tuition, they do pay relatively modest "fees," and in junior colleges they also pay up to $10 a year for health services and parking privileges—the sine qua non of California life. In state colleges, annual fees range from $96 to $102, at the university—depending on the campus—they might be as much as $243 a year.

Louis H. Heilbron, state college trustee and former chairman of the State Board of Education, justifies the system:

Educators believe that, in the long run, California will suffer rather than benefit from any kind of tuition charge. The dollars spent on higher education usually come back multiplied in the form of increased tax contributions to the local federal and state governments after the student leaves the college or university campus.

While junior colleges are supported, for the most part, by local communities, state colleges operate on state funds, as does the University of California. For the eighteen state college campuses (four more will open soon), Chancellor Glenn S. Dumke asked $252.8 million in fiscal 1967-68. New state colleges, each of them expected to zoom to an enrollment of 20,000 students soon after their parking lots open and their pom-pom girls are chosen, cost $120 million apiece, about the price of a nuclear submarine.

Four of five California high school graduates live within commuting distance of a junior college. All they need to enroll is a high school diploma, and if they are 18 years old, they don't need even that. For the high school dropout, or the late educational bloomer, junior colleges offer salvation. Under the Master Plan, the university accepts the top 12.5 per cent of high school graduates in California; state colleges, the top 33⅓ per cent, and junior colleges take the rest.

Many junior college students later transfer to state colleges, and some make it to the University of California. During the first semester, transferees to the university score from .1 to .2 points lower than their new colleagues. Thereafter, academic performance is the same. This probably says a lot for the motivation of the students accepted by the university, and for the quality of junior college teachers.

The quality, personality and goals of state colleges vary. Some are strong in agriculture, others are urban-oriented. Some specialize in engineering and science, others in the arts and humanities. All told, they produce three-fourths of California's elementary and secondary school teachers. But they are not mass educational factories, as some of their critics insist.

At San Francisco State College, for example, students run their own Experimental College. They have a staff of eighty-five students and forty faculty. Paul Goodman, the noted critic of stereotyped education, was a visiting professor last year. Under this plan, more than 1,200 of San Francisco State's 18,400 students have participated in seminars ranging from "Cybernetics and LSD: A Study of the Application of Consciousness-Expanding Drugs to Technology," to "Revolutionary Capitalism" and "Conscientious Objection." And balancing these esoteric topics, seminars have dealt with such conventional subject matter as "Soviet Civilization" and "Human Growth and Development."

"I've been through the panty-raid period of student activity," said San Francisco State College President John Summerskill, commenting on the experimental college, "and visited campuses where the rah-rah spirit prevails, or where students are making direct attacks on authority as such.

"Here we have hundreds of students concerned with education, and I can't think of a better thing for them to be concerned about. The main business of the college is learning; that's what the taxpayers provide our salaries and buildings for."

Growth of the state colleges and junior colleges boomed in California following World War II. It thus parallels the state's spectacular population explosion, but, while the overall population of California is increasing by 38 per cent between 1960 and 1970, the college-age population will grow by 90 per cent. And the end is not in sight.

In 1921, there were seven teachers' colleges in the state, and this count remained steady until 1935, when they were officially designated "State Colleges." California State College at Los Angeles had 147 students when it opened in 1947, in skimpy, borrowed quarters on the Los Angeles City College campus. Ten years later it had moved to a lavish 97-acre spread and attracted 8,383 students. Today it has an enrollment of 20,000. California State College at Long Beach began in a rented apartment building in 1949, with a handful of students.

It moved to permanent facilities in 1954. Eleven years later it had an enrollment of 20,845. A new state college—they stretch from Humboldt State near the Oregon border to San Diego State on the Mexican border—is built every other year. From 1935 to 1953, enrollment in state colleges jumped from 8,230 to 41,000 full-time students. Four years later, it had doubled. Today's total of 172,000 is expected to reach 225,000 by the end of the decade, and Chancellor Dumke predicts that in 1981 there will be 300,000 students on twenty-five campuses at a budget of $500 million.

California junior colleges date from 1907, when an enlightened state legislature told high schools they could expand to include the first two years of college. None took advantage of this opportunity until Fresno City College was created in 1910, the second oldest American public junior college in continuous operation. (The oldest is Joliet Junior College, in Illinois.) The next year, Santa Barbara High School became a junior college and, by the time the United States was fighting in World War I, there were sixteen, with a total enrollment of 1,259.

After World War II, when everything big in California exploded into something bigger, junior colleges tried to become four-year colleges, and state colleges, universities. The pressures on the legislature were tremendous. In 1959, for instance, twenty-three bills were introduced on behalf of various communities wanting their own college or university. Higher education has become the status symbol for the insecure Westerner, proof that each mountain town or desert hamlet has achieved culture, or at least knows some place close by where it can be had for the asking.

The legislators then decided it was time to call a halt to the uncontrolled, unplanned mushrooming of higher education—no matter how offensive such a check might seem to ebullient Californians and to their faith in an unlimited horizon. A commission of eight top California educators, headed by Dr. Arthur G. Coons, president of Occidental College, was told to bring order out of the jealousies and internecine warfare that threatened to split the strata of California's education mountain.

In 1960, the commission drew up a plan that nobody completely endorsed. It called for separating state colleges from the State Board of Education, and giving them their own Board of State College Trustees, modeled on the university's Board of Regents. Junior colleges would remain with the State Board of Education.

Some thought state colleges should stay where they were; others favored a super board of education to ride herd on state colleges, junior colleges and the university. Finally, Gov. Edmund G. Brown called warring factions to his office and told them they had labored too hard and too long for a Master Plan to lose it in the end. "Let's make it the law." They did, by unanimous legislative endorsement. Looking back recently on his eight years as governor, Brown called it his proudest achievement.

The Master Plan decreed that the University of California should be empowered to teach all subjects, and be the primary research institution. It would be the source of doctorates, but a state college, in collaboration with a university campus, could work out a "joint doctorate" program.

The university was to have sole jurisdiction over education in law, medicine, veterinary medicine, dentistry and graduate courses in architecture. This, it was hoped, would concentrate teaching talent, and occasion a minimum duplication of expensive equipment.

State colleges were given jurisdiction in the liberal arts and sciences, plus such professions as teaching, engineering, social work and other disciplines, up to and including the master's degree, that had not been staked out for the University of California.

Junior colleges, under the plan, could offer two-year associate in arts degrees, and were given exclusive rights to terminal vocational education. They were also entrusted with the task of providing two years of general education at the college level for students planning to transfer to state colleges or to the university.

It was proposed that by 1975, 50,000 undergraduates who otherwise would enter state colleges or the university would be diverted to junior colleges for their freshman and sophomore years. Sixty per cent of the enrollment at state colleges and the university would then be upperclassmen. In 1965, for the first time, more than half the new state college students came from junior colleges. The ratio was lower at the university.

The Master Plan called on the state of California to pay 45 per cent of the annual operating costs of the junior colleges by 1975, freeing them to that degree from dependence on local property taxes. (The state, through a series of bond issues, has since helped junior colleges substantially with plant-expansion programs.)

The Master Plan for Higher Education in California has served as a model not only for other states but also for other nations. Great Britain sent a delegation to study it when the English were planning for expansion; so did France.

How well has the Master Plan worked? Better than expected, but not so well as it could. The statistics on California's knowledge bonanza are impressive, but the ultimate measure must be whether or not the educational program achieves the goals assigned to it.

In 1967, for the first time, junior colleges decreed that a "C" average would be required for graduation. As Thomas W. Braden, former president of the Board of Education, carefully explained, that doesn't mean a "get tough" policy for junior college students. Anybody failing to achieve a "C" average for three consecutive semesters is subject to dismissal, but he can be readmitted. "The junior college," said Paul Lawrence, head of the State Department of Education's Division of Higher Learning, "is a place of opportunity, so he can come back again and again."

But in Braden's view junior colleges are not fulfilling their role. "The weakness of the system is that, as it has grown in California, it has tended to neglect its role as a terminal institution for vocational preparation," Braden said. "It has done so for two reasons: First, the vocational role is expensive; second, it is unprestigious."

Braden, an Oceanside newspaper publisher, suggested that the state might set up a new and separate set of vocational colleges, supported by state rather than local funds. He made the same proposal to Governor Brown some time ago. It received passing notice in a campaign speech, but nothing has been heard of it since.

Prestige is a disease that afflicts state colleges as well as junior colleges. It is significant that almost every one of the seventy-eight junior colleges in California has dropped the offending word "junior" from its title. They are trying to build faculties of Ph.D.s, not auto mechanics. The state college system, with a faculty of some 10,000, also has recruiting problems. California must lure most of its college teachers from outside the state, and pay higher than average salaries. However, the professional status, the big federal research grants, the easier teaching loads go with university appointments, not with state college jobs.

Marc R. Tool, a professor of economics at Sacramento State College, was commissioned recently by the Academic Senate of the State College System to study the effect of the Master Plan upon these colleges. He has found, in a 200-page report, that they are "victims" of academic discrimination:

The Master Plan, by design and by interpretation, has become a vehicle through which the California State Colleges have been relegated to an inferior and subordinate position relative to the University of California.

Given the directive that each segment shall strive for excellence, the Master Plan has created a condition in which the State colleges cannot aspire to excellence because they are not provided with adequate financial means and the relevant policy options to make possible the achievement of excellence of which they are capable.

According to Professor Tool, the university gets 58 per cent of state support funds for 38 per cent of the students, while state colleges limp along with 42 per cent of the money for 62 per cent of the students. He contends that the university professor gets more pay, more sabbaticals, more secretarial and technical help, more research money, and a lighter teaching load than his state college counterpart.

Junior colleges make similar complaints. The Arthur D. Little Company, a private research firm, recently recommended that they be divorced from the State Board of Education and given their own chancellor, and their own bureaucracy, as are state colleges and the university.

Junior college faculty members consider themselves oppressed. A teacher at College of Marin, just north of San Francisco, complained that when he gave his students failing grades in English he was rebuked by his superiors on the ground that either his course was too difficult or he was grading too hard. The possibility that his students were not bright enough was not considered.

"If what they want is some kind of social welfare program to keep kids off the streets for two years after high school, O.K.," added his wife. "But let's be honest about it. Let's not call it a college. And let's use social workers for teachers."

The junior colleges, like state colleges, observe varying standards of excellence, and they have different missions. Some offer strong academic courses in general education, and are successful in producing transfer students for state colleges and the university. Others concentrate on terminal education, and still others on vocational training.

At one time, the ratio of academic and vocational programs in California junior colleges was half and half. Now the pendulum has swung heavily to the academic side. The new trend is typified by Foothill College, which has an extensive liberal arts curriculum. Less than ten years old, this campus in the foothills of the Santa Cruz Mountains of Northern California has more than 7,000 students on its magnificent 122 acres.

Foothill's thirty-six brick and redwood buildings, including an Olympic-sized swimming pool and a 1-acre library, and its sheltered, car-free pedestrian walks, give it an atmosphere of quiet, rural peace and isolation. Within a 1,000-seat auditorium, blessed with near-perfect acoustics, students learn the performing arts by performing them, and both students and nearby Los Altos residents enjoy guest performances of the San Francisco Symphony and other traveling artists. One of the great benefits of the state and junior college system in California is their intellectual and cultural impact on communities where they are located.

Foothill also has a 3,500-car parking lot, the essential ingredient for a community college that depends on commuters. There are no dormitories at Foothill, nor are there any at most junior colleges, or at many state colleges. Foothill puts heavy emphasis on liberal arts. But it also offers associates in arts degrees in data processing, electronics, industrial ceramics and other arcane specialties. Graduates frequently are snapped up at starting salaries of $900 a month.

Whatever its faults and problems, California characteristically and vigorously has launched a massive program of democratic higher education on a scale never before attempted by any state or nation. That there are shortcomings is not surprising. What is remarkable is the abounding optimism, the monumental scope and the high promise of the effort.

LETTERS (continued from page 162)

Union a single Yiddish school, a Yiddish newspaper, a Yiddish theatre, a Yiddish publishing house, as a means of demonstrating the response of Soviet Jews. And if the school is not filled to capacity, and if the newspaper is not oversubscribed, and the theatre is not sold out, if the supply of books is not exhausted—then we may be persuaded of the reality of alleged Jewish self-alienation. . . .

Absent this test, we challenge such unwarranted speculations as those of Mr. Werth, especially when deceptively decked out as hard fact. . . .

Phil Baum, Director Commission on International Affairs American Jewish Congress

Paris

DEAR SIR: Mr. Baum seems to suggest that I am speaking from hearsay, or on the basis of some casual visit to the Soviet Union. May I point out that I spent seven years there between 1941 and 1948, and have since gone there on several lengthy visits. I have met thousands of Russians and hundreds of Jews in the Soviet Union. I do not deny for a moment that there was officially whipped-up anti-Semitism in Russia during the last Stalin years; nor do I deny that there is some discrimination even now. There are very few Jewish generals in the army, very few Jews on the party's Central Committee, and Jews are entirely, or almost entirely, excluded from the Foreign Service. But in most other fields of activity they hold a prominent and honorable place.

I don't think it can be denied that the assimilationist tendencies are strong among the 80 per cent of Jews who, under the 1959 census, declared not Yiddish but Russian or Ukrainian to be their first (or only) language. Nevertheless, I agree that the situation continues to be anomalous, both as regards the Yiddish-speaking and the would-be assimilationist Jews.

But instead of making unrealistic proposals like Mr. Baum's, would it not be much more important to assume that Mr. Kosygin means what he says, and take steps to permit Jews wanting to leave the Soviet Union actually to do so? As far as I know, Kosygin's "pledge" is the first of its kind ever made by a top Soviet leader, at least in the last thirty years or more. I cannot make out whether Mr. Baum refuses to take Mr. Kosygin's pledge seriously, or whether he is simply not interested in it. And if not, why not? In any case, he does not mention it. Yet, assuming that there are many Jews who would like to leave Russia (and there seems little doubt about that as regards some of the "unassimilated" Jews), the Kosygin statement surely offers opportunities for action which should not be neglected by the major Jewish organizations outside Russia. I do not believe that Kosygin had not carefully considered in advance every word of his statement.

Alexander Werth

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Frost's Way: Making the Most of It

ROBERT FROST: The Early Years, 1874-1915. By Lawrance Thompson. Holt, Rinehart and Winston. 641 pp. $12.50.

QUENTIN ANDERSON

Mr. Anderson teaches English at Columbia University and this year is visiting professor at the University of Sussex, England.

The Frost I loved as an adolescent disappeared down a corduroy road laid with honorary degrees. It was vulgar of me not to remember that the poems were still there—even though they ran counter to the grain of impersonal modernism. But my feeling that the man was somehow indispensable to the poems was right, though inarticulate. (Little I cared that Eliot was a churchwarden!) And the fuss about Frost was embarrassing in the later years. Zealous middle-brow devotion lapped the hermit crab, and made a final shell for him against his lifelong terror of abandonment. The poems seemed to have entered the civil service; their character and their genesis were accidentally obscured. Lawrance Thompson's Frost Letters (1964) had an editorial acerbity which cut through much of the guff, and the letters themselves had enough of Frost's wit, charm, slovenliness, meanness, fidelity to his powers, to make an image of sorts. They also revealed a habit of involvement with persons of insufficient character, on whom he turned savagely when they began to tug at him for narcissistic supplies. But the poems were those of a man in a terrible fix, and the letters, increasingly and gracefully public in later years, hid the fix.

This first volume of a two-volume biography quickly tells us what armed Thompson against the obvious guff; the story he had to tell is a story of agonizing personal extremity that, once you have grasped it, blows away popular pieties. Thompson has made it possible—within limits I'll note—to understand Frost. It ought to be explained that this biography is said to be an instrument to play one's own Frost upon. I quote the beginning of the headnote to the index:

NAMES, PLACES, DATES are correlated with topics, interpretations, conclusions—all previously deployed on three separate levels: Introduction, Central Narrative, Notes. Because this Index thus makes available some outlines, configurations, summaries, which are not explicitly given elsewhere, it amounts to a fourth level of ordering.

Readers are particularly invited to browse through the Robert Frost entries under the forty-three topical subheads. . . .

The internal limitation is that the "Central Narrative" lacks the crispness of the editorial work on the Letters, or the Introduction and Notes of this book. Thompson lived over twenty-five years of his life as Frost's official biographer. The tone of their conversations appears to have gotten spilled on his narrative. The laxity of the prose allows of such phrasings as "mother's heartfelt grief," or "deeply ingrained fears," or "memorable and panoramic views," or "thought-felt justification," and of this sentence: "Under the circumstances, it was fortunate for him that he had inherited from his grieving mother the balancing instinct for enjoying the comic aspects of life." Such sentences lie like logs across the path of Thompson's story. But the story does get told: Frost lived a desperate life in his formative years, and he, quite as much as Emily Dickinson, literally saved himself with poetry.

I see two external limitations as well. To cover the years 1874-1915, as Thompson does in this volume, is to show what made Frost Frost, and to encounter enough of his mature accomplishment to make the account dangerously complete. Taking Thompson's collection of Frost's letters for granted, I'm not sure I want to know any more about Frost. I can read the later poetry for myself, and as for the honorary degrees, I've been there before. The second bother comes later and has to do with the literary biography as a kind. Meanwhile, what is the essential part of Thompson's account?

The forty-three topical subheads under "Robert Frost" in the index do not include "Mother," but that is what they spell. If I understand the two careful sentences in the book, Frost slept with his mother from the time of his father's death when he was 11 until he was 16; and thereafter, until his marriage at the age of 21, on a cot in her room. His father, a Harvard graduate of 1872, who had had Copperhead sympathies, moved to San Francisco from the cotton mill town of Lawrence, Mass., to which the family returned after his death, and was a graduate of the same high school in which Frost won his first distinction as a poet and, with his future wife, co-valedictorian. (Frost remembered his father, a newspaper man and minor figure in Democratic politics, as a poor speaker.)

Frost's father, often drunken and violent, had had sharp difficulties with his Scotch wife, who was older, a bit fey and withdrawn, a devout Swedenborgian. She brought her children up on tales of moral heroism. Mrs. Frost returned to schoolteaching after she was widowed, and one of the attempts her son made to fulfill the emotional demands of his relationship to her consisted in leaving Dartmouth to replace her in a class infested by bullies, whom he, as a beginning teacher, beat into submission. Thompson notes that his mother could easily have been transferred without her son's intervention. Frost's sister was queer as a child and always at odds with him. She became insane in middle age.

Frost had an absolute need to be enfolded—and, of course, a bitter resentment at being enfolded. Tugging at apron strings and reaching behind to be sure they were securely knotted was his pattern until he discovered the possibility of anchoring himself in poetry. Thompson says that his speech had been markedly cultivated until the period in Derry when he began to take on Yankeeisms; the wryness and the spiritual drawl were lightning rods to draw off the terror of being an identifiable husband, father, farmer. When—earlier—his high school lover refused to marry him until she had finished college, he made a symbolic plunge into what he feared most, the darkness—of Virginia's Great Dismal Swamp. He was beset by a fear of abandonment, and prone to alarm that his wife would think he had abandoned her when he made a daylong excursion. In one of his letters to Louis Untermeyer, Frost makes this apology to account for a difference that had arisen between them: "I was once gone back on cruelly though deservedly and ever since I have once in so often had one of these mad paroxysms of unbelief in human faithfulness."

Frost staggered and almost went down in the crucial years just before and during his life on the farm at Derry. He moved, one imagines, back and forth between asking more of a woman than any woman can give, and demanding of himself a heroism, an enfathering, more complete than the world affords. The poems are not identifiable with or accounted for by either impulse—even though Frost often made immediate subjects of his fears of darkness and emptiness, his ambivalence about being sheltered. They are brave and successful counterattacks, each a “momentary stay against confusion,” in Frost’s famous phrase. The farm at Derry had been bought for him by his paternal grandfather whom he hated, gratuitously, as it seems to Thompson, but that hatred appears a part of the pattern as does the denunciation of a remote, Indian-killing Frost in a poem Thompson prints in an appendix.

In an enthusiastic review of Georgian Poetry: 1911-1912, D. H. Lawrence wrote: “The time to be impersonal is gone. We start from the joy we have in being ourselves, and everything must take colour from that joy,” and he is referring to the Georgians, of whom at that moment he felt himself one. Frost’s first volume, A Boy’s Will, was being assembled in that year, his first in England, and in the next year, 1913, when that volume was published and Frost was putting together North of Boston, he came to know and prize Lascelles Abercrombie and Wilfred Gibson, contributors to the volume Lawrence (also a contributor) had reviewed. Frost’s mode of asserting his existence was indeed to put persons, to put the cadence of the voice, into poems. The “sound of sense,” playing against the iambic beat was to be his way of describing his poetic aim in the period of Thompson’s first volume; in practice this meant an identifiable human voice or voices.

Pound was quick to admire and review Frost, but what he and Eliot were actually elaborating could hardly have been more at odds with what Frost was doing, what Lawrence had happily proclaimed. Whatever else their strain of modernism came to mean, it didn’t mean making persons, in this direct sense, poetic presences. It was storing humanity in poems, not manifesting it. This is simple and explicit in Eliot’s declaration of the impersonality of poetry. Words must be rescued from every kind of character-building, mores-endorsing use and devoted to the making of structures. Lawrence has ever since endured the peculiar modern and post-modern hatred felt for those who insist on the being and the primacy of persons; Frost has been slathered with love. I mustn’t try to discuss the quality of that love before trying to say what writing, as if speaking to other men, meant to Frost.

Frost lived his most desperate years in the company of demons, darkness, a wife whom he persistently—though not of course wholly—misconstrued as obdurate, chilly, angelic. In his world without scale, of enormous magnifications and terrifying minutenesses, the man of average sensual endowment was a princely wonder whom he created for himself and made the bearer of his frightening news. The region of measured things—orchids, fields, selectmen, constellations, everything taken for granted by others—was an exhilarating marvel for him, which he proved his title to by representing them in human cadences. The voice he contrived handled matters both large and small: the nuisance of feeding the chickens presented itself, together with the fear of darkness and death outdoors; there was no scale in him except the one the voice created.

Having built his shelter of cadences he added to it and remodeled it; he could not step outside it. Some people still write about Frost as if he had chosen to celebrate a particular region or the pastoral realm, but his actual awakening was not to a particular choice but to the very possibility of speaking to others in print. That he thereafter stuck with New England is the consequence of the fact that his whole usable past was his own poems, which meant that it was also his present. He said very firmly that he had never changed, though he could hardly explain why. But so it was. Robert Frost was co-eternal with Collected Poems.

Most criticism of Frost is too much impressed by his ideas and not perhaps enough by his poetry as it comes. Here Randall Jarrell is indispensable: no less indispensable are the remarks Lionel Trilling made at the dinner on Frost’s 85th birthday, which let the cat out of the bag. Thompson’s first volume provides a permanent home for the cat. Thompson’s readers are not likely to be surprised that a man so circumstanced became “a terrifying poet.” But I read no signs anywhere that Trilling has been followed up, and we only have to turn to Jarrell’s brilliant parade of appreciations, which concludes with fervid praise of Frost as a “complete or representative poet” who rendered the whole world of his experience, to see how much opposition one is likely to meet in saying what sort of personal voice Frost achieved. Jarrell is obviously right and just as obviously wrong: Frost is magnificently what he is, but where, through what fluke of fatal resignation, did we lose the right to say what he is, and not only the right but almost the terms and the ability?

Thompson, in his preface, bows nervously to the stony orthodoxy which proclaims the dangers of the intentional fallacy, making the minimal plea that “Frost made his imagination work primarily with actual images and events familiar to him from his own experiences at first or second hand.” He goes on: “He did endow these images with poetic meanings which do indeed face two ways, and his best poems are esthetically viable without any reference to his biography. But any reader who understands the relationships between the inner and outer faces of these poems is able to derive from them two different kinds of enjoyment which are not necessarily unrelated.” Not necessarily unrelated! Shades of epistemology! How do ideas get into our heads? asks the 18th century; how can a body of poetry possibly be related to the quality of somebody’s humanity? asks the 20th. Instead of psychophysical dualism Observance of the law would have spared the American people and the Vietnamese a cruel war.

Observance of the law can, and must, at last now bring an end to the war.

Advance Publication Announcement:

VIETNAM AND INTERNATIONAL LAW

AN ANALYSIS OF THE LEGALITY OF THE U. S. MILITARY INVOLVEMENT

by the Consultative Council of the Lawyers Committee on American Policy Towards Vietnam

Richard A. Falk, Chairman
John H. E. Fried, Rapporteur

Richard J. Barnett	Wallace McClure
John H. Herz	Richard S. Miller
Stanley Hoffmann	Hans J. Morgenthau
Saul H. Mendlovitz	William G. Rice
Quincy Wright

Hardbound: $3.75

Softbound: $2.00

Order now from your bookstore or the publisher, O'Hare Books, 10
Bartley Road, Flanders, N. J. 07836.

we have a dualism between makers and things made. But Thompson has a better case than he seems to know. It just happens that Frost is not a modernist poet in the sense that he is aiming at impersonal structures; he is of the old world in which persons counted. The central trouble with Thompson's book is that he hasn't been brave about the relation of persons and poems: he writes a rather flabby narrative because he deep down feels that attention to the man he found so fascinating isn't finally the same thing as attention to the poems. The finality is unreachable, but it is no less his job. In these cultural circumstances, or in the response of Thompson and most of his colleagues to them, literary biography is demonstrably an impossible form, and Thompson's characterization of his book as an engine offering four levels of approach to Frost is testimony to his awareness, his somewhat imperfect awareness, of the problem. He cannot be wholly blamed, and I admit that I feel as if I were interrupting him, since this is only the first volume.

People do not now have the authority of existence in the same measure that poems have such authority. This makes difficulties for biographers. But it also troubles people at large and explains, I think, why Frost is a popular poet. Part of the explanation is clearly that he offers an apprehensible surface, but the more interesting possibility is that the poetry of this man without a scale, this intransigent man, was couched in the spoken mode. His poems lend to persons some of their lost power to connect an assertion of self with the particular circumstances of their lives. The rather awful pathos of the Goldwater followers arises out of their desire to do this, although they clearly can't. It is a marginal humanity that the poems express; it is a poetry very much after the fact of the world, a clinging to the raft of existence. It is extraordinarily good of its kind, and for readers who are not asking for glorious possibilities (each of us is such a reader at times), readers who are not canted toward a transforming hope, it affirms, even though barely, or better just because barely, our heavily circumstanced lives.

Perhaps Frost really is that rarity among moderns, a good poet who is popular for the very reasons that he is good, voicing an invitation to climb to that isolated ledge on which he makes "The Most of It."

Real American Life

CHICAGO RENAISSANCE: The Literary Life in the Midwest 1900-1930. By Dale Kramer. Appleton-Century. 369 pp. $7.95.

DAN LEVIN

Mr. Levin is the author of Mask of Glory, a novel of the Marines (McGraw-Hill) and Stormy Petrel, a study of Maxim Gorky (Meredith). He teaches creative writing and comparative literature at Post College, Long Island University.

Dale Kramer returned at last from the big cities to his home town, Sigourney, Ia., where he wrote two books of importance.

In The Wild Jackasses, he saluted the American Populists—knightly native radicals without fear or theory. His lens swept from the 1870s to the 1930s. In the final chapter he presented a rather stirring picture of a special Valhalla with reserved space for the agrarian warriors—Sockless Jerry Simpson, Ignatius Donnelly, General Jim Weaver, Mary Ellen Lease, George Norris, Bill Lemke, Art Townley, Milo Reno. There the confused heroes of the common folk would "celebrate their many, if usually belated, victories."

His last book, Chicago Renaissance, has more depth and a sharper focus on the first two decades of our century. In it he traces the rise of modern American realism, our main literary heritage, by following the interwoven lives of ten figures: Floyd Dell, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Carl Sandburg, Edgar Lee Masters, Vachel Lindsay, Francis Hackett, Maurice Browne, Harriet Monroe, Margaret Anderson. The book re-establishes—even for those who know this but sometimes forget—the nature of the American writing that counts most in the world's literary history, and its origins in real American life.

Markers are set up (some known, some perhaps not so well known) for those who care about American society and literature. They are useful, although markers are always too general and partly misleading. For example: that the publication of Dreiser's Sister Carrie, in 1900, opened in literature our modern age. That the literary renaissance was borne by the energy and dreaming ambitions of small-town Midwestern boys (and girls) who came into electric contact with the big cities. That native radicalism, anarchism and socialism were elements in forming the emotional and intellectual lives of most of the renaissance makers; this is important for any historical understanding. That Harriet Monroe's Poetry magazine, and Margaret Anderson's Little Review, and the Chicago Little Theatre, were crystallizers.

Dale Kramer called it a Chicago renaissance. No name is completely truthful, but some are better than others. Like the Populist movement, the literary one rose in the Midwest, and Chicago was the gravity center. He could have called it the American renaissance and been just as right, but "Chicago" gives focus and structure. He believed its salient achievements in literature were Dreiser's; and Masters' Spoon River Anthology; and Anderson's Winesburg, Ohio. He felt the renaissance crested around 1916, and that by 1921, "the stream was no longer vigorous." This makes sense, for the First World War, like all great upheavals, was necessarily destructive, and the impact of the mental catastrophe would need a few years to be charted.

Maybe the most important point he makes is the absolute relation between literature and life. The creative impulse works mysteriously, but always on the basis of the human facts. Dale Kramer's tracing of the origins of Dreiser's Sister Carrie, Jennie Gerhardt and the Cowperwood novels, Masters' Spoon River poems, Anderson's Winesburg and other writings, Lindsay's wonderful "General William Booth Enters into Heaven," makes clear again what should always

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

Just Published

How 88,648 Heavy Smokers Stopped Smoking

NEW YORK—The Anti-Tobacco Center of America has just published a booklet which explains how 88,648 heavy smokers (of whom many are physicians) have stopped smoking without straining their will power. This booklet is available free of charge to smokers. All you need to do, to obtain it, is to send your name and address to The Anti-Tobacco Center of America, Dept. A-31-E, 366 Fifth Avenue, New York 1, New York. This offer is open while the supply of these booklets lasts.

have remained clear. It is a service to literature.

His method is careful collation of details, then linked and illumined (in his case, often by side-of-the-mouth comments). It is the method par excellence of cultural history. He garnered the details from long talks and correspondence with those yet alive, like Dell, and from multitudinous books, memoirs and letters, doggedly researched. Here is Dreiser's estimate of his father: "... a crank, a tenth-rate Saint Simon or Francis of Assisi ... an illustration of the beaten or at best psychologically depressed"; and of his mother: "... one of the most perfect mothers a man ever had ... a happy, hopeful animal mother, with a desire to live, and not much constructive ability wherewith to make real her dreams. ..." Kramer tells of Dreiser's poetry being rejected consistently by Eugene Field, writer of sentimental verse and (typically) a power controlling access to publication, and affords a glimpse of Dreiser at the height of fame, in a phone booth, kicking backward "like a bull elephant" at a girl clinging to him, while he phones another. Sherwood Anderson's father as a motivating force is illuminated by Kramer's comment: "Rarely has anyone been so corroded by hatred of a parent, or been so relentless in seeking imaginative vengeance." The whole texture of Anderson's work is clarified, including the reasons for the failure of so much of it, and the achievement of Winesburg, where hatred is held in leash and the work becomes art.

His portraits are vivid. Sandburg, the "monolith," riding the rails on the bum (and careful, as always, with his money); at the same time his "Chicago poems" are put in needed social perspective. Masters, too-good boy, yanked around by his family like a sack of potatoes, then morose Greek scholar, undistinguished law partner of Clarence Darrow, unhappy married man who lost a girl he had courted to the prize fighter, Gentleman Jim Corbett, finally standing at Emerson's grave and admitting that life had "cornered" him; starting his Spoon River Anthology (on the conscious level) as a doodle, a morose spoof on The Greek Anthology. Vachel Lindsay, prolonged adolescent with his cult of male and female virginity, battling all his life against his home town (Springfield, Ill.; even issuing war bulletins); tramping the country (map of the soul's universe in his pocket) reciting "rhymes for bread" to startled or bemused farmers. And Vachel Lindsay draining a bottle of Lysol to end the visionary inner struggle which gave the land some of its true, exciting poetry.

The thousand details make the difference. They are the reality of life and show the springs of creativity. The stress on social ideas and on "love and marriage and freedom" is correct; these are components of literature.

The flaws in the book are those in Kramer himself. Largely, they are inextricable from the virtues. In many ways he was an heir of the Populists. (In the thirties, he edited the Farmers' Holiday magazine, organ of the last Populist hero, Milo Reno.) This back-

THE HARVESTERS' VASE

All Things are gods.

After having accomplished the embarkation of the lion there was the unearthing of the orange sarcophagus and the polished stone gaming board and its tourmaline counters. And it could not be but a sign of their desire that they painted fish upon their corpses' heads and necks.

The entire world for them was gods.

At a harvest festival, fifty men stepped into a line of march and crossed this black steatite field on the ripe earth; the wheat shoots were sharp as crystal on the naked feet of those gleaners of the Wheat-God's pleasure.

The wine pouch flew from man to man. The sheaves' dried seed fell and stuck to their brows; their skin pulled tight across their skulls for the harvest was hard and winds curled that summer from the air harrowing their bodies into craters where they stood all day collecting the ripe lava of the fields.

*When
the temple came in view, cocked on the hill preened and unconsolable, riot struck the harvesters in their inner ear. They fell into a run, belching, clutching at rocks, bleeding, their bodies bare and black in the sun's mill and slammed into the sacred magazines where they upturned jugs of wine and sacred creams and muted by this sacral fancy, in the steatite thunder of their feast, they climbed into the precincts of the Mother-Goddess-of-the-Country-Side who ran out of their ears and mouths like a heavy wine.*

NED O'GORMAN

THE ANGRY ARTS

announces

A NAPALM POETRY READING

Presenting some of the poems that have been workhorses of the Anti-Vietnam War readings so far, poems by Levertov, Ferlinghetti, Kinnell, Duncan and others.

Among the readers will be Robert Creeley, James Wright, John Logan, Clayton Eshleman, and Denise Levertov.

Also many poems by younger New York poets, recently written, being read by them for the first time.

* * *

A benefit reading for children burned in Vietnam by Americans, and in memory of the thousands of adults and children who have been burned to death.

Wednesday, Feb. 1, 8 P.M.

Loeb Memorial Auditorium
Washington Square South, N. Y.

Moderator: Robert Bly

SPRING SEMESTER IN THE CLASSROOM

THE NATION

"Student boredom is one of the great barriers to learning. Where a course can be enlivened by social controversy and by knowledge passionately felt and applied to the critical problems of our time, the interest of the students comes alive. That is why in over fifteen years of teaching in Midwestern and Eastern colleges I have often turned to The Nation for a classroom subscription to supplement the factual, but passionless, American government textbook."

—Marc Karson, North Central College,
Naperville, Ill.

"Don't walk into your classroom unprepared for a discussion on current issues. Read The Nation to make sure you have both viewpoints on today's problems and issues. Knowing only one side of an issue is the quickest road to dictatorship."

—David Blais, North High School,
North St Paul, Minn.

For the convenience of teachers, who want to use
The Nation in the classroom, we offer a special classroom rate.

65c per month per student in bundle orders of ten or more delivered to the same address. Desk copy is supplied free to the teacher. Simply fill out the coupon below for immediate service.

THE NATION, Education Department
333 6th Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

Please send me copies per month
for months. (Minimum order ten copies per month.)

☐ Check enclosed

☐ Bill me

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY STATE ZIP No.

2-6-67

ground saved him from theory, Communist or other, and theory ruins most writers. But the very independence (and know-nothing tang) of the Populist tradition, combined with the romantic newspaper man ideal, made him diffident, for too long, about approaching literature seriously. He wasted years on unpromising subjects like Ross of The New Yorker. His biography of Heywood Broun is valuable, but Broun (model of the hard-drinking newspaper man and social fighter) lived on his own surface, and so Kramer stayed there with him. Only in The Wild Jackasses did he find real scope, and then Chicago Renaissance. In these last books, his diffident image of himself as the wise-cracking reporter, the Yank correspondent who tracked down Tokyo Rose, the man who worshiped Broun and feuded with Westbrook Pegler, gives way to the image of the writer who deals firmly with a large theme, from both outer and inner experience.

Like the gallant Populists, Dale Kramer will have to celebrate his belated victory in some Valhalla. He died just as Chicago Renaissance was being published. The country, hardly knowing it, has lost one of its best social and literary historians.

Bright Graffiti

UP THE JUNCTION. By Nell Dunn.
J. B. Lippincott. 127 pp. $3.95.

WELLINGTON ROAD. By Margaret
Lassell. Penguin. 169 pp. $1.25 paper.

ELMER BENDINER

Mr. Bendiner, writer and editor, is the author of The Bowery Man (Thomas Nelson).

Any observer who sets out to depict the poor as merely people who happen to be broke will miss the flavor and significance of the brash outlaw who passes his life scrawling witty obscenities on the pedestals of majestic monuments to piety, virtue, honor and affluence.

In Britain, it seems, the graffiti are brighter than in the United States where the white working class tends to behave like financially embarrassed bourgeois. Nell Dunn, in her slender volume of vignettes, Up The Junction, lovingly depicts the leather-jacketed motorcycle set of Battersea, fornicating happily in the hallways of housing projects with girls who make candy in sweat shops or act as come-ons in clip joints.

Her lovers are at once brittle and tender, like the lad who woos his girl to a private doorway and then at a loss, pleads: "Do me a favor." "What is it?" she asks. "Seduce me," he says.

Nell Dunn's Battersea people are brought to life with sure artistry and a remarkable economy of words. Truth is summed up almost too neatly, but that may be a failing of the form. Many of the pieces in this book were written for magazines and meant to glow briefly in perishable newsprint. In book form the vignette becomes self-defeating. Literary devices—such as the quoting of lyrics of popular songs as a kind of counterpoint—are good when used sparingly but lose effectiveness with repetition.

But if Battersea, in Nell Dunn's handling, becomes almost too beguiling, Wellington Road by Margaret Lassell is good to keep handy as an antidote. Miss Lassell stayed with a family in a modern housing project, a new slum on the edges of a British factory town. And here—with fidelity but without artistry—is a bleak record of unmitigated dreariness.

In this diary she chronicles the defeat of a man injured in an industrial accident, eking out a life of sorts on a pension. He maintains a semblance of usefulness by doing the housework, thereby depriving his wife of her function. He sends her out to whore when cash is low, and whines jealously when he suspects a lover.

Somehow the children grow up feeding on crumbs of love amid the shoddy spectacle of adult striving and failing. Small crimes and multiple abortions mark the passing of the days and nights on Wellington Road where nobody starves and nobody lives. Margaret Lassell's diary convicts a way of life on circumstantial evidence alone. If the reader wants to people the scene with flesh and blood he can call on Nell Dunn.

Both in Battersea and Wellington Road the disasters of life are shrugged off with a plucky "never mind." But one of Nell Dunn's boys sums it all up when he says: "It's 'never mind'—for life."

myself in Newhaven last July, on my way home after a year in Cairo, I remembered that the Woolf's old home, Asham House, was not more than 10 miles away, and I resolved to see it. No doubt even then I had a half-formed desire to see the owner himself, forgetting for the moment that he had said in Beginning Again that he and his wife had moved to the nearby village of Rodmell in 1919.

But my conscious motive was Asham House itself. I inquired in the village of Iford, on the Lewes road, and a tractor driver said he knew just the man for me. I followed his Fordson through the village lane—southern England; is there any place like it?—to a dairy where I met an ex-German with some milk pails who smiled broadly when he saw the German tourist plates on the Volkswagen, and greeted me with "Wie gehts?" He'd come over after the war; loved England, knew that Mr. Woolf was a famous writer, and knew also that he no longer lived at Asham House. But why not call on Mr. Woolf himself, he suggested, as my face sagged; he's just down the road at Monks House in Rodmell. Probably gardening just about now. Ask anyone you see, they all know him. Left off the main road through the village, Monks House on the right. Good. Cheer-o! 'f wiedersehen!

Monks House, a rambling, pleasant, overgrown old cottage which Leonard Woolf has owned for forty-seven years, sits at the edge of the lane through Rodmell, like most houses in the villages. (The reader will find Woolf's own description of Asham House, Monks House and a brief commentary on life in a Sussex village fifty years ago in the early chapters of Beginning Again.) We knocked at the gate. Waited, admired the old place with its profusion of flowers, trees, vines and shrubs, its winningly irregular air of having "just grown," its Mother Goose quality. No response. Knocked again, entered cautiously. "Hallo! Is anyone there?" Large spaniel rushed barking upon us but only to fawn and horse around. "Nice dog, good dog." Then around the corner came a slender old man in flannels, blue shirt, vest, heavy shoes, gardening gloves, trowel. White hair like a brush and faded bleak eyes—no glasses—peering from a long, thin, tough, aristocratic, unself-pitying old face. A formidable face, a stoical face, an unsurprisable face, just seeing for the five thousandth time what's going on. "Mr. Woolf, is it?" I mumbled through the explanation and apology, more conscious than I wanted to be of that wintry gaze and, behind it, the un-

To the Woolf House

STANLEY POSS

Mr. Poss teaches English at California State College at Fresno.

Outside of graduate students grubbing up dissertation topics no one reads Leslie Stephen today. One remembers him vaguely as a late Victorian worthy (like Archer or Butler or Gosse) who did some good work shattering idols, but one remembers rather more vividly his fictional counterpart in his daughter's To The Lighthouse, the academic philosopher Mr. Ramsay, vainly struggling to get to "Q," vainly, that is, because his thought is limited by its empiricist preconceptions to "P." Similarly, Virginia Woolf's husband had long been for me a shadowy presence; a good liberal, no doubt, a capable editor, even, one had heard somewhere, a writer of some distinction. But Virginia's was the dominating if sibylline personality, and when she died in 1941 I should imagine that few persons outside the immediate group doubted that the Woolf name was dead also. Indeed it was something of a shock to realize that Leonard Woolf was still alive when the first of his memoirs, Sowing, appeared in 1960. This marvelous evocation of Edwardian Cambridge during the days of Moore and Russell, McTaggart and Wittgenstein, Keynes and Forster and Strachey and Clive Bell, and The Apostles (the elite group of undergraduates who clustered around Moore), was followed a year later by Growing, which describes the author's life as a civil servant in Ceylon between 1904 and 1911. Then came Beginning Again in 1964, a book whose rigorously honest and precisely detailed account of the early years of his life with Virginia (1911-18), their discovery that she was subject to fits of insanity, and his attempts to deal with them is compelling from the first pages and once and for all establishes Leonard Woolf as an important writer. No reader who has been harrowed and delighted by these books is ever likely to place their author merely as Virginia's husband, the fellow who turned the crank at The Hogarth Press.

So one's initial feeling of mild surprise that Leonard Woolf had survived into the sixties changed to—well, whatever it is one feels on encountering a mind of utter candor and independence, stoical, fearless and compassionate, represented in a prose combining art and force. After Growing I found myself hoping that he would be able to round out his autobiography, and when Beginning Again appeared two years ago I felt that a solid blow had been struck for our old mortality. But after all, that book took him only to 1918, and clearly he needed at least two more volumes to finish his story. Thus when I found asked question: "What do you really mean by that?"—the question with which, according to Leonard Woolf's memoirs, G. E. Moore so often paralyzed The Apostles at Cambridge, freezing their undergraduate fluency into sheepish inarticulateness.

He accepted what I said, however, not surprised, not put out. I asked about Asham House, as a pump primer. He told us that it now had a cement plant for a neighbor, that he supposed it had fallen on hard times. He wrote in the morning, gardened after lunch. Care to see the garden? So for forty-five minutes we meandered about the very extensive grounds admiring the orchards and garden, enjoying the sun, and learning that he regards Charleston as the one American city the tourist must not miss. Had we seen it? No, we. . . . Had we ever been to the South at all? Well no, but. . . . Typical Americans, he thought; travel all around Europe but never think of South Carolina. He was fascinated by the South, like Quentin's roommate Shreve ("Tell me about the South. Why do people live there? Why do they live at all?"), and I felt I had let our side down rather badly in not being an expert on the region. Texas, however, really was beyond the pale, he believed, in spite of what a friend at the university had written extolling Austin as a Periclean Athens of the New World. Dallas; Kennedy: simply impossible. He thought that it had been two and a half centuries since the English had murdered their king or prime minister.

But this was as close as he came to the role of entertainer. As one may imagine, he is not frivolous. The years lie on him. He does not sparkle, though the books reveal a humor with a cutting edge. He has long passed the stage of thinking about making an impression in either appearance or speech. He is no fashioner of aperçus; one would no more expect to find him guilty of the vanity of epigrams than of clothes. His virtues as a human being and as a writer are the virtues of the plain style. He was not inclined to talk of his work or his wife's. But what did I do, now? (Teach, write some.) Teach what? (Englit, Am-lit.) Impossible task, he should think. Can one really teach literature? And American literature is English literature, is it not? Well, I said, that was the general impression in Cairo too. He was interested in Cairo; was it anti-Semitic? The regime distinguishes theoretically between Jews and Zionists, I replied, but in practice most Jews turn out to be Zionists. Most unfortunate, he said. Now when he was in Germany in the thirties anti-Semitism never touched him personally, though the regime was pouring out diatribes night and day. He wondered whether political propaganda really worked, an observation which, coming from a man who had written a dozen books on history and politics, struck me as unexpected, to say the least. Can he really have said that? Perhaps my memory deceives me.

Anyhow, he'd had enough. We took a last look south from the slight eminence of his garden at Asham House (barely visible) and the cement plant (very visible) and the Channel, thanked him for his courtesy in admitting strangers to his house, and started to say we hoped we'd soon be reading the fourth volume of his memoirs, then caught ourselves in confusion, conscious of a gaffe since we were saying in fact "hope you live long enough." He got it, all right; his January face creased, he gave us a look both bleak and kind, frosty and gentle, and said that he would take the liberty of joining us in our hope; perhaps indeed he could count on our understanding that his was even more fervent. We shook hands, he bade us goodbye, and returned to his phlox and roses, his cabbages and currants.

Gourmet Theologian

THE NEW THEOLOGIAN. By Ved Mehta. Harper & Row. 217 pp. $5.95.

GABRIEL VAHANIAN

Mr. Vahanian is associate professor of religion at Syracuse University. His newest book, No Other God, has just been published. He is also the author of The Death of God (both Braziller).

First published by The New Yorker in the fall of 1965, when the news of the death of God caught the Christian masses in theological slumber, this peripatetic essay had the audacious merit of turning theology not quite into a circus but at least into a sophisticated form of entertainment, meandering from anecdote to vignette, from table talk to speculation, and from God to Mehta's private disclosures about the problem that precisely God had become.

The result had a touch of piquancy and was especially commendable since it attempted to popularize the "agonizing reappraisal" of today's theological debates without doing violence to their integrity. And yet one had the feeling, now confirmed by the slightly amended book, that one must resist the mercurial brilliance of Mehta's performance.

This is not to say that his book does not intrigue us. But its brilliant sketches and its "travelogue" style confine it—as the title indicates—to the kind of men today's theologians are. Nor does the book come to grips with the radically new questions theology is raising, or is confronted by, in its attempt to survive in a world where the Christian faith seems to have become superfluous. Mehta's portrait of "the new theologian" is not without its own legitimate justification. But he overestimates his effect if he believes that he has elucidated the major problems simply by detonating a theological mini-bomb between two courses of a meal, or by connecting portraits by way of choice quotations—much as one might select an appropriate wine. The famous map of the United States, as viewed by a resident of New York, told a truth only by dislocating geography. Ved Mehta's view of contemporary theology stands in the same tradition.

The New Theologian thus begins with the sensational question raised by the celebrated Bishop John A. T. Robinson's title for an article published by The Observer, which became the apocalyptic "overture" of his 1963 best-selling book, Honest to God. The title was: "Our Image of God Must Go."

Robinson's thesis itself, of course, was not new. One can only wonder why it appeared to be so shocking, considering the extent to which the West has been de-Christianized, and that most people have long been living according to the implications of a de facto atheism. Many a theologian had in the past done exactly what Robinson seemed to advocate, though without sensationalism. What was new, however, was the confusion that followed when, on the authority of Tillich, Bultmann, and especially Bonhoeffer (the German theologian who was executed by the Nazis for his part in the plot to assassinate Hitler), the Bishop, followed by a host of "new theologians," seemed to be implying that not only our image but God himself must go.

What little Bonhoeffer wrote in his prison cell on the theme of God's superfluousness to modern man scarcely warrants the conception of a godless understanding of Jesus. It has nothing to do with the one thing that Robinson and his confreres share, i.e., a feeling of being more at ease with humanists or with atheists than with churchgoers. As far as that sort of argument goes, and taking into account the kind of world in which we live, Marxists who concede that some of their best friends are Christian seem much bolder.

Mehta's book deals with another theme borrowed from Bonhoeffer: "religionless Christianity." What Bonhoeffer meant by that phrase is not clear, since for him religion mainly signified what Christianity should not be or should not tolerate as its vehicle. He saw between Christianity and religion the same kind of opposition as the prophets of the Old Testament saw between loyalty to Yahweh and perfunctory sacrifices or ostentatious ritualism. In turn, we must remember that Bonhoeffer's phrase derives from the views of Karl Barth.

"Religionless Christianity" has become the shibboleth of the theological nouvelle vague, recalling theological debates about the number of angels that could stand on the head of a pin, while Byzantium was falling.

Mehta's lively book offers us a deception, for which he cannot be held entirely responsible, nor entirely blameless. After all, no matter how brilliant and versatile one is, a serious report on this subject based on interviews requires some technical competence and demands some preliminary homework. Some theologians can switch from their technical jargon to the language of the man on the street. Others can't, or won't. In this case, it is entirely up to the reporter to ask the complicated questions in such a way that they are simply formulated and elicit an equally simple answer. One has but to compare Mehta's interview of Rudolf Bultmann with the one published in Der Spiegel, an English version of which appeared recently in Christianity and Crisis. In the former we get the picture of a man who is over 80 years old, whose health is failing and who has practically completed his life's task, and states that all he has to say about "demythologizing" has already been said in his books. The man from Der Spiegel, suspecting that this was the case, had familiarized himself with Bultmann's thought so appropriately that he did produce a real interview. Mehta's conversations with Bultmann (mainly about the weather) are "prefaced" by a full page and a half of quotations as if to justify Mehta's trip to Marburg. Still, The New Theologian does introduce some of the best theologians of today and exposes the reader to some aspects of their controversial ideas. In ■ sense, it is a banquet of ideas.

However, like dining out in certain blue-law states, it is a feast which requires that you supply your own spirits.

ART / Max Kozloff

Although I've had occasion to discuss the paintings of Larry Poons with some frequency in the past, his latest work, at the Castelli Gallery, justifies opening the topic again. In ■ commentary that tries to isolate the most challenging or coherent abstraction, this artist, though an anguished, unproductive worker, keeps appearing insistently, and I think, deservedly. Like Pollock in formulating an exhilarating unique style, Poons has incurred no imitators—least of all, so far, himself. While the overall scheme of his art—giant fields of stained unitary color, incessantly pocked by multi-hued disks or ovals—has been maintained, its actual mechanics, and therefore, pictorial effect, seem to have reversed gear. Gone, for instance, are his high contrasts and steady beats. Absent too are the once prominent after-images and the energized though staggered lines of force, the in-focus imagery, and the differentiated weight and texture of his elements. Where earlier there had been a wavering of pictorial forces as they competed with maximum stress in divergent directions, "A really impressive and magnificent selection of contributors... Many of the outstanding names of the century are here."

—RALPH MCGILL,
Book Week

100 YEARS OF THE NATION

Edited by Henry M. Christman

Introduction by CAREY McWILLIAMS

A generous selection of memorable prose and poetry that appeared in the pages of The Nation during the last century, now in a handsome Centennial Anthology published by The Macmillan Company. $7.95

Partial list of contributors:

Theodore Dreiser
H. L. Mencken • John Dos Passos
Bertolt Brecht • James Agee
Henry James • Bertrand Russell
Sherwood Anderson
Leon Trotsky • André Malraux
Thomas Mann • Robert Lowell
Wallace Stevens • Robert Frost
Norman Thomas • Harold J. Laski
I. F. Stone • William James
William Carlos Williams
William Butler Yeats
Ezra Pound • G. D. H. Cole
Fred J. Cook • Edmund Wilson
Oswald Garrison Villard
William Dean Howells
Francis Parkman
Robert C. Benchley
Benedetto Croce
William O. Douglas
Heywood Brown

THE NATION 333 11th Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014

Please send me _____ copies of 100 YEARS OF THE NATION @ $7.95. I enclose check for $ _____

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP CODE _____

now his whole syntax is recessive and understated, and the result is an intrinsic blurring of sensations. Once it was necessary to find some common denominator to his stratified, rather optical attacks; currently, one is required to hold on to their differences, lest they retreat still further into the muted fabric. Despite their environmental, wall-sized proportions, these paintings are striving to "get away," so that the best that can be done, for the moment, is to send analysis chivvying after them.

My first impression of the four canvases Poons is now showing was that they were, in a tricky sense, impossible to see. Close values alone did not explain this, nor did the oddly dim gallery lights. It may be that the pictures "bruise" easily in this light, which

PERSONALS

POSTERS

Ho Chi Minh, Trotsky, Oscar Wilde, Dostoevsky, Lenin, Rodin. Also four-color psychedelic dance posters, Matrix I, II, III, and Acid Man.

$1. each plus 25c handling for each order.

Send check or money order to:

Berkeley Bonaparte
P.O. Box 1250, Berkeley, Calif. 94701

Psychedelic Posters-GrandDe Ballroom. $1.00 each or any 3 for $2.50. Uncle Russ Travel Agency, 7729 Kentucky, Dearborn, Michigan 48127.

MEN SHOULD CARE FOR BABIES NOT KILL THEM

Write for information on draft resistance, tax refusal, pacifism. Send 10c for your copy of "Up Tight With The Draft." Send $1 for special "draft packet" that includes a copy of Handbook for C.O.'s. Write:

WAR RESISTERS LEAGUE

5 Beckman Street, Dept. J, N. Y. C. 10038

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 2-6-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10011

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

POEM

*We have come to be saved. From a pest.
And so we are constructing.*

From this altitude, it seems as though we were swimming, rowing a boat.

Later, a girl named Julie grows up in a blue dress. She walks past our perishable fort.

How new she looks! We hardly recognize and in this we are ascending in the play.

I'm talking about the New Jersey shore, her hands evidently excited, while the flag sinks.

"She held out her white hands to us, but remained in the bitten world."

DAVID SHAPIRO

hitherto had seemed adequate for other work. Diffusion, a certain muzziness, a lack of resonance were the earliest perceptions, stemming, perhaps, from a half-conscious yearning of the eye to line into the freckled fields on the basis of a secure formal priority that did not exist. Such would account for my visual anxiety in these first moments. This, and the look of art that seemed highly structured, that appeared to be coming purposefully out at you—and didn't. Even the grand surfaces, uninflected as usual, seemed tinged by this contagious recession. Movement, here, was problematic, and light, finally, became almost involuntarily dead pan.

But the one agent that really has unmoored the experience is Poons's excessive reliance on secondary or weakly saturated color. If the field is not so characterized, then one can be assured that its punctuation is. The artist's palette always starts at some already degraded hue which at best recalls or refers to a primary, and then descends, for the most part, further away into various neutrals. It is sensuality in a minor mode—not quite pastel and still less tonal—but a definite taste for intermediate, sulkily off-key chromatics. In addition, Poons mingles the predictability and surprise of color in a disorienting combination. Each of his canvases is, on one hand, a set homogeneous pattern of color changes. His "Wildcat Arrival," for instance, fields a basic chromium oxide green, upon which there are notes of permanent and gray green, Indian red, bluish gray, and dull yellow ochre. And "Rosewood" distributes gray, brown and khaki yellows, various shades of coral, a light emerald, and whitened burnt sienna on a mocha-beige ground. The chromatic environment, therefore, is delimited within a close harmonic range of the spectrum. But on the other hand, there are far more colors—scattered widely about in small proportions—to hold in the relating memory, than in any of his previous work. Low pressure changes of warm-cool are distended, or oscillate, and are made to seem to trespass each other's "territory." Then too, as a final touch, squinting hard, one notices the isolated bleatings of the odd color out.

This sheepish complexity of coloration, in which hues seem almost mathematically graded, then shuffled, overlaps a tentative spatial change that may have radical implications in Poons's art. He seems to be of two minds on the classic relation of figure and ground. Formerly, their interaction had been clear. Dots were figure; field was ground. The one lay distinctly and substantially upon the other. But now, in his green picture, there is only one translucent skin which has molecular apertures that hold a watery compound of differing tints. It is as if one is looking through and behind the surface at random intervals. As for the "Rosewood" canvas, the speckling elements have lost their discreteness of edge and purvey high-keyed aureoles that tend to bleed out against the ground. This looseness and openness are permissible only in work no deeper than mid-value, where the eye is still efficient in sensing contrasts. Way down with the blue-blacks of "Knoxville." Poons had to retain his physical distinctions in order to counter a gathering optical invisibility. Like most of his colleagues, Poons is not a painter of transitions, nor could he be said to be interested in spontaneity of execution. But this current work, if my intuition is right, shows him to be groping toward a surrogate of both. It is a fabulous enterprise—something like trying to find the square root of lyricism.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1187

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Somewhat of a moral get-up put into operation. (10)
- 6 The pitcher has to recognize this sign, otherwise the staff might give no indication. (4)
- 10 In recent times, ready to be a plunderer. (7)
- 11 Going around the course? (7)
- 12 Weeds, perhaps, sound wetter in the garden. (4)
- 13 One of those things that never grow up! (10)
- 15 Must his Panama type, badly shaped? (7)
- 16 Ambiguous. (7)
- 17 What the team does, and then lines up in unbalanced formation? (7)
- 20 Such things might eventually get the wind up, if not well otherwise. (3, 4)
- 22 The French once had a victory so subject to interpretation. (5, 5)
- 23 It's not yours, dig? (4)
- 25 Proving the ones with the ball might be wrong. (7)
- 26 Butters up, and does it a hard way! (7)
- 27 False airs that many a woman puts on. (4)
- 28 Certainly not one's best clothes one might change to for climbing. (6, 4)

DOWN:

- 1 Pretty fancy? (15)
- 2 Not regularly descriptive of the rest of the patrol. (3-4)

- 3 and 24 down Implying the unhappy consequences of how a victim might be carried, in a somewhat old-fashioned way. (8)
- 4 The togs one changes to in isolated areas? (7)
- 5 Started the job, but a change of direction came first. (7)
- 7 Crude oil shut out of it? (7)
- 8 At least one adult admission implied! (6, 9)
- 9 The fire might be eaten, of course. (9)
- 14 Enlarging the staff, perhaps. (9)
- 18 Hold out? It's almost the same, even without public relations. (7)
- 19 One might carry sloppiness to a point of being part of an ethnic group. (7)
- 20 Uplifting title to both directions of the course? (7)
- 21 Chrysolite. (7)
- 24 See 3 down

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1188

ACROSS: 1 Jack-in-the-box; 9 Office boys; 10 Noel; 11 Aesthete; 12 Tahiti; 13 Throb; 15 Skinnier; 16 Headlong; 19 Genre; 21 Errand; 22 Apricots; 24 Fare; 25 Unilateral; 26 Supercharger. DOWN: 2 Alfred the Great; 3 Knitter; 4 Niece; 5 Hoofers; 6 Besetting; 7 Xanthin; 8 Let them eat cake; 14 Broad jump; 17 Dealers; 18 Glacier; 20 Nuclear; 23 Reach.

EDUCATIONAL

Training for Leadership in Social Change The Upland Institute

One-year graduate level professional training. Studying theory and strategy of the great traditions of social change. Field experience with institutions of social change in Philadelphia area. Co-educational, non-sectarian. Admission requirement: B.A. or equivalent training and experience. Write:

JOHN W. THOMAS
THE UPLAND INSTITUTE
Chester, Pa. 19013

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor; Self-Designed Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publisher, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor says that every time you repeat the creative phrase "World Democracy," in prayer or otherwise, you benefit total humanity—living, dead and unborn.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

EDUCATIONAL

Join and support a real AMERICAN movement. Based on 25 years of research of archives. You will be startled. True source of Constitutional Government.

Educational packet, $2.00 donation

THE ORIGINAL AMERICAN LIBERTY LEAGUE (TO-ALL)

Box 14395 Phoenix, Arizona 85031
Dept. ONONDAGA

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 11 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Buy Your Books through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014.

The Truth Shall Make Ye Silly Putty

Is it true what they say about THE REALIST?

"... more or less the periodical equivalent of Lenny Bruce."—Steve Allen

"... the most anarchistic publication in the country today; The Realist is the bible of the American underground."

—Raymond Heard, The Montreal Star

"... a sometimes sophomoric, often significant, frequently funny satirical magazine."—Newsweek

"You can say things in The Realist that you can't say in other publications."

—Terry Southern

"... the funniest magazine in America."

—Timothy Leary

Following are the highlights of the 5 most truthful (and still available) issues of The Realist. They cost $1. They're yours free with a subscription.

- Jules Feiffer—on closing the credibility gap; plus playlet whose theme is that sex is dirty after all.
- Racial Conflict—on one hand, Bill Worthy discusses Negroes and Vietnam; on the other hand, "The Whitey Survival Manual".
- Profound Analysis—"The Ethnic Joke as a Barometer of Class Distinction"—reprinted from The Journal of American Poverty.
- Religious Revival—The Americanization of Zen; also, The Devil's Visit to New York.
- Impolite Interviews—a unique question-and-answer session with Dr. Timothy Leary of LSD infamy; a confrontation with a high school student attempting to rid his community of venereal disease.
- The Vietnam War—Michael Myerson's slanted report from Hanoi; A Thousand Nights, the memoirs of Dean Rusk.
- Cartoon Spreads—Freezing after death: the junkie battalion; protest marches; the fag battalion.
- Conspiracy Theory—The role of the CIA and the police in the murder of Malcolm X; Who killed Adlai Stevenson?
- Personal Journalism—Bratwurst Day in Sheboygan, Wisconsin; I was an Abortionist for the FBI.
- Strange Debate—Resolved: that there should be a violent peace movement.
- Non-Obituary—Lenny Bruce, Lyndon Johnson and the Deodorant Syndrome.
- Soft-Core Pornography—Implications of the Ginzburg decision, or "The Day the Supreme Court Banned Vaseline".

THE REALIST, Dept. N-2
589 Broadway
New York, N. Y. 10012

Enclosed please find:

- ☐ $1 for your 5 most truthful issues.
- ☐ $3 for a 10-issue subscription plus those 5 issues free.
- ☐ $5 for a 20-issue subscription plus those 5 issues free.

Name

Address

City State Zip

THE NATION

FEBRUARY 13, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME
FEB 2 1969
LIBRARY

AN END TO ALIBIS

AMERICA FOULS ITS DREAM

DOUGLAS F. DOWD

VIETNAM IS NO MISTAKE

JOHN McDERMOTT

Property Tax Scandals

Bad Laws & Crafty Assessors

MICHAEL HARRIS

GRASS'S MacBRECHT

FREDERIC EWEN

DIVIDED HEARTS AT THE WALL

DAVID CAUTE

•

OPEN LETTER TO KIESINGER / GUNTHER GRASS

12-18-67H PL8-626
PORTER LIBRARY
KANSAS STATE COLL OF
-PITTSBURGH
PITTSBURGH KS 66762

LETTERS

brutal or insane

Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: In your editorial, "Winning the Hearts of the People" [Jan. 30], the analogy between Operation Cedar Falls and the Nazi action in Lidice is qualified by the assertion that our men "shot only the Vietcong. . . ." This misses a crucial point: that in strongly Vietcong areas, extending over much of the countryside, all active males tend to be regarded as Vietcong. This is evident from the way in which the 24-year-old pregnant woman, quoted in the editorial only as desiring to stay in her bulldozed village, described the circumstances in which her husband met his death. When planes flew over their fields, "he stood up and they shot him down and killed him." Was he Vietcong? Very possibly, but the important point—which can be documented in regard to "allied" operations all over South Vietnam—is that the defenders against "external aggression" tend to assume that the entire male population is the enemy. . . . If this assumption is correct, then the U.S. is committing brutal aggression: if it is far off the mark, then the policy is insane. Edward S. Herman

Hoffa & DRIVE

Twinsburg, Ohio

DEAR SIR: Terry Eliot Tornek's article on "DRIVE: Teamsters in Politics" [The Nation, Dec. 19] . . . inaccurately cited a Cleveland primary as one example of the Teamsters' success with DRIVE, calling it "the only organization a long-term Congressman had behind him in squeaking through a tight primary." In fact, the Cleveland AFL-CIO's COPE, like DRIVE, supported the anti-Negro, anti-immigrant Congressman Feighan's primary fight against a challenge by one of labor's best friends from the Ohio state legislature. . . .

Whatever DRIVE's rationalization might have been, this endorsement was part of a pattern of guessing the probable winners, and then endorsing their predictions. This approach led DRIVE to endorse the anti-labor Ohio Governor Rhodes and his entire ticket, running on a Southern-style program of attracting industry to the state. Rhodes's slogan that "Profit is not a dirty word in Ohio," goes well with his record of undermining workmen's compensation and unemployment compensation in Ohio. . . .

I believe that an accurate reading would show that the Teamsters' DRIVE was launched in 1961 . . . not for any social or legislative goals but only for the narrow direct interests of Hoffa & Co., to try to get the government off Hoffa's back.

Bob Weissman, President UAW Local 122

Princeton, N. J.

DEAR SIR: Though I claim no expertise in Ohio politics, I did study the Feighan primary thoroughly and came away convinced that DRIVE endorsement cannot be characterized as simply picking probable winners, and was far different from what COPE had to offer. . . .

Mr. Weissman correctly states that DRIVE was launched to win political support for the Teamsters' lobby, but he fails to recognize that the main goals of a lobby are legislative by definition.

Mr. Weissman's dissatisfaction with DRIVE springs from his obvious distaste for "Hoffa & Co.," and a feeling that their "narrow direct interests" are not in keeping with the best interests of the Teamster rank and file and the labor movement. He contends that DRIVE's main function was to "get the government off Hoffa's back." Since Mr. Hoffa appears to be jail-bound, DRIVE has obviously failed, in Mr. Weissman's estimation, and there should be little impetus from within the union for its survival or growth.

It will be interesting to see if the future proves Mr. Weissman correct.

Terry E. Tornek

EDITORIALS

Redirecting American Power

Read together, the articles by Douglas Dowd and John McDermott (pp. 198, 203) point up a problem which opponents of the war in Vietnam should face but seldom do. For the most part, critics of the war are so deeply committed to traditional American political values that it does not occur to them to question the dedication of today's decision makers to these same values. Almost daily, The Nation receives communications based on the assumption that the Administration does not fully understand the issues in Vietnam.

The same assumption underlies an extraordinary number of published statements inveighing against the war or calling for de-escalation or a cessation of bombing. But as he protested in a recent—and rare—outburst of indignation, Dean Rusk is not "the village idiot." The harsh fact is that the Johnson team has its own theory of the war. Public and private persuasion can no doubt influence these warriors on minor or peripheral matters, but they are deeply committed to strategies which are not publicly proclaimed; they are, in a sense, instruments of American power, directed by it, carried along by its momentum. Disaster might persuade them, but "success" intoxicates. Short of a failure so massive that it could not be gainsaid, they can be persuaded to change directions only by political power.

The question then is, how can American policy be changed—not merely in Vietnam, but generally? How can it be made to embody cherished American values? How can it be reconciled with the attainment of desperately needed reforms in American society? The answer is: only through the redirection of American power. (See statement p. 219 on the theme of The Nation Institute's conference in Los Angeles on February 25.) Power speaks only to power. It is only through the accretion and application of political power that the direction of American policy can be changed.

Even at the level of persuasion, there is something now missing. The current public protests are often eloquent, moving, highly persuasive; no doubt they do have a cumulative political effect. But measured in terms of political power, they can be discounted as exercises in self-expression. General petitions seldom translate into political action. On the other hand, suppose the signers of the round-robin type of protest were to secure sponsorship for a nation-wide telecast assailing our policy in Vietnam and indicating appropriate forms of political action. The transition from protest to politics would then be bridged.

We are faced with a failure of power, not with a failure in communication. To the extent that a misunderstanding exists, it is the critics who fail to understand how this Administration, so notably lacking in candor, sees the issues. Stringfellow Barr is only the most recent critic of the war to echo Senator Fulbright's concern with "the arrogance of power." As Mr. Barr writes ("Consulting the Romans," an occasional paper of the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions), "Rome was not bloodthirsty; she merely relied on force in such a way as to paralyze her imagination and make her inattentive to her neighbors. And I believe there is an analogy here with the United States." Indeed there is, as the articles by Dowd and McDermott make clear.

Tragedy at Cape Kennedy

Unfortunately, Trud, the publication of the Soviet trade unions, could not refrain from charging that the three U.S. astronauts who were killed in the Apollo accident on January 27 were victims of haste by space officials and that there were "flaws" in the spaceship. It is unfortunate because patriotic Americans will now be expected to rally around the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in rebuttal. But this will not wash. The charges have substance, and independent-minded aerospace commentators know it.

As recently as late December, 1966, the NASA "success schedule" called for a manned lunar landing in late 1968 or early 1969. These target dates were set to outpace the presumed Soviet timetable and to live up to President Kennedy's rather foolhardy deadline of 1970. Lest this comment be construed as hostile to technological progress, let it be noted that The Nation has never opposed the Apollo project and, as in the editorial, "Vietnam vs. Space" (May 23, 1966) has extolled the skills and enterprise which made it possible. What we do oppose is the conversion of a great undertaking into a juvenile contest and a test of American ascendancy in the cold war. Whether U.S. or Soviet astronauts are the victims, this competition is senseless from any humane, scientific or even political standpoint.

The NASA board of inquiry which is investigating the accident is composed almost entirely of men who, whatever their good intentions and engineering competence, are committed to the "gotta-beat-the-Russians" psychology. It is almost impossible for them to be openly critical of the guidelines that the Johnson Administration and NASA have followed and will no doubt continue to follow, unless deterred by condemnation from without.

On the technical side, NASA's board is entitled to a reasonable period of privacy for its deliberations, but the immediate cause of the fatalities is obvious: In an atmosphere of pure oxygen, fire spreads with explosive violence through anything combustible.

Many such accidents have occurred in hospital operating rooms, laboratories, factories, etc.—and in NASA test chambers. Nevertheless, the agency elected to use pure oxygen in its space ships, in order to save weight and reduce complexity of plumbing. The Russians use a two-gas system (oxygen-nitrogen); oxygen-helium is

IN THIS ISSUE

February 13, 1967

EDITORIALS

194

ARTICLES

An End to Alibis:

198 America Fouls Its Dream

Douglas F. Dowd

203 Vietnam Is No Mistake

John McDermott

206 California Revolution 3:

The Soil Beneath the Blacktop

Richard G. Lillard

210 Property Tax Scandals:

Bad Laws & Crafty Assessors

Michael Harris

BOOKS & THE ARTS

213 Alas, Poor Bertolt Brecht!

Frederic Ewen

214 Open Letter to Kurt Kiesinger

Günter Grass

215 Divided Hearts at the Wall

David Caute

216 The Great Human Option

Edward T. Gargan

218 The Winds (poem)

Richard Eberhart

220 An 18th-Century Man

Jeffrey J. Kaplow

221 Records

Benjamin Boretz

223 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor	CAREY McWILLIAMS	Washington	ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Managing Editor	ROBERT HATCH	Paris	ALEXANDER WERTH
Literary Editor	HELEN YGLESIAS	Theatre	HAROLD CLURMAN
Poetry Editor	MICHAEL GOLDMAN	Art	MAX KOZLOFF
Copy Editor	MARION HESS	Music	BENJAMIN BORETZ
Advertising Manager	MARY SIMON	Science	CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 204
No. 7

another possible combination. In the light of the disaster, the NASA decision to supply oxygen alone will have to be reviewed. A change at this stage would involve considerable delay, but if dangers within the spacecraft are to be added to the hazards of launch, maneuver, rendezvous and docking, re-entry, etc., the moon project may turn into a lugubrious enterprise.

Grissom, White and Chaffee were gallant men, willing to run the risks of their calling, but the question for the living is whether technical decisions influenced by the urgency of the 1970 deadline did not subject them to unnecessary hazard. Nor should the political aspects of the tragedy be ignored. NASA has never hesitated to exert pressure for funds by scaring Congress with the possibility that the Russians may get to the moon first. If it now tries to make an economy-minded Congress responsible for casualties, it must be put down firmly. The way to safeguard the astronauts—so far as that is possible—is to pursue the moon project deliberately, without harassment from an arbitrary schedule. If, as a result, the Russians beat us to a landing—and manage to bring their men back alive—it may hurt our pride but it will not be a national calamity.

What Goes on in the Congo?

As of December 31, 1966, the Council of Ministers of the Democratic Republic of the Congo put into effect its previously announced intention of "Africanizing" or "Congolizing" the Union Minière du Haut-Katanga, one of the largest mining companies in the world. The "Democratic Republic" is the fief of General Mobutu and his friends, if he has any. What lies behind this bold act of "nationalization"?

One explanation may be dismissed out of hand—that General Mobutu has been converted to socialism. Mobutu's record is one of suppressing any movement appreciably left of Center; his troops arrested Lumumba, and Mobutu and Kasavubu, between them, arranged Lumumba's deportation to Katanga, where he was murdered in 1961 by the secessionist government of Tshombe. It is hardly likely that Mobutu has got religion at this late date.

A more probable explanation is that Mobutu and his colleagues are engaged in a blackmail operation of considerable scope. However, there is no evidence that Mobutu plans to retire and wishes to accumulate a nest egg in some far country.

What is strange is the scant attention that the operation, however motivated, has received in the United States. The Congo, and especially Union Minière, used to be front-page news. Now only the outlines of the event have been publicized in this country. The ownership situation is as complicated as anything in this line since the holding company empire of Samuel Insull collapsed in the depression of the thirties. Under the Belgo-Congolese treaty of February 6, 1965, Union Minière ceded a share interest in its properties to the Congolese Government, with the balance held by various Belgian and French interests and Tanganyika Concessions of Britain. The latter's cut—14.47 per cent—is substantial.

But by the issuance of the decree of expropriation, the assets, which the company values at $800 million, were placed in a Congolese Government corporation, and Mobutu is offering 40 per cent of the shares to foreign investors. Thus a sum running to hundreds of millions of dollars is up for grabs. "Informed sources" in Brussels reported late in January that the offering would be taken up by a consortium organized by Banque Lambert, Belgium's fourth largest bank, and including the Penarroya Company of France and the Newmont Mining Corporation of the United States. Banque Lambert is said to be controlled by cousins of the Paris branch of the Rothschild banking family, Penarroya is controlled by this Paris branch, while Newmont Mining has connections with Lazard Frères, the Wall Street investment bankers.

Union Minière is in no submissive mood toward the interests seeking to take advantage of its tribulations. Its associates, Société Générale de Belgique, Compagnie Financière du Katanga and Tanganyika Concessions, which together own about one-third of the Union Minière shares, warn that any persons who acquire shares in the Congolese Government company will be accomplices in "an act of confiscation." In The Wall Street Journal and other financial organs, Union Minière has run display advertisements similarly breathing menace. Anyone who buys materials such as copper, cobalt, zinc concentrates, cadmium, germanium, etc., issuing from the mines and plants of Union Minière, is informed that these have been "illegally purloined" and that anyone dealing in them will be subject to legal action.

Since the seizure, the mines and plants have been inactive. Without Belgian help, Mobutu would be hard put to operate them. It is hardly likely that American interests will come forward with technical assistance out of pure charity, but the silence of the State Department does give rise to supposition. It could be that Mobutu, who is widely regarded as our man in the Congo and something of a protégé of the CIA, is working a squeeze play on the Belgians, in favor of U.S. interests.

Slough of Equality

Since it is recognized by almost everyone that the first need of the Negro is better jobs, one might expect to find the federal government in a gung-ho campaign to bring this about. It isn't happening. The federal government has, in fact, abdicated its role in seeking more jobs for Negroes, and the proof of this abdication is acted out, like a drab morality play, on two floors of a building at 1800 G Street, N.W., in Washington.

On the twelfth floor is the seat of Futility. Here are the offices of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which was set up to fight job discrimination. [See editorial, "The Lost Agency"; The Nation, December 19, 1966.] The only trouble is that while it can investigate, Congress gave it no powers to enforce penalties against those it finds violating Title Seven of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. It is a jelly factory. Since it was established in July, 1965, it has received 13,000 complaints of discrimination, and has found that about half of them were well founded. Of these 6,000 to 7,000 justified complaints, ten were sent to the U.S. Department of Justice for action. And of these, EEOC officials say, the Justice Department has taken one to court. One of 13,000. And not even that one has reached trial. About forty others have ended in lawsuits, but at the workers' expense. When The Nation suggested to an EEOC official that suing for justice might put a real financial burden on some impoverished Negroes, and asked why the EEOC didn't pay for it, it was told: "The NAACP has money for that sort of thing."

On the eleventh floor is the seat of Lethargy. Here is the Office of Federal Contract Compliance, a soggy and drifting limb in the backwater of the Labor Department. It has plenty of power but doesn't use it. By Executive order No. 11246, it has the power to cancel federal contracts with any company found practicing racial discrimination anywhere in the country. But one official told The Nation: "We do our best to avoid canceling contracts." They succeed in that very well.

Last month the EEOC called hearings in Charlotte, N. C., to investigate charges that there is widespread discrimination against Negroes in the textile mills of the two Carolinas. Of 194,047 total employment in the Carolina mills, 16,719 are Negro—8.6 per cent. This is in states where Negroes make up about one-fourth of the population and one-fourth the total employment.

Industry spokesmen, after boycotting the meeting up to the last hour of the last day, finally came forward with blustering denials. The charges were "malicious and irresponsible." But they did agree to sit down with the EEOC for a round of exploratory talks. This trivial accomplishment might be considered a major victory for the EEOC, considering its complete lack of sanctions.

Meanwhile, nothing was heard from the Office of Federal Contract Compliance on the floor below. The two agencies are supposed to work together, but they seldom do. Last year the Defense Department alone spent $1 billion with clothing and textile manufacturers via contracts (the breakdown for textile only is not available but it would be a hearty share of the billion). If there is discrimination in the Southern mills, and the EEOC upstairs seems to have ample evidence of it, why doesn't the OFCC cut off the juicy contracts? For the Executive order does not call for merely passive integration; it specifically requires that the contractor will take "affirmative action to ensure" that qualified Negroes are hired. Few of the mills even pretend to do that.

Public Television

The long-awaited report of the Carnegie Commission on Educational Television has been hailed by Jack Gould of The New York Times, as "the proverbial landmark in the evolution of the home screen." James Reston went so far as to compare it to the Land Grant Act of 1862. Such support notwithstanding, the testing of "public television" lies still in the future.

The most dramatic aspect of the report was the suggestion for an excise tax of 2 to 5 per cent on sales of television sets throughout the country. (If one assumes a tax of 3 per cent and that a $300 set will last for at least six years, the consumer fee for public television would be $1.50 a year.) It is probably a better method of raising money than the Ford Foundation's proposal of a nonprofit satellite. Nevertheless, those who are licensed to use the public airways in the "public interest" should at least share in the cost of "public television."

Money is only one aspect of the problem. The American viewer needs an alternative that is more than a reflection of the American mainstream. It must also be a vehicle of intelligent and forthright dissent. Here, a paradox arises. Congress must authorize the program. Yet it is from public pressure in general and Congressional pressure in particular that public television must be immunized. The Carnegie report suggests a way out. It says that at the top of the structure of public television there should be a nonprofit and public "Corporation for Public Television." The corporation would be headed by a committee of six Presidential appointees and six others chosen by the first six. The commission thinks that this independent public corporation, sustained by levies from the sale of television sets—plus local control of programming—would make the public television station responsive to viewer needs and wants. It is at least possible.

The commission's enthusiasm for local control of programming raises another set of problems. Will the local stations be sufficiently bold in the face of community pressure to present the controversial idea? The experience of the relatively innocuous National Educational Television has been that the national organization is far more independent and unafraid than its local affiliates.

Other questions present themselves. For instance, if public television does gain a sizable audience for superior programming, the hope is that the networks would respond to the competition by offering better programs of their own. But they might concentrate on the money-makers and leave ideas to the nonprofit sector.

However, these questions aside, the Carnegie Commission report is an exciting first step. It offers a diagram and defines the goals. The commission estimates that a full network of 380 public stations (there are now 124 education stations) could be operating by 1980 with a budget of $270 million. The figure seems low—the cost of about two weeks of fighting in Vietnam.

AN END TO ALIBIS

1. America Fouls Its Dream

DOUGLAS F. DOWD

Mr. Dowd, professor of economics at Cornell University, is at present on leave as a Fulbright professor of economics, teaching at the Johns Hopkins University School of Advanced International Studies, Bologna, Italy. He is the author, in addition to several books in his field, of Step by Step (Norton), an account of the civil rights movement, written in collaboration with Mary Nichols.

Bologna

America! It was not too long ago that the mere mention of our land—whether to others or ourselves—was the cause of at least a slight shiver of delight, or hope or desire; mixed, to be sure, with some degree of amusement, or contempt or fear. Still, America! land of promises, of social, political and economic achievements barely dreamed of elsewhere; land of abundance, mobility, social experiment, democracy, classlessness, freedom, marvelous humor—land, in short, of opportunities for the realization of man.

Justly so?

Justly so; up to a point. The thrust of our development enabled us to overcome the weight of mediocrities, of corruption, greed, know-nothingness—of the violence to body and spirit meted out (especially but not only) to red and black men. Up to a point, and so it seemed, for those whose voices were heard. Today it seems less so, and not because we hear new voices. Shivers of apprehension noticeably replace shivers of delight.

Fear, disenchantment and bitterness grow daily in and about America, at home and abroad. It is a growth becoming lush. Are there deep roots to this development, or is what we see the result merely of seeds scattered by querulous youngsters on the one hand, beady-eyed fanatics on the other—seeds that can find no congenial soil in the American garden?

But first, what is it about America today that even prompts such questions? A lengthening list forms in the mind. It is popular to place the war in Vietnam at its head, to give it the dubious honor of causa causans. But is not Vietnam, though unquestionably a powerful wrecker, more consequence than cause of our condition? Could America! be involved in such filthy deeds?

Especially among liberal critics, our involvement in the war is looked upon as something of an accident, the result of a series of largely well-intentioned miscalculations that have—with the push of a handful of misguided men of power—caught us up in a process from which there is no easy extrication. Worse, for these same critics, there exists an inverse relationship between rising war expenditures and our ability to cope with serious domestic and international problems in the connected areas of race, poverty, housing, education, dying cities, the needs of the desperate two-thirds of the world.

Other things being equal, who could quarrel with such notions? They cannot be quarreled with, except by looking at other things. In doing so, one finds that the Vietnamese War has become a convenient and comforting, if also an awkward, explanation as to why the American dream fades, an explanation that locates the source of our troubles closer to our stars than to ourselves.

In what encouraging sense may it be said that the Johnson Administration does not represent the American people? What substantial bloc of American voters, of Congressmen or Senators, opposes the Johnson Administration, except in details, or except to depart even further from the dream? Does a majority of the American people wish an end to the war in Vietnam, brought about by means less dreadful, more constructive, than those currently in use? If the credibility gap were to be closed, for example, would that mean bringing public relations closer to reality, or reality closer to public relations? How many would dare entrust a full and secret vote of the American people to choose between the positions of, say, U Thant, LBJ or the Hon. Mendel Rivers?

Or, on domestic issues, does the majority honestly will the day when Negroes, Puerto Ricans and Mexican-Americans will exist as equals in America? When the poor will have power and dignity and realistic access to the advantages of, and a voice in shaping, America? Do the American people wish to make that effort of imagination and will required to build our cities into places of creative enjoyment—places even of decency, cleanliness, comfort, safety? As between an educational system designed to enhance the marvelous possibilities of the young (and of society), and the dreary foolishness of the present system at all levels, how do the American people choose?

A credibility gap there is, between the Administration's words and the facts. The more important credibility gap, however, is between the image that Americans like to have of their society, and what Americans work for and do, what their society is. This is not to say that, in terms of what is done, America is worse than other societies, Americans worse than other peoples; our evil consists of believing that we are better than others—and it consists as well of our being able to be so much better than we are, of our being able in fact to make our image a reality.

The gap between what Americans are in practice, and what with our ideals and our resources we should be, is as a Grand Canyon that separates actuality from possibility. President Johnson indeed represents us; like us, he cannot face—perhaps cannot comprehend—the truth. But Johnson's gap is a line scratched in the sand; we the people have allowed the earth to open. It is this gap, this chasm between reality and ideal, that defines the American crisis. It is this gap into which America slides.

Steadily and surely, America has stumbled into unprecedented abundance for the majority, and has created in the process a majority whose heart's desire is for still more abundance, whose shimmering brightness is enough to blind us to any intrusions—seemingly, but not in fact—competitive with growing heaps of things. This year, we shall have a gross national product in excess of $750 billion; on modest assumptions about our future growth rate, we shall pass a $1 trillion gross national product several years before 1984. In 1964, when President Johnson announced the war on poverty, he also announced that there were 30 million poor people in the United States. (Michael Harrington and Leon Keyserling, using a less politic definition of poverty, put the figure at between 40 and 50 million—more people than there are in toto in Mexico, or Italy, or Great Britain or France.) In his Economic Report to Congress in 1966, the President stated that there were 32 million poor people in the United States. The number of poor people had increased by 2 million in a period when our growth rate was between 5 and 6 per cent. Could that have been because of our economic inability to cope with both the war abroad and the war at home? It does not seem so.

Suppose GNP to rise at 4 per cent per annum. Suppose that, beginning with this year's GNP of between $750 and $800 billion one were to propose that half of the increase—i.e., about $15 billion—be employed to allow the poor to earn incomes through helping to plan and carry out the reconstruction of their housing and educational facilities, and the reconstruction as well of the sprawl and tangle that defeats and strangles us in our daily coming and going. The remainder of the annual increase could, of course, go toward raising the real levels of life for the already well-off Americans, levels already high and rising in any event (the level rises without an increase in income, as the well-off fill out gaps in their possessions). Suppose too, that current estimates for the termination date of the Vietnamese War are valid; that is, suppose that at some time in the next five to ten years another $20 billion-plus will be "released." Suppose, finally, that it is made clear that a cutback in the war would both make possible and require additional expenditures for social enhancement, if GNP were to continue to grow.

Suppose, in short, that there is no simple-minded economic reason for us to assume that the obstacles to social improvement are to be found in shortages of resources. Who, after all these suppositions have been made, believes that the American people are prepared to support, let alone insist upon, even the bare bones of a modest but meaningful program of social reconstruction? If we would tomorrow, why have we not yesterday, when all this was equally possible? Was it the personal inadequacies of Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson that held us back, their string of miscalculations on Southeast Asia (that look almost systematic in retrospect) that fouled our dream?

No. Vietnam is not our incubus. It is our fix. We need it—not, as some have said, as an outlet for our GNP, or to give vent to imperialistic high spirits. There may indeed be some emerging validity to such notions; but whatever validity there is pales beside the social catharsis provided by the war—remembering that a catharsis provides some pain as well as some relief. We are a society in crisis, faced with the need for new and large resolutions. The crisis is not confined within our borders. It is world-wide, and the share of it that we see at home is an almost exact, miniature replica of the larger scene—where poor contend against rich, colored against white, powerless against powerful. Our power to move toward an easing of those crises is immense; Vietnam is our boyish way of both obscuring and deepening the crises at home and abroad. That we should behave so is not a product of eminent personalities or historical accidents; it is a product of our development as a people.

The process began no later than the American Revolution. Like most revolutions, ours was brought into being by diverse people, some with diverse aims, some with a single motivation (whether glory, or profit, or land, or power or freedom). Our revolution, as distinct from our war with Britain, neither failed nor succeeded; it opened ways for social change. Just which way we would travel, who would decide and how, who would pay and who would gain, were the issues that produced the numerous conflicts of our first century as a nation.

Some of these issues are still unresolved; but which way we would travel, and who would decide, using what criteria, were questions that began to receive hard answers before Jackson left office. We were to be a businesslike, and businessman's, society. Our economy was to be ruggedly capitalistic, but flexible enough, for a while, to work well with part of its people enslaved. When it became clear that rugged capitalism meant also industrial capitalism, the power of slaveholders—not over their slaves, but over the destiny of the nation—had to be dissolved. Whether that would be accomplished by Southerners giving up their power or having it taken from them by force was up to Southerners to decide. The Civil War demonstrated well the ferocity that Americans have in them and how, like others elsewhere, they will use it ferociously for ignoble purposes. (Unless one assumes, as is only rarely believed today, that the war was fought by the North to end slavery, or by the South to maintain political freedom.)

In the half century or so following the Civil War we developed and hardened the traits and institutions by which we have lived and died ever since. More than merely symbolic among these was our ability to ignore the continuing de facto enslavement of Negroes in America. That period was our prep school; we learned then to accustom ourselves to a reality that defied our ideals.

Hypocrisy was not invented in America, nor was industrial capitalism. But both have been carried further by us than by others; we have interwoven their strands to form our character as a people. David M. Potter has ably dubbed us and explained us as the "people of plenty." The term may be carried further: We are a people who have learned to live with any quality of existence as long as the quantitative balance is high and rising; a people who decry organized power—whether it be political, or economic or social—but who live under concentrated power of all sorts, and look the other way as long as the price is right; a people who profess to love equality, freedom, dignity for themselves and others, but who only curtsy when these are betrayed by or for themselves and others. (Is it not probable that the outcry against "black power" arises not merely from hatred or fear of black people but from a fear, doubtless unconscious, that any serious confrontation with questions of power, freedom and dignity would cause not just the poor but the rest of us to face our own powerlessness, our own constraints, our own indignity in our own work, our own politics, our own daily social relationships?) Like all others, we profess to love peace not the sword; but, like all others, our response to threats—or to the easy promise of territorial gain—has customarily been to rattle or unsheath the sword.

As a people, Americans have of course placed first things first. We have produced a definition of first things that—quite conveniently in a business society—ineluctably made the first thing the search for gain, and it's each for himself and God for all. Material self-interest as the highest of the priorities has become so fully absorbed in the American style that it is also unconscious, imperialistic in its reach, redefining all else to suit, or placing all else in a penumbra of qualification: except as second thoughts, except upon ritualistic occasion, except in the once-weekly church of the spirit. Except, perhaps, for the young.

The young are the place to look first in America today, to see what we have become, are becoming; to see, also, what hope there is for realization of the lingering dream. If by the young we mean to include those between (say) 16 and 25, they fall naturally into three groups, defined not by age but by outlook and behavior. There is that very largest of the three groups, a large lump of young men and women who go about cheerfully doing their duty—in school, in office, and farm, and factory, at home and in the armed services. At these tasks they do passably, or very well. There is a smaller, still substantial, group that performs its tasks well, but with misgiving, questions, puzzlement; wondering if something has gone wrong, at times even knowing that it has. They will be found in all the same functions, but also in the Peace Corps, in VISTA, even, some of them, in civil rights and protest groups. In not too many years their tasks will push them into the oblivion of the largest group, or their consciousness and conscience into the last and smallest of the groups.

This last group grows most rapidly, and its growth is most rapid among the very youngest, the teen-agers; but its most vocal representatives are also its oldest members. They may do well at school, or may have done so at one time; but they do best at withdrawing, at turning thumbs down—thumbs down on the rhetoric as well as the goods of the affluent society; on the family, on business, on, not least, the government. (Who can dislike one of their buttons: "I am an enemy of the State"?) Since they cannot believe in America, how can they believe in dying, let alone killing, for it? This is not to say that they lack ideals. It is this frequently raucous (sometimes very silent), often dirty, usually ineffectual, always impious group of "kids" that has taken most seriously the ideals of America—ideals of freedom, brotherhood, honesty, dignity, peace—and found them badly wanting. Growing up in an opulent world, they can find no great urge to make money nor, on reflection, would it make much sense if they did. On the other hand, what they could believe in, and work for, they cannot find in reality. These are disappointed lovers, wide-eyed still with the romance of America, angry rather than cynical; not yet smooth. The heartbeat of America for them is a cacophony, a horror of lies.

When one comes to know the members of this last group (not easy, if one is over 25), and many of the middle bunch, one finds them to be attractive. One cannot but worry about their future. In doing so, however, one is worrying about the future of America. The young face reality as their elders do not. The reality they see is one in which the technology, resources and ideals of America have rendered possible (Now! as they would say) the realization of a dream; there are no more excuses. The basis of their opposition boils down to one word: hypocrisy. They see the reality of war and racism and poverty, and ugliness and conformity and mindless education, acquiesced in and extended by their parents (their parents: who, many of them disapproving of the war, raise no public voice against it, seek at most the ignominious ways of having other youngsters do the dirty work), their teachers and preachers, their intellectual, business and political leaders. They see killing justified in the name of freedom by those who shut their eyes to oppression in their own neighborhoods. They juxtapose the soap commercial and the political commercial, and are aware that the same minds have corrupted themselves to bring both messages to them.

The young see, if they cannot always explain, a society that—lacking the guts even to face it—pursues the possession of things as though it were a Godhead, or the Holy Grail, were located in the bucket seat of a Thunderbird. They see, in short, a society that has worked so long and passionately for Mammon, it can no longer distinguish between Mammon, God and Caesar. (Is it unimportant that they also see a society almost ludicrously prurient that makes voyeurism into a big business?)

Perhaps the young cannot explain what they see; but they have the ability to attack, or to withdraw. Alone, they are not likely to carry themselves or us to a more reasonable, more honest, decent, basically civilized society. But, as they turn away from what we have created, they can make the rest of us look more closely at what we are, make us wonder why. It was the young—blacks first, and then whites—who did that for us in civil rights, which in turn opened our eyes to the country's widespread poverty. When we failed them there, and failed ourselves, we exposed the American crisis. It was the young who began the opposition to the war in Vietnam, and who largely continue it. The young have done more than their share; if the job of keeping the American flame alive is to be done, it shall be done by the rest of us, or not at all. But if we are to do that job, we have much to learn, and to unlearn.

It has been said that all societies have the defects of their virtues, the weaknesses of their strengths. America's strengths have resided in our long history of hard work, the great emphasis on individual reliance accompanying the process, and the uniquely favorable natural and historical context within which it all took place. Not just the technology, goods, capital, markets and people available to us from the rest of the world eased our development; we were much prompted also by the political and economic ideas of Europe. Perhaps the most noteworthy defect of our growth is that it has been too easy. It was too easy for individuals to become well off, or even rich; too easy for Americans and for America to make it. As we made it, we naturally gave credit to institutions and to individual qualities that were able to work well, or at all, in critical part only because of the favorable context within which they functioned. We mistook good fortune for a kind of shrewd native genius—a genius, we thought, that enabled us to make capitalism work in a way that nobody else could match. We have been able to find the cause of individual well-being in personal virtue, and of individual suffering in character deficiency. And, of great relevance for our present agony, our perspectives on war are much shaped by our never having suffered military defeat. War is something our side always wins; one consequence of that, as a friend has put it, is that "Americans don't hate war enough."

There is, of course, more to be said; suffice it to say that out of our history—a history of hellbent money-making without noticeably severe consequences—we have developed a social outlook. It is an almost frivolous outlook that has made us seem charming to others in the past. We have allowed ourselves to believe that the existence of genuinely serious, highly complex and deep-seated social problems is scarcely to be believed in; as a corollary, we act as though problems both arise and can be resolved in the short run, with appropriately modest policies. Faced with the legacy of centuries of slavery and racism, we congratulate ourselves on a few pieces of disgracefully limited legislation, and are undisguisedly horrified (or angry; or, some of us, pleased) when the principal product is a rise in bitterness and hostility, and a worsening of the problem. As is our wont, we find the culprit not in our shortcomings but in those who point to our shortcomings. We appropriate a few billions for a war on poverty, allow the program (except in its figureheads) to be run by local politicians, business firms and tired social workers who possess neither the attitudes, the ability nor the morale required for the task of even partial social reconstruction—who, indeed, have done much to create the problem as it now stands—and nod our heads in solemn sorrow when we hear that the money has gone to waste, that the program peters out. (But we barely murmur when the costs of our military folly rise to ten times that amount for a ruthless, witless, suicidal war.) We spend a few billion dollars over the years, presumably to aid the economic development of poor nations, and recoil in disbelief as conditions continue to deteriorate in the recipient countries (and they are, to boot, ungrateful). We send, at first, some thousands of soldiers, and later some hundreds of thousands, to Vietnam, and puzzle over a quite satisfactory arithmetic of slaughter that somehow fails to turn the trick.

In sum, we find ourselves shocked, disappointed, horrified and puzzled, as we face problems that seem intractable, that defy American-style solutions. The world, we are almost prepared to believe—perhaps, as LBJ once said, because “they weren’t reared like us”—is not American. Nor, it seems, is much of America.

It seems, indeed, that we have outrun our luck. We gained strength and power almost effortlessly; in doing so, we left behind the world in which that power was gained, whether at home or abroad. “There is no failure,” a British economist attempting to explain British stagnation once said, “like success.” “Whatever is,” said Veblen, “is wrong.” Both meant to suggest that the techniques employed to climb a ladder are not those needed to keep one well situated at the top. For Americans to accept the need for deliberate change implied by those views would be for them to accept something else: We are not unique.

We could be; indeed, it appears that we shall have to be, to survive as a decent society. History is littered with the wreckage of societies that were the Americas of their day—whether Greek, or Roman, or Florentine or Spanish—societies that took to themselves that arrogance of wealth and power that is now ours. But those societies, it can and must be said, faced neither the challenges nor the possibilities that America faces today. Neither their professed aims nor their economic strength gave them the responsibility or the power that we hold. The turbulence that roils the waters of America comes not because there are new elements walking the earth: poverty, violence, indignity. The turbulence is a product of an underwater volcano that combines need, aspiration and a sense of the possible with the stated aims and obvious capabilities of America to weaken the hold of ancient evils over the conditions of man. It is too late for us to shut up; we must put up or blow up.

When the protest against the war in Vietnam was in its early stages, Hans Morgenthau wrote that he was less fearful of what would happen if America were to lose than if it were to win that war—because of what would become of us while and after we won. In that fear, he was quite justified. But the question remains: How did America allow itself to become involved in the war in the first place? This is not the place to recite the history of our involvement; it is enough to say that it goes back at least fifteen years. But it is not enough to say that Americans didn’t know about it; any more than it is enough to say that white Americans didn’t know about the condition of Negroes in America until 1954 or 1960. That some Americans knew about both conditions is to say that most Americans who chose to could have known; that we did not choose is more significant than our ignorance.

It is not reaching egregiously far afield here to point to the Good Germans of the twenties, and to their society. That society, it is now conveniently forgotten, was in the late twenties considered to be an entirely marvelous place. Scientists, painters, writers, dramatists, architects, engineers, film makers, political scientists, economists—or just plain swingers—flocked to that Germany. It was, between 1925 and 1930, something like a Mecca for the priests and worshipers of the dazzling 20th century—much as America was to become later. Less than a decade later, one needs no reminding, Germany was the cesspool of Western civilization.

America is not Germany; there are many ways in which it is not. But it is important for Good Americans to wonder what the Good Germans were doing in the late twenties. (We know what the Bad Germans were doing.)

Some Good Germans were, as they long had been, conscious of the monster struggling to break through the crust of their civilization. They wrote books, articles, plays, sermons, lectures and political speeches to their fellow citizens, and to the world. Most Good Germans, we may believe, were partaking of the splendors of Germany, and hoping for the best. Many, certainly, were not entirely sure that what was struggling beneath the surface was in fact a monster. It looked and sounded like a monster, but perhaps that was because of the way it had been raised; it could be tamed. Germany, after all, did deserve a place in the sun; Versailles did have to be corrected (peacefully, one hoped); it was, in any event, better not to rouse the ire of the beast by arguing with it.

It must be said, too, that to call a monster by its name even in that splendid Germany was already to run certain risks—of seeming to be unpatriotic, of being taken for a Jew or a Communist, of seeming to be vulgar, a troublemaker, of becoming, at least, unpopular. It came to pass that the Good Germans disappeared from, or in, Germany—by emigration, imprisonment, silence, death or by becoming, finally, Bad Germans.

The lesson of the Good German, like any lesson from another time and place, can be no more than suggestive; but is it not at least that? A Good American cannot really emigrate. He can, of course, stay silent and hope for the best. He then distinguishes himself from the Bad Americans only by feelings of self-righteousness and superiority, mixed, perhaps, with guilt. Like the Good Germans.

Is there no other way for us, today? There are other ways, but they all require confrontation with oneself, and with one’s society.

The first step is to recognize our individual powerlessness, as matters now stand; to recognize that as American citizens we exercise few if any significant choices about the condition of our lives, or the lives of others for whom we profess to be concerned. We must confront the location and the uses of power if we are to understand and free ourselves from our powerlessness, and that entails discarding the easy myths—about our economy, our politics, our social style—the myths that comfort us in our powerlessness. We must relearn to value integrity above appearances, to care about the condition of our self more than the condition of our car—and that means, because of the idealistic way in which we have been raised, to care a great deal about the condition of man in general, and to do so seriously. In turn, that means taking the plight of others as our own plight; among other things, it means ceasing to feel guilty and to feel instead a sense of responsibility. Guilt leads to feckless charity; responsibility ordinarily leads to involvement, and the latter to heightened awareness. We must care considerably more, it should be said, that some people are called “nigger” than that we are called “good guy,” even if that means being unpleasant to some of those we call our friends. We must relearn, as much as we can, our nation’s history, to understand what we were and are from the point of view of our victims.

All this sounds too much, yet it is far too little. What the individual does within himself will build his character, but it will not change his society much; and our society requires much change. We must seek new ways to organize, develop new programs around which to organize, and work with and induce others to do likewise. We must not allow ourselves to be debilitated by the widespread preconception that for something to be worth doing in politics it must clearly promise success (or profit, or a merit badge). “Success” can be had by working within the respectable political organizations, but it is the success of reworking the status quo. Those organizations, whether national or local, have for many years said all the right things. The best possible light in which to cast their failure, the failure of America, is to recognize that at their very best the major political groups work for limited reforms in a limited way, and that limited reforms are doomed to fail both because they are limited and because they are reforms. As reforms they are resisted; and because they are limited they are resisted successfully. They are absorbed by the system.

That system, political, economic and social, is named industrial capitalism. Let us assume that it worked wonders in the past. But the wonders it worked were wonders of production, which rose so rapidly and spread so widely that it did in fact seem that political and social problems would disappear soon. The productive wonders of our society have recently been so great as to put to shame our economic accomplishments of the past. Are there careful students of contemporary American society who can still believe that our political and social problems are susceptible to improvement by sheer economic success?

It should be clear, rather, that the social priorities of industrial capitalism have now become dangerous to the possibilities of civilization. To achieve high GNPs in our economy is a relatively simple task; to achieve social balance and decency under the best of conditions would be immensely difficult. We can no longer afford to be mesmerized by a social philosophy that leaves to grace and good luck what only creative and determined hard work might achieve. America’s problems, at home and abroad, are deepening and broadening. They are rooted to the economic, political and social structure and outlooks of our society—indeed of Western civilization. It is not enough to hope for the best; to wait for Bobby.

“We must,” as Lincoln declared, “disenthrall ourselves.” We must set forth a new declaration of independence—to be free from hypocrisy and sham and acquiescence in a foul world, free to work for a new version of first things, a definition that puts man and his condition at the center of our thoughts and of our deeds. If we do so, as we do so, we shall find that young and old, black and white, poor and not so poor, are possessed of marvelous energies and constructive ideas, that we all have a morale and a character we have not dared to ponder—that America! can once more make ourselves, and much of the world, shiver with delight.

2. Vietnam Is No Mistake

JOHN McDERMOTT

Mr. McDermott is associate editor of Viet-Report. He is the author of A Profile of Vietnamese History.

Three current myths, widely held even among critics of the war in Vietnam, vitiate any effort to build popular support for new and more moderate foreign policies. The first myth holds that the continual escalation of the war by the Johnson Administration stems from the fundamental misconception that the Vietnamese crisis originated outside the South, that is, in Hanoi or, possibly, Peking. Because of this misconception, the myth concludes, events themselves will frustrate the policy, educate the policy makers and thus create, ultimately, the basis for an end to the war. Myth number two, which frequently shares billing with the first, portrays American foreign policy as containment. In this view, our policy is a minimal one, aimed merely at containing China (or communism or whatever) until Peking gives up its expansionist propensities and learns to live in peace and harmony with the rest of the world. The third myth is the most dangerous of all. It asserts that United States foreign policy can and must be understood as an attempt to maintain a balance of power with the Communist world.

None of these is even faintly true. Contrary to myth number one, and as press reports amply demonstrate, responsible United States policy makers, far from being chagrined by the growing folly of the war, are delighted at what they consider its outstanding success to date. As for myth number two, American policy is not aimed at containing the power of China, of the Soviet Union, of the various Communist movements; it aims instead at crippling that power, at rolling it back and, where possible, destroying it. And the third myth invokes a balance of power that does not, and cannot, exist in the world today. America has no power rival in any part of the world. By contrast, the Soviet Union is at best a regional power and, in Washington's estimate, a second-line power at that.

We should not be surprised that Washington is happy with the progress of the Vietnamese War. Although its war policies have been partially rebuked by the American electorate and wholly stalemated by the Vietnamese enemy, the Administration has three very good reasons for celebration.

¶ Notwithstanding the oft-voiced expectations of the critics that escalation of the war would drive China and the Soviet Union into each other's arms, the Vietnamese crisis has aggravated their differences almost to the breaking point. Since it is a major aim of Administration policy to keep its enemies divided, the Vietnamese War has on this count been an exemplary success.

¶ Moscow's inability to aid its beleaguered ally in Hanoi other than by modest shipments of arms and munitions has taught the East European states how much Soviet protection is worth. Accordingly, the escalation, again refuting the critics, has contributed to loosening still further Soviet influence in Eastern Europe.

¶ By polarizing Communist and non-Communist positions in the Far East, escalation has led to a stiffening of will on the part of the non-Communists, especially in Indonesia, Singapore and Malaysia. Similarly, the escalation has helped foster internal convulsions in China, with the result that the Japanese and Korean Communist Parties have defected from the Maoist "line." U.S. policy in Vietnam has thus contributed to the increasing isolation of China in the Far East.

The first point is true and, purely as policy, it is also unexceptionable. Any foreign office placed in the position of Mr. Rusk's State Department would try to divide the Soviet Union and China. But pressing the question further begins to reveal what is peculiar about U.S. policy in this instance. One notes immediately that it has little to do with Vietnam itself. There is good reason to believe that policy makers in Washington, whatever their views may have been in the past, now realize that the Vietnamese War stems from long-term disputes among various Vietnamese political factions, and that the role of China, as of the international Communist movements, has been distinctly ancillary. More even than that, I am persuaded that Administration leaders know how to negotiate an end to the war on relatively favorable terms, and may even do so well prior to the 1968 elections. First, however, they want to exploit still further the differences between Moscow and Peking, and this prescribes that the war continue. We are confronted here with great-power politics of the most conventional—and ruthless—kind. The Administration is quite consciously destroying Vietnam and its people in order to gain a marginal advantage elsewhere. This is a rational choice, not a mistake or a miscalculation.

The significance of this choice should be dwelt upon. Even granting, for argument's sake, the desirability of a Soviet-Chinese split, we must ask why Administration leaders use war to accomplish it. Both the Soviets and the Chinese have made it known that they strongly desire foreign credits as well as increased trade. In addition, China must import much of its grain supply. A clever trade policy on Washington's part, forcing the Soviets and Chinese to compete with each other for substantial trade advantages, would likely exacerbate their relations quite as much as a war in Vietnam. Supposing this trade strategy effective, the United States would have not one enemy, China, or two, China and Russia, but none, while its major rivals would still be divided. But Washington has not chosen this course. Why?

The answer to this question is to be found in an analysis of myth number two—that is, in what poses as a policy of containment. The Administration is not trying to contain China and the Soviet Union; it is trying to reduce them further to the status of second-line powers. Holding the Soviet case in abeyance for the moment, consider China. How can one speak of the need to contain China when in fact it is not expanding? Two critical examples demonstrate the truth of this assertion.

In 1954, both North Korea and North Vietnam could reasonably be considered Chinese satellites. China had paid dearly for this influence: it fought a major conventional war in Korea, and only narrowly avoided a nuclear attack in 1953 for its efforts there; it risked a similar attack a year later as a result of its assistance to the Vietminh. The strategic location of these small nations on China's sensitive borders and their inflammable rivalries with American-supported South Korea and South Vietnam, respectively, should have guaranteed that an "expansionist" Chinese foreign office, still more its "aggressive" Communist Party, would maintain them as puppets. Nothing like that happened. Both Pyongyang and Hanoi have long since gravitated out of the Chinese orbit. Both have long pursued independent foreign policies; in both, the Communist Parties have long since been able to pick and choose among the competing views of the Communist world.

China has not been expanding—not against Japan, not against Burma and Pakistan, not even against India (and, since the late fifties, not even against Quemoy). Shrouded in truculent rhetoric, Peking's foreign policies have shown a basically moderate—even isolationist—character. But the United States has not been satisfied. Secretary Rusk and his associates want not a static Chinese international position but a declining one. They tell us this themselves when they point with satisfaction to China's growing isolation and offer it as one of the reasons to be satisfied by the course of the Vietnamese War.

A similar analysis may be made of Russia and the East European situation. Again, by their own testimony, American officials are not satisfied merely with the thaw in Eastern Europe, which was already far advanced before Soviet weaknesses were exposed in Vietnam. The war in Vietnam is a good war, in their eyes, because it exposes Soviet military weaknesses vis-à-vis the United States, and thereby encourages the East European states to make separate arrangements with Washington or its chief ally in Europe, West Germany. The Administration probably assigns no very high priority to this objective, certainly not the priority given to rolling back Chinese influence in Asia. Nonetheless, one must recognize here a milder form of the old "roll back the iron curtain" policy that John Foster Dulles tried to pursue until the development of Soviet ICBMs in 1957 forced the Eisenhower administration to seek a détente.

The Johnson Administration, under its chief foreign policy theorist, Walt Whitman Rostow, has developed a new rollback policy, less crude and less bombastic than that of Secretary Dulles, but still a rollback policy and not less dangerous for being more oblique. Administration officials would deny the charge if made in these words. But, at the operating level, they accept as concrete foreign policy values, worth our bitter sacrifices in Vietnam, a systematic rollback of Soviet and, especially, Chinese influence.

That is the chief significance of the policies of counterinsurgency which grew out of the fall of Batista in Cuba in the late fifties, and which have gained such impetus from the Vietnamese War. In W.W. Rostow's still-classic presentation of the objectives of military counterinsurgency operations, given at Fort Bragg in 1961, he strongly emphasizes that a successful counterinsurgency strategy must begin long before native dissidents are ready for—or even thinking of—guerrilla warfare. Why then mount military operations against them? In Rostow's view, the answer is very simple. Native dissidents represent, at the very least, a latent Soviet or Chinese influence. Because of this, and for no other reason in Rostow's view, they must be destroyed. Counterinsurgency policy demands that America first must expand its influence in the underdeveloped world and, second, that it must use that influence to mount an offensive against Moscow's or Peking's "allies" there. From this standpoint it is not a strategy of containment (or of peaceful coexistence) since its defined objective is the diminution of Sino-Soviet influence by military means. In short, the logic of counterinsurgency has the logic of rollback built right in.

This brings up the third and critical myth, the myth that American policy is to be understood within the framework of conventional balance of power analysis. There is no balance of power in the world and perhaps never in modern history has the world been so distant from one. American power—military, economic, technical, political—stands at heights beyond the reach not only of its enemies separately but of the whole world together. Certainly the statement is noncontroversial if we exclude the Soviet Union. But what of the Soviets? Have they not the power to deter America in the international arena? To understand the answer to this question one must turn to one of the great disasters of our era, President Kennedy's victory in the Cuban missile crisis.

It is no quarrel with the necessity of President Kennedy's actions to call his victory a disaster. Yet it was in November, 1962, that the seeds of the rollback policy were sown. Ever since Hiroshima, Secretaries of Defense (as well as Presidents) have recited the familiar litany of America's destructive power—a power, they claimed, which dwarfed that of the Soviet Union and its allies. Until 1957, American officials really believed in the predominance of our power; accordingly, Dulles, like Acheson before him, could toy with the idea of a rollback policy. With the advent of the Soviet ICBM in 1957 the power equation seemed to change, and for several years there was serious concern in Washington, evidenced by military sniping at President Eisenhower, and culminating in the missile-gap controversy, that we had no such advantage over the Soviets. When President Kennedy won office on a pledge to restore American power in the world we should have taken that pledge seriously. JFK immediately added $6.5 billion to Eisenhower's last military budget. Later, his own first military (and space) budget exceeded Eisenhower's last by almost 50 per cent. But in spite of the impressive military build-up (unmatched by the Soviets) these fantastic expenditures represented, the Kennedy administration seemed at first unaware that it had broken through into a military position which promised relative freedom of action in the world.

Searfe, Daily Mail (London): Ben Roth

But continued official belief in the "balance of terror" ended with the Cuban missile crisis. As Washington understood the result, the Soviets backed down. Faced with the prospect of testing the power implicit in the Kennedy rearmament program (which was not even at that time fully completed), Moscow turned away. It is not necessary to argue here whether or not this was indeed the significance of what happened. The important point is that Washington so interpreted it, and still does.

President Kennedy's victory in the Cuban missile crisis was a disaster because it persuaded high government figures that we had no serious rival, that when push came to shove, there was only one international superpower. Russian core interests did not extend to war over Cuba; the Soviet Union was only a regional power. Thus it followed that, provided Russia's regional interests were not directly threatened, the United States had a free hand elsewhere. It is now evident that elsewhere included North Vietnam. Was it an accident of timing that the Administration began bombing North Vietnam while Premier Kosygin was visiting Hanoi? Though our information on the attack is as yet incomplete, it may well have been intended as a sharp reminder to the Russians that they had neither the means nor the interest to involve themselves in a major conflict with the United States in the Far East. The Johnson Administration has learned the lesson of 1962 only too well. The bombing JFK was afraid to risk in Cuba in 1962, LBJ may risk with impunity in North Vietnam today.

To analyze our policies in Vietnam and elsewhere is also to diagnose their source and thereby to suggest, if only implicitly, the counter responses which are appropriate. Those who accept the three myths are inevitably placed in a position of arguing that in some fundamental sense only stupidity, ignorance—for some, neurosis—stand between current policy and a better, somewhat more humane and peaceful future. To accept such a conclusion is to be arrogant, abusive, unhistorical and, worse, ineffectual. The plain fact is that our current policy is led by able and determined men with coherent—if disagreeable—conceptions of the vast opportunities open to America's unchecked power, and the conscious will to use arbitrary force to achieve their ends. Accordingly, the appropriate response is not to educate them, enlighten them, psychoanalyze them, or even abuse them. Those who oppose them must begin instead to devise serious strategies for replacing them and, more important, the institutions and doctrines which have shaped them. These, the real villains of the piece, include bipartisan foreign policy, Executive supremacy in foreign affairs, Congressional generosity to Defense and Space, the imperial mechanisms of foreign aid, the militarism of our civilian leadership, the doctrine of America's special responsibility for world leadership. It will be difficult to carry out a dramatic change in all those areas, but that program offers the only realistic alternative to the thirty-year series of "little wars" which Secretary McNamara, the Bundys and the Rostows so willfully predict.

CALIFORNIA REVOLUTION 3

THE SOIL BENEATH THE BLACKTOP

RICHARD G. LILLARD

Mr. Lillard is the author of three books dealing with aspects of conservation in the West: Desert Challenge, The Great Forest and Eden in Jeopardy (all Knopf). He is a professor of English at California State College (Los Angeles).

Ever since that fateful publicity event, the gold rush, California ranching and agriculture have been special marvels. Whether expanding to grandiose proportions or contracting because of unusual disasters, they have been a conditioning part of the exceptional, imagination-catching role of California. The good earth of the spacious Golden State, graced by the only areas of Mediterranean climate in the United States, has enabled California to be the leader of innovations in crops and marketing, in labor relations and in automation. The state is also a leader in obliterating the best soils and in devising projects to rescue them and keep them in production.

Commercial growing in California has been tied to the unparalleled variety of local climates and soils in the plains and valleys and mountains, from the fog-cooled coasts to the hot, wind-swept interior deserts. It is related to the limited and irregular natural water supply and the long, dry summers, which have led men to carry out extraordinary water works, pumping dry the earth's crust and creating the longest rivers in the known geological history of the state.

A century ago the problem for California agriculture was the distance between its orchards and fields and the consuming population back East. The solution was trans-continental railroads and, later, trucks and airplanes. Now the problem is that too many millions of Californians spill from the cities onto good farming land. The solution, up to now, has been to bulldoze the farm and import food from distant states to the east.

Though the population burgeons its millions more per decade and becomes increasingly a market for the state's produce, fewer and fewer citizens are willing to pick crops under traditional California conditions. As a result, California farm workers now lead America in trying to upgrade their lives, and farm owners lead America in trying to replace workers with machinery.

Nowhere have non-Southern farmers more abused workers or resisted attempts to improve working conditions; yet nowhere else have farmers been quicker to run to federal and state agricultural agencies, especially the state university, to get socialized help in solving every sort of problem except the "labor problem."

In its way, California agriculture has made radical breaks with the past. Though farmers have been Republicans, and ever ready to rally to the cause of free enterprise, they have since the 1890s set precedents in forming cooperative water and irrigation systems and weather-predicting agencies. They have created scores of large and efficient cooperative marketing associations, dominated by the big growers and backed by state and federal laws on controlled marketing. Walnut growers made the trademark "Diamond" famous. Raisin growers established their "Sun Maid," and avocado raisers gave "Calavo" to the retail world. Prune and apricot people likewise pooled their efforts, as did almond growers, cattlemen and others. The lemon and orange growers' exchanges merged into California Fruit Growers Exchange and later Sunkist Growers, Inc.; now the Sunkist teletype systems span the United States and Canada and link the principal markets of the globe.

During the first century of statehood California's agriculture was a biological triumph. Early explorers of the coasts and river valleys—Portola, Anza, Vancouver —saw much sand and rock, much seared grass and dry plain. But after heavy-eating gold seekers created a local consumers' market and the long railroads opened up the continent, Californians turned square miles of nondescript bottom and foothill land into cattle or sheep ranches, grain and vegetable fields, and vineyards and orchards. Scattered over a distance of 900 miles, favored spots became oases of almonds, figs, apricots, cherries, prunes, peaches, hops, oranges, lemons, English walnuts, celery, lettuce, wheat, barley, alfalfa, wine grapes. Individuals and government agents experimented endlessly with imported livestock, including camels and ostriches, and with plants from all the green continents.

There have been notable successes in adapting plants and their environment to each other, as, for example, dates, grapefruit and winter vegetables near Palm Springs; alfalfa, cantaloupe and cattle feeding in the Imperial Valley; apple orchards along the coast near Monterey, Easter lilies along the extreme northwest coast, or rice on the hot plains alongside the upper Sacramento River. California developed the world capitals for lima beans, asparagus, figs and raisins, avocados. Portions of four Southern California counties became the Orange Empire. Coastal valleys produced more than half of the world's flower seeds.

This gigantic task in landscape architecture took place largely between 1870 and 1940. It turned entire flatland vistas, the flanks of long ranges, and vast blanched desert slopes into carefully tended open space. It was beautiful and enchanting; in the blossom seasons it was as fragrant as later it was profitable. Far from destroying natural beauty, most farmers had improved upon the original brush, flood plains and willow bottoms.

California, a leading commercial and industrial state, has balanced its economy by also being the leading agricultural state in value and variety of production. It grows commercially more than 200 crops, and ranks first in forty-three of them. The Experiment Station Extension Service calmly claims that California "productivity and variety [have] never been matched anywhere in the world's history."

In order to protect this gigantic "agribusiness," California guards its border like a military state, inspecting cars and trucks for pests. Inside the state, farmers and their advisers carry on a multifold biological, mechanical and chemical war against more than 100 species of insects and mites (most of them as exotic as the crops they infest), plus many fungi and viruses, as well as gophers. In the 19th century, Californians pioneered in the use of benign insects to prey on harmful insects, as when they imported an Australian ladybird beetle to control the citrus-loving mealy bug. The more recent chemical war on pests, largely successful, though speeding up the evolution of resistant strains, is also highly effective in killing beneficial insects like bees, harmless birds, other wildlife and perhaps—slowly—human beings. The result, as Rachel Carson pointed out with California examples in Silent Spring, is a "web of death."

California is now also the country's leading automobile state, and the car is a special threat to its crops. Increasingly since around 1944, fumes from crankcases and exhaust pipes have created smog on sunny days, damaging alfalfa, cotton and grapes. In twenty years some ten different crops were driven out of the Los Angeles area. Spinach was the first to go, its leaves spoiled by brown spots and by bronzing or silvering on the lower sides. The same happened to celery, beets, mustard leaves, romaine lettuce and other edible greens. Farmers, themselves prodigal users of cars and other gasoline-powered machines, face the prospect of joining the incipient revolt against the internal combustion engine.

In pilot social reform as in sheer gigantism of production, California agriculture is also showing the way. Growers now confront an economic revolution that they have long tried to prevent or delay. There is an unprecedented push to unionize hands in field and orchard and in packing sheds. After a century, farmers can foresee an end to their variation on the hacienda system of old Mexico. California's specialized farms have needed extra labor only during certain seasons. Since workers could not stay all year for a few months' work, they became migrants, falling into an itinerant annual cycle of subservience and exploitation, rootlessness and misery.

After World War II, the bracero program, negotiated with Mexico, gave imported workers a basic and guaranteed standard of living and earning. Native workers did not come under this protection, and now that ethical and economic pressures have ended the bracero system, the archaic farm workers system is also ending. Professional farm workers, often Americans with Spanish names and Mexican or Filipino faces, are organizing, evolving to a new level of self-respect and of national concern.

The center of this movement for more than a year has been Delano, a small town in the lower San Joaquin Valley, where grape pickers went on strike in September, 1965. Their leader was a native American, Cesar Chavez, director of the National Farm Workers Association (NFWA). Backed by other AFL-CIO unions, by religious groups and liberals, opposed by millionaire owners and their small-town henchmen, the strike attracted international attention in the press and celebrated itself in a narrative account called Huelga. It ran a credit union, published a magazine, and supported a gay slapstick satirical troupe that put on skits in Spanish about landlords and the workers' problems.

Despite competition from the Teamsters' union, the NFWA astonished many when it signed an agreement with vineyards controlled by Schenley and won bargaining elections with the tough, recalcitrant, union-hating (but Teamster-preferring) Di Giorgio Corporation at ranches in Delano and Arvin.

Related to the development of farm workers' unions—making them possible and also perhaps making both unions and workers largely obsolete—is the new drive to mechanize agriculture. The machines invented to replace workers are designed at several branches of the University of California and in the shops of private engineers like those employed by Sunkist. Since their market at first is only in California, they do not attract national firms. They are manufactured by alert, small California firms such as Blackwelder of Rio Vista, Cochrane of Salinas, and Handling Equipment of Torrance.

The present technical development goes far beyond the earlier Eastern inventions for harvesting grains and the early California concern with machines to level and work farm soils and to cut drainage or irrigation systems. The California challenge to engineers has not been hay or barley or cotton but specialties like carrots, melons, dates, lemons, celery, bell peppers and oranges that take relatively huge amounts of hand labor. As this labor has become scarce or expensive or firmly self-respecting, the interlocking United States Department of Agriculture, California State Department of Agriculture and the university have set to work redesigning crops and inventing machinery to harvest them. Men are at work breeding asparagus, grapes, melons, even sesame seed that can be machine harvested. Tomato plants, the result of computer-controlled genetic breeding, have fruits of the same size, conveniently shaped, mostly ripening at the same time, and allegedly tasting like tomatoes; they can be picked all at once by a machine that pulls up the plant. Lettuce pickers that move as fast as a man can walk are equipped with pressure sensors to feel if a head is ready to pick, memory devices and automatic knives to cut the stem. A cucumber machine carries pickers who ride stretched out on their stomachs above the equally prostrate vines.

To facilitate harvesting, fig, apple, peach and lemon orchards have been pruned with low flat "plateau" tops, and costs of picking may soon lead to clipping the shapely rounded tops of orange trees to the dead level of butch haircuts. Indeed, citrus fruits, first and most famous of the California orchard bonanzas, have undergone the longest studies. These began in the 1890s with mechanical sorting, and have since included fruit washers, bulk handling in the orchard, natural coloring of fruits by use of ethylene, trade-marking directly on each fruit, orchard heating on frosty nights, and systems planning of everything from placement of trees to layout in packing houses and warehouses. Instead of climbing a ladder, the picker rides in a cockpit on the end of a boom. He uses a push button to position himself. He picks an orange and deposits it in a tube that gently drops it to a box at the bottom of the machine. Studies are under way to devise machines for shaking citrus fruit off trees into canvas catchers, or for harvesting by means of an oscillating air blast.

More serious than the weather, the insects, the labor organizers and the difficulties of mechanizing the harvest is the ominous urban growth. The very population that hungers for fresh produce threatens to crowd agriculture out of the state. At the moment, much farm activity survives only by escaping. Like the restless, ever-migrant population of California, agriculture is on the move. Whole dairies join the caravan, moving farther and farther away from the cities that use their milk and cottage cheese. Nurseries, their tons of portable trees in cans and barrels, take to the road in flight from shopping centers and apartment houses. While some crop specialties are certain to disappear, their unique soils smothered under jerry-built homes and shopping centers, other crops can make big jumps over mountain ranges to whole new watersheds.

In the old and famous parts of California, agriculture is being steadily paved or roofed over. The change in the areas surrounding Ventura and Los Angeles, San Jose and Santa Clara, Sacramento and San Diego is as visible and as significant as that from one geological epoch to another. Though minor California officials—experts—mutter now and then, there is no wide public concern over the destruction of the fertile oases of prime, unparalleled, irreplaceable land. The masses are too preoccupied with bowling alleys, race tracks and drive-in theatres to care about the soil beneath the blacktop.

After World War II, Southern California began the ever more rapid alteration of its landscape. Olives, muscat grapes, bee culture and turkey raising were already centered in Northern California; now from the broad sweep of established agriculture south of the Tehachapi Mountains, Southern California specialties began to depart for the eastern deserts or for the northern valleys, where walnuts, head lettuce, olives, celery, artichokes and dairying developed new production enclaves.

During and after World War II, as millions arrived to make ships and planes or to ride them off to the wars, the trend to put homes and factories on farmland took over in Northern California as well. This time there were fewer opportunities for agriculture to move. Though government at all levels began to tinker with zoning and planning, it made no plans for agriculture. For the building and loan companies, the mortgage companies, the big real estate operators (often Easterners), the contractors with their fleets of bulldozers and other earth-moving apparatus, the state highway engineers (who hate trees, dislike curves and shudder at the word beauty), and allied county supervisors and state legislators—for all those who profited from "Progress," the rancher and farmer were like the Indian of yore. They were wasters of open space. Sound investment, the needs of a forward-looking population, GNP, and other mystical phrases called for action: they turned orchards and fields, flower-seed farms, feed lots and dairy barns, range land and forests of second-growth timber into housing tracts, new towns, freeways, airfields, reservoirs, drive-in churches, department stores, amusement parks, factories, warehouses, junk yards, military camps, missile bases, golf links (themselves vulnerable to apartment house builders) and parking lots for square miles of motionless motor vehicles.

These new space users, said to be good economics, were created at a heavy cost in scenery and environment, regional flavor and local identity. The new users threatened the balance of the state's economy, for a state without agriculture is badly off. Prices of fruits, vegetables and milk went up. Flavorful California oranges became so expensive that the oncoming generations came to prefer frozen orange concentrate, relatively tasteless, from out of state.

In the late 1950s, men began to foresee the end of agriculture in the most productive parts of California. Bulldozers were uprooting orange trees at the rate of one every fifty-five seconds. Of these, countless thousands each week were in Los Angeles County, where for a time earth-moving machinery destroyed 3,000 acres of orange orchard a day.

It was not only citrus trees that lost their hold on the earth. Bulldozers shoved out prime apricot orchards in Hemet Valley, chicken farms in Arcadia, hop fields in the American River bottom land near Sacramento, spinach and onions on the Santa Maria plain, lima beans in Oxnard, olive groves in San Fernando Valley, where the 2,000-acre grove at Sylmar had been "the largest single olive grove in the world." The stately palms were felled in the Indio date gardens, where soils and trees alike represented a half-century of ingenuity, to make way for motels and tracts of trailers. The big shovels ripped into avocado orchards on the hills of Fallbrook and Vista, a region designed by destiny for raising the fruit delicacy. Housing contractors, or highway builders, or both, hacked into pear orchards on fabulous soil south of Clear Lake and into grapevines of what once was "the globe's largest vineyard," an inspiring panorama on the sandy alluvial fans of Cucamonga. The slopes between Stanford University (once lovingly called "The Farm") and San Jose, which in 1940 were a modern Eden of orchards and truck gardens, got roofed over into a routine patchwork suburbia.

In 1963, California was converting 375 acres of agricultural land a day to meet the urban needs of newcomers. Most of these acres were from the one-sixth of the state that is relatively good soil. A million acres of prime soil have been lost since 1945 and many more will be lost, as things are going. A few years ago the Governor's Advisory Committee on Housing saw the population as doubling by 1980, with the state then 90 per cent urbanized. A private housing expert has predicted that in the next fifteen years Californians will build as many new houses as they built between the time of the first Spanish adobe and today.

Americans face no foreseeable famine, no shortages of calories. They can always eat wheat, corn, soy beans, beef and eggs. But they may well have to forget the delights of California oranges, table grapes, wines, walnuts, winter peas, early melons and fall raspberries. Gone perhaps will be crops that Americans grow only in California: Persian melons, avocados, persimmons, artichokes, almonds, figs, garlic, nectarines, olives, pomegranates and certain de luxe dates that grow below level near Thermal.

Grave concern over the loss of farm land to subdivisions and industrial and military uses has stimulated radical proposals for salvation—California pioneers in cures as in catastrophes. One device used by farmers to save their occupations from city people has been to incorporate their lands to form "cities"—Dairy Valley, to save milk farms, or Fremont, to save orchards. But a basic problem has been a constitutional provision that county assessors must value all land for tax purposes on the basis of "the highest and best use"—a rule that dooms a cauliflower field if a "de luxe" housing tract goes up next to it. Thanks to leapfrog and "scatteration" developments, many farmers have had their taxes suddenly spurt up above their income from the land. One Sacramento almond grower had a 2,446 per cent tax increase in one year.

In 1966, the voters passed an amendment that bases assessments and taxes for open space on actual use, not on development potential. This welcome step had been anticipated by the legislature a year before in the California Land Conservation Act, designed to create agricultural "preserves," analogous to the wilderness areas established elsewhere in the country. These are set up by contracts between farmers and local governments, with tax concessions for continuing to farm. The Act of 1965 and the Amendment of 1966 assert that California's cities should grow solid, concentrate and mature, instead of impetuously racing out on all sides, putting up buildings at random, leaving no rural sweep of scene. The laws imply that taxation is not just a way to raise money; it is also an expression of public policy.

The 1966 Amendment, if properly implemented by legislative action, will greatly help Californians to retain the nonurban landscape that still remains. The legislature will bear close watching, and this will be done by enlightened farming interests, including some big old ranches, and by new nonprofit organizations, bright, alert, properly aggressive, such as California Tomorrow, with its quarterly Cry California, and the Planning and Conservation League for Legislative Action, which keeps a full-time lobbyist in Sacramento.

The one overall cure for the loss of agricultural domain is state-wide planning, administered by a state commission as removed from monetary pressures and politics as is the state supreme court. Such a body could apply suggestions such as those in the report on open spaces made by the landscape architects firm of Eckbo, Dean, Austin and Williams, of whom the State Office of Planning requested "truly bold proposals." The report, full of new legal, fiscal and ideological concepts, is part of the State Development Plan, years in preparation, which considers agricultural and other open space, as well as cities, fish and game, and varied amenities. The plan goes to the new Governor early this year and gives him a chance to assure agriculture and every other broad life-sustaining value a due and permanent place under the California sun.

The program will involve the old idea, long forgotten, now revolutionary again, that private ownership of land has narrow limits, that it is only a license to use land or water surface. This license is granted by society on the understanding that certain rules are obeyed and certain fees (called taxes) are regularly paid, also provided that society does not have a higher use for the land and water. Many arrangements are possible: eminent domain proceedings, followed by restricted leasebacks; purchase by the state of certain rights; contractual arrangements prohibiting urbanization, with either the state or the individual owning the fee simple. The basic idea is that we need a new land ethic: it must become illegal to destroy beauty, violate ecology, smash history—to extinguish the natural things that give value to human life.

Anyone who views the present chaotic surface of the state may find it hard to believe that California will—soon enough—create an all-powerful state planning commission. But then it is also hard to believe that Californians will let their agriculture, like their scenery, like their clean sea water and clear atmosphere, pass into oblivion. Unless the state has changed utterly from what it was in the past, answers will come out of California as the pinch, already felt, becomes an ultimatum. The state that has led the way in crop production, cooperative selling, unionization of grape pickers, mechanization of orchards, and calculated destruction of agricultural marvels can also lead the way in planning.

California can do whatever it wants. It can use its mountains to fill in San Francisco Bay and the ocean above the continental shelf and there build more suburbs and parking lots. It can exterminate any and all species of birds, mammals and plants. Or it can restrict or ban the car, the bulldozer, the subdivider and the speculator. It can save or reconstitute much of its agriculture, as it can much of its shore line and mountain back country. Salvation is as possible as destruction.

PROPERTY TAX SCANDALS

BAD LAWS & CRAFTY ASSESSORS

MICHAEL HARRIS

Mr. Harris is on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle.

San Francisco

A few hundred canceled checks, some astonishingly frank contracts, a wealth of confidential signed memoranda, and thousands of pages of detailed testimony have opened up a real estate tax scandal which centers for the moment in California, but whose implications spread across the country. In bribery trials held so far, three county tax assessors, two lesser assessment officials and three tax consultants have been sentenced to prison. A fourth assessor committed suicide while he was under investigation, and two deputy assessors were let off with substantial fines.

There is still no way of telling when or where the current series of trials will end. More are scheduled for this spring, and the scandal is spreading. The tax consultants whose pay-offs were revealed last year in trials in San Francisco, Oakland, Seattle and San Diego have clients also in Florida, Maine, Ohio, Illinois, New York and other states.

The tax consultant plies a quiet trade on behalf of the corporations who retain him. It is his job to try to persuade city and county assessors to reduce assessments on real estate holdings, buildings, inventories and machinery—thereby cutting his client's local tax bill. Sometimes he works on a contingent fee basis. In San Francisco, remarkably clear-cut arrangements were made for splitting the tax savings. Thus, a $20,000 tax reduction might be shared as follows: $10,000 to the client, $5,000 to the tax consultant, and $5,000 to the assessor. The State Attorney General's Office has estimated that $200 million worth of property was illegally left off the tax rolls in California.

The consultant does not always persuade by bribery. Sometimes he can convince assessors that there are valid reasons for lower assessments. Sometimes he uses the implicit threat that a company required to pay its proper share of local taxes will move to a more tolerant area. And sometimes, as tax consultant James C. Tooke observed, a local assessor fails to realize how much his help is worth and settles for a modest campaign contribution or no cash at all.

Assessor Russell L. Wolden of San Francisco had no such misconception of his value. Wolden, who succeeded his father as assessor in 1938, maintained a fully staffed country estate in a suburb south of San Francisco. His city apartment was in a building elegant enough to house also a president of the Bank of America and the board chairman of Levi Strauss & Co. The difference, as it developed in Wolden's bribery trial, was that the bank president and the manufacturer of levis paid for their apartments; Wolden was not only excused from making any down payment but received $37,500 in stock in the building without having to put up any investment at all.

The profession of tax consulting was almost unknown outside assessing circles when the scandal first broke eighteen months ago, and almost everyone involved in the case, from newspaper reporter to prosecutor to judge, had first to be told what a tax consultant was and what he did.

They were provided with five filing cabinets of documents to advance their education. This highly confidential material, containing canceled checks and other evidence of pay-offs, was taken on July 4, 1965, from Tooke's tax consulting office in Castro Valley, a suburb of Oakland, by Norman A. Phillips, a disgruntled employee. The next couple of weeks were devoted to negotiations, some of them tape recorded, between Phillips and Tooke for the return of the material.

For a while the secrets contained in the files appeared to be safe, but on July 16, it became my fortune, as a reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle, to come into possession of copies of documents listing pay-offs from a single company to a single assessor. Phillips, through incredible carelessness, had left behind the originals in a private airplane. Once the material was in the hands of a reporter, the chances for hushing up the scandal vanished.

Meanwhile, Phillips had turned for advice to John M. Thorpe, a lawyer from nearby Hayward, who recommended that the files should be turned over to law-enforcement authorities—and the quicker, the better. While Phillips was considering this, he realized that something had happened to his secret. On July 20, he therefore agreed to deliver the bulk of his documents to Thorpe's office. A small force composed of Thorpe, two of his associates, Deputy State Attorney General Marshall S. Mayer and myself worked through the night, making copies of the material. (Mayer later became the leader of a law-enforcement task force that aided in investigations throughout California, the state of Washington, in Arizona and Florida.)

Just before dawn, we trucked the five filing cabinets to a decayed Victorian mansion that we had decided to use as a temporary hiding place for the records. I then interviewed the local officials who had been named as receiving pay-offs and wrote the first of my articles. After the article appeared, the files were turned over to the Alameda County sheriff.

In the following months, the results of the scandal began to come in. Assessor A. J. Steen of King County (Seattle) and his chief aide resigned from office, pleaded guilty to bribery, and were sentenced to ten years in prison. Assessor Donald E. Feragen of Alameda County was found guilty of bribery and is now in prison. Wolden's conviction ended the forty-year regime he and his father had maintained as assessors of San Francisco. He was removed from office, but is free while his case is on appeal. Tooke, who became the star prosecution witness in the trials of the assessors, was sentenced in mid-January to six months in county jail.

The next trial holds possibilities of some interesting testimony. Tooke's former employers, New Jersey tax consultants John Desmond and Jordan Van Cleve, have been under indictment in San Diego County for a little more than a year. Even so, their firm of Dawson, Desmond and Van Cleve has managed to remain busy.

I saw both of them last September in Toronto, where they maintained their traditional "hospitality" suite at the annual convention of the International Association of Assessment Officials. Desmond said then that the scandals had cost the firm about a third of its clients. "But we have a couple of hot new accounts coming up," he said. "And we've had a tremendous reception from the assessors."

It was perfectly apparent that he was speaking accurately. He introduced me to assessment officials from all over the country who were willing to stop by and have a drink or two with their friends at Dawson, Desmond and Van Cleve. Some of the assessors asked if Assessor Philip E. Watson of Los Angeles was secretly under investigation. He was indicted two months later, has denied the charges, and will stand trial.

The investigation spread to Arizona, where the State Tax Commission reported wild inconsistencies in assessment practices. For example, a jackass in Mohave County is assessed at $100, while jackasses in Navajo County are valued at only $2.15 apiece. In Cocino County the rate is $5, and no jackasses at all are reported resident in Maricopa County (Phoenix). There were more serious discrepancies, but the Arizona investigation foundered quickly because the Attorney General's Office there does not have the power of subpoena and thus cannot look at bank records or corporation files without permission of the firms under investigation.

Mayer was next called to Coral Gables, Fla., after Sheriff T. A. Buchanan of Dade County filed charges against County Assessor Rue Gewert. The sheriff said a comparison of the county's and the city's records showed that 184 firms assessed by Coral Gables were overlooked completely by Gewert. The assessor was also accused of granting deductions averaging 49 per cent in the assessments of fifty other firms.

No one has been able to provide a coherent explanation of what happened in Florida. The only thing that seems clear is that there were no heroes. Judge Henry L. Balaban, who was hearing the case, ordered both Gewert and the former Coral Gables assessor to meet with him in chambers, their lawyers being barred from the secret three-hour session. The sheriff meanwhile has been suspended on two bribery charges and Gewert has been fired—not for anything he may have done about assessments but for bugging the offices of other county officials. There is hope that a blue ribbon investigating commission that includes two professors and a leading Miami lawyer, will come up with a report that will tell Dade County residents where the assessment program now stands.

Mayer also went to Louisiana but dismissed the setup there as hopeless. The State Board of Equalization, whose membership includes Huey Long's sister, can do nothing—which is precisely what it is expected to do. The situation in Louisiana is perhaps only an exaggeration of what happens throughout the nation. Many assessment laws make no sense, and it would be cruel to attempt to execute them.

"If I were to enforce the law literally, I would effectively wreck the economy of our county with any year by driving out every national firm," Clifford Allen, assessor of Nashville and Davidson County in Tennessee, told me in an interview. Allen has concluded that it would be preposterous for him to obey a ninety-seven-year-old provision in the Tennessee Constitution that requires him to impose a full assessment on every bank account, stock certificate, bond and company treasury in his jurisdiction. "If we had obeyed the law this year, we would have taken $5.30 in taxes out of every $100 in the bank," Allen said. "If the money were in a 4 per cent savings account, that means that taxes would be taking every penny of interest and $1.30 besides. In effect, it would be confiscatory."

Allen said new assessment rules are needed in every state in the union. "We need to write them so a man can enforce them without doing injustice," he declared. Now assessment officials must operate outside the law and, Allen observed, "the temptations are too great."

Indeed, the decision of a new assessor literally to carry out the provisions of the California Constitution has left Sacramento in a state of shock. Dr. Irene Hickman, a 51-year-old osteopath, specialist in psychosomatic medicine and outspoken advocate of LSD, startled Sacramento's Establishment last year by defeating the incumbent assessor after producing evidence that some privately held property in the county was assessed at only 1 per cent of its market value. Her lack of experience for the job didn't trouble her; she is a long-time director and instructor in the community's Henry George School of Social Science.

The shock came when Dr. Hickman said she would carry out the state Constitution's requirement that "all property subject to taxation shall be assessed at its full cash value." This would quadruple the average assessment in the county, but Dr. Hickman said the taxpayer need not suffer because the county government, the cities and the school districts could cut their tax rates accordingly. The change would, however, cut off nearly all veterans' tax exemptions, produce a windfall of state aid for some school districts and a drought for others, and possibly result in big tax savings for the telephone company, the county's railroads and other utilities.

The state legislature, which has traditionally interpreted the plain constitutional language merely to mean that all property owners shall be treated alike, acted in the wake of the scandals last year by passing a reform bill that will require the assessing of all property at 25 per cent of its market value. But Dr. Hickman held fast: "I cannot conceive of the possibility that our state supreme court will fail to uphold the constitution," she said, "in which case all assessors will be bound by the full cash value provision."

Sacramento County counsel, John Henrich, plans to go into court to try to block Dr. Hickman. The State Board of Equalization, which is charged with seeing that all counties treat their taxpayers alike, declared its intention "to stop the damage." A key aide in Dr. Hick-man's office resigned to start a recall campaign. "But there's something in the law that says I have to be in my elected office six months before a recall could be started," commented Dr. Hickman, who was appointed assessor last fall to fill a vacancy but whose elective term began the first of this year. "Isn't it a glorious situation?"

In the other fifty-seven counties of California, the changes in assessment practices that followed the scandals have been less dramatic. Investigations have been ordered in more than half the state's counties, but in most cases Mayer and his colleagues have not recommended criminal action but have proposed stringent tightening of office procedures. Examples of unequal treatment of taxpayers have been abundant, but these in themselves do not prove corruption.

A major source of trouble is the secrecy that surrounds personal property tax assessments. Such property consists not only of household goods and clothing but—much more important from the tax standpoint—of business equipment and inventory. Records showing taxes on buildings and land are open to public inspection, and it is relatively easy in most communities for a taxpayer to see whether he is being assessed on these holdings at a higher rate than his neighbors. But state law in California provides that information about a company's inventory and machinery must be treated as confidential. The desire to protect business secrets is justified, but it sets aside an area in which corruption can exist undetected. And in fact it was in this area that the tax consultants proved most active.

The sums of money were impressive. Wolden's income tax returns, introduced in the trial, showed that in a six-year period the assessor declared a gross income of $362,147. Only $152,290 of this came in the form of salary, and Deputy District Attorney Francis W. Mayer of San Francisco, prosecutor in the three-month trial, convinced the jury that nearly all of Wolden's outside income was obtained illegally.

It would be pleasant to report that the convictions of Wolden and the other figures in the present assessment scandals ended the problem, but of course they did not. The solution does not rest merely in changing from one assessor to another—though in many cases that will surely help. Studies must be made, and from these studies legislation must be written to curb the now almost autocratic sway of assessors with definite boundaries and with rules that can be obeyed without producing disaster.

Beyond that, a deeper look must be taken into the property tax itself. It remains an unpopular tax, and it is difficult to escape the conclusion that it imposes too great a burden on a considerable number of people. It is not at all unusual to find in California owners whose property taxes have more than doubled in the last five years. Some of these people are elderly and living on retirement incomes; it is easy to understand that they have often been forced to move from homes they have occupied for a lifetime.

It is even easier to find people who will not vote for the most vital local bond issues because of their objection to high taxes. No tax is liked, but the unpopularity of the property tax is deeply deserved.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Alas, Poor Bertolt Brecht!

THE PLEBEIANS REHEARSE THE UPRISING: A German Tragedy. By Günter Grass. With an Introductory Address by the Author. Translated by Ralph Manheim. Harcourt, Brace & World. 122 pp. $4.50. Paper $1.95.

FREDERIC EWEN

Mr. Ewen is the co-author of the dramatic version of James Joyce's A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man and Thomas Mann's The Magic Mountain. He has written works on Schiller, Heine, and has recently completed Bertolt Brecht—His Art, His Life and His Times to be published this year by Citadel Press.

Alas, poor B. B.! Ten years in his grave, and still a thorn and provocation to his critics, and fellow dramatists! Alternately used as a whipping boy, or as a rod to chastise the German Democratic Republic, he defies his detractors and his equivocal "friends" and stands today as a most influential playwright and theoretician of the drama. His name inevitably crops up: Friedrich Dürrenmatt delivers a memorial address on Friedrich Schiller, and cannot forbear naming Brecht as a challenge to the "conscience" of mankind. Günter Grass, talking on Shakespeare and centering his discussion on Coriolanus, also brings in Brecht, calling him a "kind of privileged court jester."

Now Grass has written a play around Brecht and the uprising of June 17, 1953, Die Plebejer proben den Aufstand, subtitled A German Tragedy. What he means is a tragedy of Germany, that traditional incapacity of Germans to make a revolution, or of their intellectual to lead one.

The idea for The Plebeians Rehearse the Uprising is striking, even brilliant. It is to take a distinguished figure of world literature, whose literary commitment to the cause of the people and socialism is unquestioned, place him in a situation where that commitment is challenged by reality—and to examine how he behaves or should have behaved.

Since this is a pièce à clef, the principal characters in it are easily identifiable. The "Chief" or "Boss" is Brecht; Volumnia is Helene Weigel; Erwin is Brecht's lifelong theatrical associate Erich Engel; and Kosanke is Kuba, a prominent member of the Academy of Arts, here depicted as a hack mouth-piece of the government.

The time of the action is June 17, 1953. Brecht is in his theatre on the Schiffbauerdamm, about to begin a rehearsal of his version of Shakespeare's Coriolanus, the first scene of which will enact the beginnings of the revolt of the plebeians against the arrogant Roman general. The purport of the play is to demystify the hero, and show that he is a dispensable commodity. During the rehearsal, construction workers from the Stalinallee, who have left their jobs in protest against the increase of work norms ordered by the government, and the rising cost of living, come in and ask the "Boss" to support their cause with a written manifesto. Volumnia rushes in and urges Brecht to do so.

She is followed by Kosanke, who cries in a panic: "We need you. Only your name, your words can help us!" Brecht is unconvinced that German workers can ever really stage a revolution, but he sees excellent grist to his theatrical project here. Let them re-enact their uprising to the accompaniment of beer and sandwiches. The demonstrating workers now become actors on the stage, so as to supply fresh materials for Brecht's Coriolanus. Soon other worker delegates arrive from other parts of the country and prevail upon Brecht to write a letter to Walter Ulbricht. He does so. But it is a cynical letter, patched together from a number of Brecht's actual statements, burlesquing both the uprising and Ulbricht, and concluding with: "If this people doesn't suit you, comrade/Find one that suits you better." The outraged delegates decide to string up both Brecht and "Erwin" as traitors, but fortunately the latter has the bright idea of dissuading them by means of the celebrated parable of the belly and the "body's members" used by Menenius in Shakespeare's play. New arrivals—among them an eloquent lady hairdresser and a heroic mason—almost inspire Brecht to action, but the sound of tanks is heard, and the uprising is soon over. Kosanke appears once more, this time to demand Brecht's statement and his name, "the biggest name of all," in support of the government. Brecht writes what Volumnia calls a "pussy-footing" document of three sentences. Left alone, he muses: "Condemned to live forever with voices in my ears. You. You. I'll tell you. Do you know what you are? You, you, you're a. . . . You poor babes in the woods! Bowed down with guilt, I accuse you!"

This is Grass's Brecht: a sort of Hamlet. Aesthete with a sour conscience.

What was Grass's intent in writing this play? In attempting a historical play dealing with an important event and a notable contemporary figure (only recently deceased), Grass would seem to owe a special debt to uncovering a truth, especially one not easily available to his audience. Though, as Grass claims, certain documents have been kept under lock and key by Brecht's "heirs and his publishing house," there are some facts available west of the Berlin Wall. Such facts may not have been at hand in 1953; but they were in 1965 or 1966. If West German periodicals, such as Der Spiegel and the Frankfurter Hefte have access to them, why not Grass? In addition, there are a number of former associates and friends of Brecht, now in West Germany, to whom he might have turned: Ernst Bloch, Hans Mayer or Alfred Kantorowicz.

Now, according to these West German sources, what are the facts?

On the 16th of June, Brecht became aware of the threatening crisis and called upon his friend and labor expert, Jacob Walcher, for advice and information. On the following morning, he postponed a rehearsal of Strittmatter's Katzgraben (an important play dealing with conflicts in a farming area) in order to arrange for a discussion of the situation created by the demonstrations. He also planned a broadcast of workers' songs, but was denied access to the radio station. If we take Brecht at his own word, he was aware that the workers had justifiable grievances, and that the Communist authorities had committed serious errors in failing to anticipate and correct them, but he was also wary that such demonstrations might be turned to counterrevolutionary ends by Fascist and demagogic elements (which indeed did take place sporadically). Objective West German historians like Arnulf Baring (who is quoted frequently in the English supplement of the play) are agreed that the demonstrations were directed toward securing economic changes and improvements but not at overthrowing the government. Baring also notes that "in any case . . . the revolutionary wave was already broken before the Soviet troops marched in."

On the morning of the 17th, Brecht addressed identical letters to Walter Ulbricht, Otto Grotewohl and the Soviet Commandant, in which he affirmed his loyalty to the Communist (Socialist Unity) Party of East Germany, but also asked for a re-examination of the government's policies. Here, so far as is known, is the entire text of that letter:

History will pay due respect to the revolutionary impatience of the Socialist Unity Party. The great discussion with the masses about the tempo of socialist construction will lead to sifting and securing of our socialist achievements. At this moment I feel the need to express my solidarity with the Socialist Unity Party.

The Communist East German newspaper, Neues Deutschland, reprinted only the last sentence. (The documentary supplement of the English version of the play erroneously suggests that the entire letter quoted above was actually only the last of three paragraphs written by Brecht.)

Brecht followed the letter with a telegram to Ulbricht, in which he expressed the hope that "the provocateurs will be isolated, and their network destroyed, but that the workers who had demonstrated their justifiable grievances, will not be placed on the same footing as the provocateurs, so that the great discussion about errors committed on all sides may not break down at the start."

As for Brecht's private feelings, they are sufficiently revealed in the published poems and prose. Here he implores those in authority "to tell the truth. Not like fleeing Caesars, promising flour, but like Lenin, saying: We are lost, unless. . . ." Elsewhere he berates them for looking at reality through rose-tinted glasses. There is the satirical poem (travestied in the play) in which he refers to the circulars distributed by the Writers' Union, stating that "the people had forfeited the confidence of the government and could regain it only through redoubled work. Would it not really be simpler if the government dissolved the people and elected another one?"

But it seems to me that Grass is most offensive when he deals with Brecht's own words and thoughts. Why distort one of Brecht's most celebrated poems, "Bad Morning," written not long after the 17th, describing a nightmare in which he sees the work-torn and mangled fingers of workers, and which concludes with

Unwissende! schrie ich Schuldbewusst —

You who do not know! I cried Guilt-stricken,

and turn this into

*You who do not know,
Guilt-stricken I accuse you?
(My emphasis.)*

What sort of understanding of Brecht could have prompted Grass to make the poet say, penitently, "We can't change Shakespeare, unless we change ourselves," no doubt a worthy sentiment, but how untrue to Brecht, who contended throughout his life that it was by "changing Shakespeare," and by changing the character of the theatre from an instrument which merely interprets life that he would be enabled to change the minds of men and their activities.

Or what suggested to Grass the absurd notion that only Brecht could save the state at that critical moment—as he makes the official Kossanke say? A West German critic benignly remarks that here one finds a "certain overestimation of the role of letters, especially in Germany. Were a revolution to break out, Germans would be the last to call on their cultural popes."

Of Brecht's courageous past, no mention, except snide references to his early nihilism.

Alas, poor Brecht! He's dead and can't reform or defend himself. There are people who cannot forgive him for not having chosen the West, so they must paint a Brecht who sold out to the East—for a theatre! Günter Grass's play will only confirm them in their projections. And that is a shame, because Grass is himself a "politicalized" writer, not unaware of the current wave of neo-Nazism in West Germany.

The play is a clever idea aborted. Ralph Manheim's translation is faithful and literate, though it sometimes attenuates Grass's deliberate coarseness.

GUNTER GRASS'S OPEN LETTER TO KURT KIESINGER

From Die Zeit of December 13, 1966

Dear Mr. Kiesinger:

. . . Wittingly or not, most of the fathers of my generation assisted in the crimes committed after 1933. The schism that this creates has been overcome in many German families by the fathers' admission of complicity and the sons' desire to understand. As an adult, Mr. Kiesinger, you became a member of the Nazi Party in 1933, and only the capitulation of the German forces terminated your membership.

Permit me to employ a fiction: If you were my father, I should ask you to explain your crucial decision of 1933. I should be able to understand it because the majority of the fathers of my generation lost their best years from just such wrong decisions. But suppose that you, as my father, were to ask me: "I have the opportunity to become chancellor. I am profoundly interested in politics. . . . The people support me. Shall I say yes?" Then I, as your son, would answer: "Just because you are so deeply interested in politics, because you aspire to participate in foreign affairs, you must say no. Because in that case you should know that in this country of unresolved obligations, in this divided land with no peace treaty, the chancellor cannot be a man who, once in the past, acted against reason and served evil, when those who followed reason and resisted crime perished for their stand. Propriety should prevent you from calling yourself a resistance fighter this late in the game."

You, Mr. Kiesinger, are not my father, but I hope you have a son who will thus oppose your unfortunate decision. . . .

How shall German youth oppose the old party now coming to life in the NPD if you burden the office of chancellor with your past? How shall we hold in memory the tortured, murdered resistance fighters, the dead of Auschwitz and Treblinka, if you, a fellow traveler from the past, dare to lay down the guidelines for politics today? How shall history be taught hereafter in our schools? . . . Will the pro-Stalinist Ulbricht now be able to point his finger at us? Is there no man in the SPD/CSU/CDU sufficiently unencumbered by old deeds to become chancellor? . . .

The responsibility is yours, but we shall bear the consequences and the shame.

Still respectfully,
Günter Grass

Divided Hearts at the Wall

TWO VIEWS. By Uwe Johnson. Translated by Richard and Clara Winston. Harcourt, Brace & World. 183 pp. $4.50.
DIVIDED HEAVEN. By Christa Wolf. Translated by Joan Becker. Seven Seas Books (Berlin). 218 pp. $1 paper.

DAVID CAUTE

Mr. Caute is the author, most recently, of The Left in Europe Since 1789 (McGraw-Hill) and the novel, The Decline of the West (Macmillan). He is visiting professor in the Albert Schweitzer Humanities program at New York University.

The wealthiest West German newspaper magnate is now erecting a prestigious glass skyscraper within a few yards of the Berlin Wall. From their (no doubt) sleekly decorated and superbly mechanized offices, the representatives of the free-world press will survey the wide, desolate streets of the Eastern sector, while the captive population of a satellite state will be provided with one further reminder of the enticements of the dynamic, entrepreneurial and pluralistic society from which they are forcibly separated.

Or so we are told. In reality, the situation is more complex and more ambiguous. An East German official, proudly surveying the Wall, remarked to me two years ago: freedom to choose war is no freedom. But this formula is equally inconclusive. Two weeks in East Berlin left me with a strong desire to get out—and to go back. When compared with the East, West Berlin is undoubtedly a haven of cultural freedom and experimentation, of creativity and dissent. Yet it remains a city whose gloss and glamour are artificial, a showcase bubble sustained only by a steady in-pouring of American and federal money. The Eastern half of Berlin speaks for a regime which has paid for the war in full; drained by reparations, the GDR allocated its scarce resources to workers' houses, new schools and social insurance. The flood tide of refugees who forced Ulbricht to construct his Wall were certainly choosing freedom, but they were simultaneously escaping from the logical consequences of German history.

Both Two Views and Divided Heaven, one a novel from the West and the other from the East, make large efforts to wrestle with the tragic ambiguities of a divided Germany. Neither, I feel, wholly succeeds. There are superficial thematic resemblances. In Two Views, a West German photographer helps an East Berlin nurse to escape; in Divided Heaven, an East German technician defects to the West and then tries to persuade his girl to follow him. In both cases it is the impatient, individualistic male who most naturally identifies himself with the West, while the female is pictured as more passively integrated and more conditioned by her roots and by inculcated values. Uwe Johnson's Beate, a young woman increasingly alienated by the conformities, scarcities and restrictive rules of the hospital and city in which she works, nevertheless disperses only with difficulty her vision of the West as sinful and doomed. The bonds which link Christa Wolf's Rita to her native East are those that bind the fetus to the womb.

Although Divided Heaven is only mildly didactic, it never travels far from a familiar formula. The heroine must make her choice against and in spite of the transitionally negative features of a Socialist society in its first, formative years: acquisitive instincts, inertia, the complacency and dogmatism of party functionaries in whom harsh slogans have displaced the human dimension. The individual who, like Rita's lover Manfred, allows his private resentments and his skepticism to accumulate to the point of physical defection is depicted as a lost soul, the victim of a tragic heritage, of an original and perpetually re-emergent sin. He is seduced by the false gods which lie both within himself and to the West.

Christa Wolf is not a writer who penetrates deeply. Although she writes sensibly and her story moves along, one is again struck by the fatigued traditionalism of style and structure which stands between so much Socialist literature and real artistic achievement. Frequently Divided Heaven echoes the banal and trivial tone of the romantic novel: "My little brown girl, Manfred called her"; "his look made her tremble"; "she had never before seen a man's face reflected in the water beside her own." Yet there is a difference. Rita's loyal and difficult commitment to the proud and frustrated technician, Manfred, holds the attention mainly because it is rooted in a real social milieu containing its own, intelligently observed contradictions. In the Western magazine serial, the heroine's perception of the masculine universe rarely transcends a keen bourgeois preoccupation with the size of her fiancé's income and the style of expenditure which it offers her. But Rita works in a predominantly male factory brigade, turning out railroad wagons. Through her eyes and those of her co-workers we are shown, quite plausibly, the technical problems and human tensions peculiar to a centralized state economy on the German model. Novelists have always found it easy to ignore work, particularly proletarian work, which is the source of all our lives and pleasures. It is therefore hardly surprising that in the modern Socialist novel the intrusion of this theme sometimes appears gratuitous and false. Even so, the effort is rewarding.

Uwe Johnson is a novelist of an altogether superior caliber. His hero, or anti-hero, Dietbert, is a 25-year-old free-lance photographer whose values and projects extend only dimly beyond girls and cars. "In unoccupied moments, when he had done his prescribed work, even in the midst of a sales talk, or when washing shirts, he felt empty, lent himself to any distraction, hunted them

PINTER'S "THE HOMECOMING"

"A MASTERFUL PLAY. PINTER IS AN ARTIST, ONE OF THE BEST TO HAVE ENTERED THE WORLD'S STAGE IN THE LAST TEN YEARS."

—Harold Clurman, The Nation

THE ROYAL SHAKESPEARE COMPANY IN

THE HOMECOMING

PRICES: Mon. thru Sat. Evgs.: Orch. $7.50; Front Mezz. $6.75, 5.75; Rear Mezz. $4.75, 3.75, 3.00. Wed. & Sat. Mats.: Orch. $5.75; Front Mezz. $5.25, 4.75; Rear Mezz. $4.25, 3.25, 2.50. Please enclose stamped, self-addressed envelope with order. List several alternate dates.

MUSIC BOX THEATRE 233 W. 43 ST., N.Y. 36-4000

up, sat longer than usual on the wastepaper basket in the newspaper office, slunk off to the empty afternoon shows, at the movie house, readily drank with others, and occasionally noted with alarm how little effort he was making to save up for a new car." Dietbert's interest in rescuing Beate from East Berlin in the period immediately following the erection of the Wall is fitful and ambivalent.

Dietbert acts spasmodically, almost in a dream, gnawed by his conscience. "He felt personally offended by the confinement of Beate in her Berlin; he had a private anger against the forbidden zones, minefields, lines of sentries, obstacle ditches, glaring lights, barbed wire, walled-up windows, shooting orders and threats of punishment for attempting to cross." Johnson studiously averts our attention from the glossy façade of West Berlin. Dietbert moves along with his nose close to the ground, wandering in a haze through strange streets (Berlin is not his city), bars, small furnished rooms, and the disturbing appraisals of the people he encounters. Even when descending on Berlin by plane he achieves no wider sensation than that of traveling in a style which is not really his own.

The narrative prose of Two Views is sparse yet dense, detached yet cumulatively involved. Johnson is a distinctive writer, and one who is obviously highly conscious of his craft and of the total effect he wants to create. The mood of the novel is peculiarly modern: the two principal characters grope through their lives like submarines passing through the green sea. The people they meet and have to deal with are deliberately two-dimensional, mere circumstances, lacking that rounded completeness and the inner motivation by means of which a novelist transforms a person from object to subject. It is almost as if Johnson had accepted Robbe-Grillet's point against Balzac—that the narrator, unless he is God, cannot know everything. There is virtually no dialogue, for in the course of dialogue the singular perspective is lost and its human embodiment merges into the world as simply one man amongst others.

Like many German novelists before him, Johnson seems to say that life is inherently painful and that humanism must constantly be reborn out of dead ashes. Unlike Böll, he finds no outlet in humor; unlike Gisela Elsner, he avoids the easy retreat into expressionism and the absurd. He has none of Grass's robust, Rabelaisian power. The eye is once again a camera with a soiled lens. The small surfaces of the city are consubstantial with a bleakly restrictive and alienating environment. Life is like that. But in the West, at least, a man is free.

There are echoes not only of a literary tradition emphasizing the accidental and the absurd (Kafka, Musil) but also of the new cinematic climate which has exorcised the concern with psychological penetration and social structure of 19th-century realism. Johnson, in fact, stops well short of the mannerisms of the nouveau roman and nowhere surrenders himself to the fetishism of physical space and contour as practiced by Robbe-Grillet. Even so, the skeleton of a film script is visible. It is as if Berlin had become—for writers, refugees, photographers, guards and incoming movie actors alike—one vast film studio with a single, immovable prop—the Wall.

To put it this way is not to suggest any resemblance between Two Views on the one hand and The Spy Who Came in from the Cold or Funeral in Berlin on the other. Where the foreign writer finds excellent material for sensational intrigues, hair-raising adventures and sudden death, Johnson offers instead a population that has suffered for so long on the rack of historical crisis that violence and repression are absorbed like a persistent fine dust which burns the eyes and coats the lungs.

While respecting Johnson's refusal to put his art at the service of any current myth, I confess to having been sometimes bored and irritated by this novel. The East from which Beate has to escape has no redeeming features at all; it is simply a prison and a gigantic lie. And if the choice of Dietbert is in any sense symbolic, then the West has no virtues beyond confused tolerance and opaque nihilism. The negative vision, of course, comes most easily to the artist. The laborious didacticism of so many hopeful Socialist novelists tends to drive the sensitive writer deeper into a shadowy world of fragmentation, contingency, and even despair. One does not reject this because a "brave new world" is in the process of construction in the Socialist states; one rejects it because experiences, ideas, and even moods exist and can only exist in terms of their opposites. Uwe Johnson is a novelist of integrity who steers clear of all sentimentality, but he does not fully kill the prejudice that the ultimate German alibi remains self-pity.

The Great Human Option

THE CROWD IN HISTORY: A Study of Popular Disturbances in France and England 1730-1848. By George Rudé. John Wiley & Sons. 281 pp. $5.95. Paper $2.95.

REVOLUTIONARY EUROPE 1783-1815. By George Rudé. Harper & Row. 350 pp. $6.95.

EDWARD T. GARGAN

Mr. Gargan is living in Paris, on leave from the University of Wisconsin. His latest book is De Tocqueville (Hillary House).

Our time regards disbelief in revolution not as a tragedy but as an improvement in the human situation, as proof of our will and ability to control men and societies. In the United States there is unquestioned confidence in the professionalization of reform; in France planification absorbs all life, while in England, with less fervor, a similar faith dominates all public practice and philosophy. The rationality of the Western mind has found the political dogma best suited to its nature. The West has finally cast off the imaginative, the passionate, the ecstatic and the beautiful as irrelevant to the discussion of man's personality as citizen and as one in community with others. War, corrupting all passion and desire, remains the only occasion for transcending logic. The descendants of Marx wish to be faithful to the revolutionary tradition, but they have in Western Europe little of Marx's trust in revolution as the salvation of men and nations.

Contemporary political scientists and sociologists, tempted by the politics of the cold war, see revolutions primarily as sets of problems in counterinsurgency. Their studies are designed to develop effective anti-revolutionary techniques for the struggle between the temperate and equatorial zones of the world, the industrial and agrarian continents, Asia and America. The findings of these studies belong to the arcana of governments, to espionage agents, to generals. In public discussion the images remain starkly primitive. Burke's and Taine's howling masses have been transferred from historical France to modern China and Asia. Academic specialists, when not directly in the service of the state, aid this anti-revolutionary action by treating as naive all belief in revolution as a great human option. The great metaphysical questions on the meaning of freedom are raised by the adolescents of the Western world awkwardly fulfilling the role of the intelligentsia, while scholars and intellectuals—not daring to outrage society—content themselves with exquisite descriptions of how things function.

It is the merit of George Rudé's Revolutionary Europe 1783-1815, and his The Crowd in History: A Study of Popular Disturbances in France and England that he not only rejects what is false in past historical accounts of the revolution but succeeds in viewing from a new perspective the great revolutionary movement in Western history. Rudé's work also presents an excellent synthesis of the historical writing on the French Revolution that has been so plentiful since the end of the Third Republic.

The professional study of the French Revolution was initiated by the formidable French academic historians who, in the beginning of the Third Republic, and especially on the occasion of the revolution's first centenary, firmly established a "scientific" and documentary approach to the history of the revolution. Their historical outlook was framed by Europe's effort to create stable representative systems, equilibrium in the operation of finance capitalism, and to hold together a middle-class power structure threatened by Socialist dreams of a new world to be built with the revolutionary energy of Europe's wage-earning masses. The First World War ended the chances of revolutionary socialism in Western Europe and transferred this experiment outside its frontiers. But in this same period historians, inspired by Marx's social and moral vision, successfully produced new and precise accounts of Europe's revolutionary action in the years 1789 to 1800.

Georges Lefebvre, in his Paysans du Nord de la France pendant la Révolution, superbly exhibited the historical means to concretize the previously legendary and obscure place of the peasantry in the revolution. In 1958, Albert Soboul, the year before Lefebvre's death, traced the revolutionary role of the small shopkeepers, craftsmen and artisans in assuring the destruction of the old regime, though losing in the same period their own foothold on the slopes of history. In England, George Rudé and Richard Cobb have most successfully added to this inquiry; Cobb by his enormous study of Les armes révolutionnaires and Rudé in his The Crowd in the French Revolution and The Crowd in History.

Richard Cobb of Oxford, a principal reviewer of books on the French Revolution for the Times Literary Supplement, has recently somewhat crossly denounced new developments in the joint sociological and historical study of the revolution. He sees this approach as abstracting the human element out of unique historical situations in a preference for questionable laws of revolutionary behavior. At the conference of the French Historical Society, held at Michigan, in March, 1966, Cobb made much fun of two very young scholars attempting to analyze, with the help of computers, the hundreds upon hundreds of cahiers drafted before the meeting of the Estates-General in 1789. Cobb was surprised at his audience's disapproval of his style and message. Yet the tension that Cobb has aroused is fundamentally based on the serious problem of the adequate generalizations needed to give meaning to the entire revolutionary drama. Such interpretative statements are imperative to prevent the revolution from becoming a story of picturesque militant craftsmen and wage earners in place of equally romantic ugly aristocrats and egotistical bourgeoisie. Cobb fears statistics, but even more deeply he fears generalizations.

George Rudé stands somewhat in the center of the shifting field of French Revolutionary historiography. Wholly devoid of utopianism, his writings are the more convincing because of his nostalgia and affection for the class of artisan-craftsmen now vanished from our technological society. The Crowd in History, the more original of his two recent books, sets out to locate and cauterize the festering sores left by the literature that saw all popular manifestations as bestial and savage. Rudé examines the historical circumstances attending every crowd's formation, the size and specific activities of various crowds, their leaders, the political, economic and social identities of the members of crowds, the overt and clandestine motives of crowds in action, the response of authorities to the challenges of crowds. Masterful use is made of police records, hospital and prison reports, press and Parliamentary discussion, the diaries and correspondence of friendly and hostile witnesses.

The two basic forms of crowd activity before the impact of the industrial revolution were those developed during the rural and city riots of the 18th century. The crowds in the French Revolution followed these earlier examples and added a decisive political character. The rioting of the early 19th century both imitated the past and experimented with the kinds of popular action that would accompany the industrial revolution. Rudé, drawing on his own original research, contributes three brilliant and lucid chapters distinguishing the political riots, the food riots, and the labor disputes of the French Revolution. This has never been done so clearly, and will govern all future examination of these complicated years. He is less impressive in treating the events of 1848, but his pages on the pre-industrial demonstrations in England, the religious riots of the early 19th century, and the Chartists' demonstrations, meaningfully relate these crowds to those of the past and those to come.

The pre-industrial crowd identified by Rudé included few criminals or unemployed; the majority were craftsmen, shopkeepers, artisans, while in the country they were tenants and farm hands. Many adolescents joined the crowds, bringing their own style and energy in much the same manner as the adolescents of the American ghettos have done in recent years. Yet the average age of the vainqueurs de la Bastille was 34 and that of those killed and wounded in the assault of the Tuileries in 1792 was 38. Economic distress was decisive in setting the crowds in motion. Demonstrations were triggered by scarcity of food,

I WANT TO KNOW

(How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out)

IF RUSSIANS HAVE HORNS

Send me Free reprints of N.Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. Tell me how it brings together Americans and Russians of all ages and occupations to meet their counterparts in both the United States and the Soviet Union . . . and how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years as a major step toward mutual understanding and survival.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP _____

Mail to:

CITIZENS EXCHANGE CORPS,
Dept. N2-13, 550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y. 10036

inflationary prices, inadequate wages. In a time when poverty was often regarded as a criminal condition, men and women rioted to preserve their status as independent persons. The depersonalization and loss of identity suffered by the poor and destitute of the present time make clear why fear gripped the crowds of the past.

Such crowds had few contacts with the true proletariat, but they had almost no chance themselves of becoming part of the bourgeoisie, and were in fact already economically redundant. When these crowds shoved, shouted, broke things, pushed and struck out, they fought to prevent their own extinction. In the 20th century such groups have often espoused Fascist causes, while in the 18th century history encouraged them to support a more liberal political effort. Rudé insists that he does not wish to argue that short-term economic factors "eclipsed all others in this time," but he is correct in his stress because the fears released by short-term economic crises were lifetime anxieties for those facing adverse fluctuations in prices, wages and the availability of food.

As the 19th century advanced, crowds became more politically conscious. In France the early Socialist literature contributed to their political education and eventual militancy. Underlying folk myths and beliefs also fashioned the crowd. The "leveling instinct" was active, the belief that the king must be on the side of "justice," and that justice rather than market decisions should determine wages and prices, reinforced the crowds' conviction of the rightness of their actions. English rioters had some idea that the rights of Englishmen sanctioned their course. Some traces of millenarianism were present, as well as considerable religious antagonism toward those considered deviant in their orthodoxy, rival orthodoxy or unorthodoxy.

Yet great turning points are discernible in the history of the crowd. The events beginning with 1789 and the hesitant development of an independent working-class movement in the first decades of the 19th century were decisive for the history of the crowd and Europe. During the revolution, crowds acted at specific and critical moments to accomplish significant political results. The number of these decisive occasions was astonishingly few. Rudé cites as the "most important" revolutionary journées some thirteen events in the six years from 1789 to 1795. These important days numbered twenty-six of rioting out of a possible 2,190. A craftsman who left his bench to help out in these significant demonstrations would have lost little more than 1 per cent of the time normally spent at his work or behind the counter in his small shop. No revolutionary journées lasted more than five days, and most were of two days' duration. Soboul and others have suggested that physical exhaustion explains in part why the sans-culottes did not turn out to rescue Robespierre on 9th Thermidor. But if those called upon had participated in the last major political riot, they would not have been active since the insurrection of September 4-5, 1793, an interval of eleven months in their call to service as members of the crowd.

This historical record underscores by analogy the task and achievement of those responsible for recruiting demonstrators in the American civil rights struggle. This cause does not have, however, an ongoing bourgeois political revolution to which its forces might respond. And the civil rights journées have not had the impact of those in France which for a time fixed the direction of the revolution. The leaders of the contemporary fight for freedom correctly sense that a revolutionary situation may be necessary if they are to succeed. Our anti-revolutionary and a-revolutionary culture and political climate make reflection on the great revolution of the 18th century all the more significant and necessary.

Rudé's Revolutionary Europe expertly conveys the consensus of modern scholarship on the periodization, critical issues and consequences of the revolution. He puts at the same time his own stamp on this material, and is at his best when dealing with the activity of the sans-culottes in the great journées of 1789-95. Surprisingly, Rudé examines the old question of Napoleon's place as heir or traitor to the revolution with more objectivity and generosity than has been the practice of historians who have witnessed the tyrannies of Hitler, Stalin and Mussolini.

The collapse of the old order is seen as the result of the increasing inefficiency on the part of those who governed at a time when the bourgeoisie outside the political decision-making process pressed more and more for political power and responsibility. Rudé accepts as something almost anticlimactic the extraordinary achievement of this class and, as a consequence, he fails to explain adequately their preparation for this triumph. Not enough attention is given to how the bourgeoisie created precisely the political institutions suited to their needs, or to the means by which this class prevailed throughout all the vicissitudes of the revolution, surviving the sans-culottes threat, the terror, Napoleon.

The bourgeoisie not only survived but, profiting by their revolutionary education, founded the political order and society that prevailed until the First World War, and which psychologically still dominates the European spirit. One can only wish that Jean-Paul Sartre, whose Nausea represents the perfect anti-bourgeois spiritual statement, would write a history of the revolution. He alone has the talent and the animus to explain the tenacity and success of this class. Until that work is done from the perspective of Sartre, the best explanation of the bourgeois dominance remains that of the Marxist historian Albert Soboul. He attributes, as did Marx, the bourgeois achievement to their ownership and direction of the productive processes of the developing capitalist economy. This thesis, despite its shortcomings, is the best we have and goes a long way to explain why the sans-culottes, the heroes of Rudé's books, were unable to fashion the revolution in their own image.

One reason why Rudé inadequately reconstructs the historical accomplishments of the bourgeoisie is that he is determined to underestimate the contribution of the Enlightenment thought to the revolution. Rudé insists again and again that the role of the philosophes is "problematic," and he correctly cites

THE WINDS

*I do not like the winds because
They are too like my passionate self,
I want the winds to die down and the calm
To allow me to establish myself.*

*It is only in the calm of early evening
I feel man's short triumphs
When by the elevation of the spirit alone
He overcomes his defiance.*

*It is in the improbable hour of peace
Between the rigors and riots of war
A semblance comes of a high ideal,
Glimpse of a fraction of what we are*

*If reality would permit us
Not to be cloudy,
If God would relieve us
And show us reality.*

*When the winds come they will blow Away my pennant. I will Lie low until they pass, and then
I will raise up the evanescent.*

RICHARD EBERHART

the occasions in which the ideas of the philosophes were hardly decisive. The Thermidorian reaction was more indebted to the experience of 1789 to 1794 than to the Encyclopédie of 1751, or Voltaire's Candide of 1759, or Rousseau's Du contrat social of 1762. But these bourgeois works formed the bourgeois expectation of history and revolution. After magnificently tracing each step in the sans-culottes' revolutionary activity until the fall of Robespierre and the concurrent defeat of the sans-culottes, Rudé dramatically introduces those who prevailed with the statement: "The Plain then emerged as the victors of Thermidor. There were idealists and ideologues among them; but on the whole, they were hard-headed men to whom the Revolution had been a profitable business. . . ." What is the historical secret of their success? Has it been transmitted to their heirs in our time? How did they develop so quickly the techniques of survival and dominance in politics, as well as in the market place? The "Plain" receives two sentences in Rudé's book and no mention in the index! Obviously the wrong side won, but how? Ours is not yet a post-bourgeois world and we must understand its secrets if history is to witness the interment of the bourgeois era in history.

Some sources of the bourgeois victory in the revolution will be found by reconsidering the place of the philosophes in shaping the 18th century's spirit and history. Our purest concepts of justice, of freedom, of equality, of education, of pleasure, of the possibilities of sex, of tragedy, of success, are largely those of the Enlightenment philosophes. Marx was assuredly their greatest successor and the major critic of their limits. But it was the achievement of the Enlightenment thinkers to make human happiness the proper matter of political discourse and the perfection of the human personality a civic rather than religious issue. The philosophes made the revolution possible for in the decades preceding its outbreak they created the conviction that the human situation might be refashioned through reflection and action. Through their work history lost its ancient capacity to dominate and restrict life. History became identified with opportunity; the future entered secular life. The philosophes announced the fallibility of all institutions and made freedom the test of any civilized polity. The philosophes rethought the implications of all human conduct and ethics, and the meaning of human loneliness and

THE NATION INSTITUTE, a nonprofit corporation chartered to advance inquiry into timely questions, announces its California Conference

NATIONAL PRIORITY NUMBER ONE: REDIRECTING AMERICAN POWER

- Does, or should, politics stop at the water's edge?
- Must we commit three-quarters of the federal budget to agencies concerned directly and indirectly with military spending?
- What is the big city's stake in foreign policy?
- What is an informed electorate to think and do?

PROGRAM AND PARTICIPANTS

Morning Session

Conference Purpose: JAMES J. STORROW Jr., Publisher, The Nation.
Our Policy on China and Vietnam: Senators GEORGE McGOVERN (S.D.); MARK HATFIELD (Ore.); EUGENE McCARTHY (Minn.)

Luncheon Session

Domestic Urgencies vs. Military Costs: Mayor JEROME CAVANAGH of Detroit; Rev. Dr. MARTIN LUTHER KING, Jr., Nobel Peace Laureate and Chairman, Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Afternoon Sessions

How Do the Media Cover Pacific Developments?: Senator ERNEST GRUENING (Alaska), former Editor, The Nation; CECIL BROWN, Director of News, Community Television of Southern California; MALCOLM W. BROWNE, Pulitzer Prize winner, recent chief A.P. and A.B.C. correspondent in Vietnam. New Priorities and New Constituencies: SEYMOUR MELMAN, Professor of Industrial Management and Engineering, Columbia University; CAREY McWILLIAMS, Editor, The Nation.

Discussion follows each session, led by GIFFORD PHILLIPS, Conference Chairman; JOSEPH A. BALL, EDWARD MOSK and ROBERT VAUGHN, Co-Chairmen.

BEVERLY HILTON HOTEL, LOS ANGELES

Saturday, February 25, 1967, 9:30 A.M. to 5:30 P.M.

A limited number of places are available. For reservations, write GIFFORD PHILLIPS, Chairman, Nation Institute California Conference, 7789 Sunset Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90046, enclosing $6.50 per person for direct costs of registration, attendance and luncheon. Please make checks payable to THE NATION INSTITUTE, and list names and addresses of persons planning to attend.

solidarity was not absent from their considerations.

Undoubtedly the bourgeois proved faithless to this inheritance; the misery, the cant, the hypocrisy of our private and public lives make this evident. Yet the meaning of the revolution in thought which preceded the revolution of aristocrats, bourgeois, sans-culottes, generals, remains the heart of the matter. It is to be hoped that Rudé and other historians will stop their embarrassing efforts to build a wall of separation between the thought of the Enlightenment and the economic and social course of the revolution. When the fusion of thought and action during the revolution is better understood we will comprehend again its splendor and recover its symbolic place in our lives.

Tocqueville never failed to praise and stand in awe at the extraordinary moments in the revolution when the selfishness normal to most men was put aside in the great effort to create a freer and more human condition. He saw the revolution at its most perfect hour when men possessed of common purpose and intent transcended the limits of their nature. Contemporary historical accounts often fail to capture the heroic and superhuman achievements of the revolution because our age rejects the myth and the belief in the possibility of revolt. We are best at finding out why specific groups and causes fail. The expectation of failure governs our historical imagination and our lives. Perhaps we are of this mind because we have accepted Freud's completion of the work of Nietzsche. Nietzsche announced to Western man that his God was dead, and Freud more calmly informed us that efforts to refashion the human situation through revolt were illusions. Nietzsche needed a madman to bring his news. Now the death of belief in revolution is similar news that can be uttered only by a madman. Freud's message to mankind is that expectations of consolation are infantile and neurotic, and that only the wild and foolish can still be disturbed by the loss of light which the Western revolution once introduced into society.

state of nature, regain the freedom of action that would alone enable them to develop individually and collectively along paths of virtue and self-realization? "Man is born free, yet everywhere he is in chains." What instrument will he use to break the chains? The answer is clear: radical, egalitarian democracy.

Rousseau was no revolutionary, partly because of temperament, partly because he did not live in a revolutionary situation. Although he could counsel a friend: "Do you want to relieve your sufferings? Learn to suffer in peace, become patient and gentle; you will soon cease to feel wretched," he did not say this because he was, as Guéhenno has it, on the side of the masters. But he was a radical, an egalitarian and a democrat.

In the context of the 18th century, only a radical egalitarian could say that "man is the same in all classes; since the rich man has no bigger stomach than the poor man and is no better able to digest his food, since the master's arms are no longer or stronger than his slave's, since the great ones of the Earth are in fact no greater than ordinary people; and, lastly, since human needs are everywhere the same, the means of satisfying them ought to be equal everywhere." Only a radical could write: "I am constantly being enjoined to suggest only what is feasible. This is tantamount to saying: suggest doing what is already being done, or at least suggest a satisfactory course which can be combined with the existing evil. Such a project is, in some connections, much more illusory than my own for, in the combination of good and evil, the good is corrupted and the evil is not cured. . . ." Only a democrat could formulate a theory of reliance on the general will.

Whether as a matter of choice or because of the force of circumstance, Rousseau had a theory without practice. But this did not doom him to sterility. Neither he nor the philosophes changed the world, despite Guéhenno's claim to the contrary. What they did was to provide sets of ideas that might eventually be used for social analysis and political action. No man more than Rousseau has been claimed as a founding father by so many diverse schools of thought. Romantics saw him as one of their own because of his conception of nature and individual freedom, Socialists exalted him for his view of the origin of property, Jacobins hailed him as the prophet of virtue. Each in his own way was right, but all took from him only what they found appealing. The procedure is normal and no cause for regretful sighs. Rousseau was an 18th-century man

An 18th-Century Man

JEAN-JACQUES ROUSSEAU. By Jean Guéhenno. Translated from the French by John and Doreen Weightman. Vol. I: 1712-1758. 460 pp. Vol. II: 1758-1778. 316 pp. Columbia University Press. $17.50 the set.

JEFFRY J. KAPLOW

Mr. Kaplow, an assistant professor of history at Columbia University, specializes in the history of modern France. He is the author of Elbeuf During the Revolutionary Period (Johns Hopkins Press) and New Perspectives on the French Revolution (John Wiley).

These volumes tell us all we may reasonably care to know and more about the life of Jean Jacques Rousseau. For 750 pages we follow the hero from birth to death, from first love to last, from his origins as a humble artisan to the heights of philosophic fame. He is portrayed in all his contradictory moods and tendencies, as he wandered from place to place and idea to idea, in his eternal quest for truth. Guéhenno has no trouble in convincing us that Rousseau the seeker always remained true to his essential being, and that the motto "vitam impendere vero" (a life submitted to truth) was for him no piece of idle rhetoric. But despite the detail and the biographer's sympathy for his subject, the book remains dissatisfying and dull. For the analysis of ideas that ought to have been the core of the book, as the ideas themselves were the core of the man, is nowhere systematically undertaken; and the historical background—indeed, the notion of history that informs the book—are both shockingly inadequate.

To say that what is essential about Rousseau is his continual striving after truth is to make of him a pure intellectual unconcerned with the problems of the world outside the ivory tower. It is to exalt process and to undervalue achievement; the results of the thought process. Furthermore, it is to postulate an absolute separation between philosophy and action, a separation which I do not think Rousseau would have found congenial. (One of the great sources of his frustration was that he could not put his ideas into execution.) Finally, this procedure makes it almost impossible to see his ideas on specific subjects as parts of a whole view of humanity and its potential. Rousseau was not a systematic philosopher, but he did orient his researches around a central theme: under what conditions might men, corrupt because living in a society based on inequality, deprived forever of the pristine purity of the whose ideas could not be transferred whole into any subsequent historical period. He might inspire the future, but he could not analyze it. In his pursuit of truth, and still more with the several bits of truth he thought he had found, Jean Jacques provided us with a Pandora's box of questions and insights that has yet to be emptied.

All this can be understood only if we take Rousseau away from the privacy of les Charmettes and l'Ermitage and place him in history, that is, in the society of which he was a part. This Guéhenno cannot do, for he does not know that society as he should. He speaks of Rousseau escaping from middle-class society, but I suspect that aristocratic is a more proper term. He says Montesquieu "had shown that freedom could be the result of a sober compromise between the various forces which go to make up society. But it was too late. Society was too far gone in decay to listen to his teachings: the mighty clung too tenaciously to their privileges and the weak to their grievances." But surely Montesquieu's concept of freedom was not Rousseau's, based as it was on an aristocratic constitution. What is more, the statement assumes that the contending parties, whoever they may have been, were free to deal with one another as equals, and this is clearly not the case. Perhaps this failure to see clearly the historical context is inevitable in an author who declares that "there is almost always something petty about the writing of history. Erudition is a means of helping us out of difficulties and masking our ignorance. The most learned historian can do no more than base his account on a few events, the memory of which has been preserved only by chance. He piles anecdote upon anecdote, and fills in the appropriate span of time as best he can. The essential point remains shrouded in mystery."

As in many another case, this biography tells us as much about its author as its subject. Guéhenno makes this clear when he writes that he was first drawn to Rousseau by the latter's conviction that truth alone was worth caring about. This is now unfashionable. Today, men, even righteous men, have abandoned truth, and individuals no longer matter. "Slaves claim that they have adopted the manners and morals of the masters in order not to be exploited by them. Both parties raise their voices with equal force and have recourse to the same devices in order to scream out their lies." The world is indeed a subject for anguished contemplation, but "to cultivate a certain kind of anguish is also to nourish hope." The postulated relationship between the disappearance of truth (here defined as an unchanging absolute) and the decline of individualism is vague, to say the least. But what is more important is Guéhenno's apologia for his own attitudes. What he is saying is that he has become disillusioned with the Left and sees little hope for political action of any sort in contemporary France. Everything is corrupt, seen from the inner sanctum of the Académie Française. Guéhenno, the popular front man of the thirties, was the image of the rational, clear-thinking, concerned intellectual. It is a pity that he has chosen in recent years to withdraw from the fray in order to cultivate not his garden but his anguish. Neither Rousseau nor we are the richer for that decision.

the ensemble, however striking locally, never appears to develop, and ultimately seems to derive its brilliance simply from the inherent characteristics of the all-upper-register timbral combinations (vibraphone, xylophone, alto flute, guitar, viola, alto voice, etc.) than from their compositional deployment. Thus it seems especially revealing that phrase demarcation is accomplished throughout by externally imposed pauses—one of the immediately identifying mannerisms of the work—rather than by any internal inflection generated by the ebb and flow of unfolding pitch and durational relations.

In particular, the essential externality of the idea is evident in the way the later sections progressively degenerate, running hopelessly out of ideas in the absence of any developmental implications to be drawn from preceding events; a really low inventive point is reached at the close in the introduction of the unfocused, conventionally portentous clangor of gongs as an obviously "polar" backdrop for the delicate pitch articulation of the solo alto flute.

Although one would expect Boulez's own performance to approach definitiveness, his players are evidently unable to give him any consistent representation of the dynamics printed in the score (Severino Gazzelloni's caprices are particularly glaring), and his singer simply cannot be relied upon to produce the indicated pitches, although her voice quality seems ideally lucent, flexible and unforced. On the other hand, the ensemble as a whole seems to project the textural and sonorous qualities of the work quite adequately. Although the recording is manifestly superior to Robert Craft's noble but foredoomed effort with indoctrinated players and no preparation time, the concert performances given a few years ago by Arthur Weisberg's Contemporary Chamber Ensemble, with Bethany Beardslee as vocalist, seemed far more accurately to represent what Boulez's own notation requires.

NEW MUSIC FOR PIANO. Works by Dahl, Berger, Kennan, Adler, Overton, Babbitt, Gideon, Berkowitz, Weber, Kraft, Pisk, Powell, Gould, Fine, Hovhanness, Perle, Cazden, Prostackoff, Glanville-Hicks, Bacon, Helps, Brunswick, Kim, Alexander. Robert Helps, piano. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7042.

This album is as valuable for its representation of important aspects of American musical development that are rarely encountered in recent new-music activities as for the superior performances it contains of important works by more

Records / Benjamin Boretz

BOULEZ: Le Marteau sans maître. Jeanne Deroubaix, alto; Severino Gazzelloni, alto flute; Georges van Gucht, xyloimba; Claude Ricou, vibraphone; Jean Batigne, percussion; Anton Stingl, guitar; Serge Collot, viola. Pierre Boulez, cond. Turnabout TV 4081/TV 340818.

Although the proclamation of the Marteau sans maître as a new Sacre du printemps has long since proved to be a false alarm, one can understand how it could have created an impression of this kind, and could even attract the wary attention of the composer of the real Sacre. For the work immediately projects a highly novel temporal, timbral and articulative atmosphere and striking individual "events" of remarkably compressed, intricate and densely articulated, but sonorously bright and lucid texture.

Soon, however, one becomes aware of a fundamental disjunction between this textural intricacy and the degree of significant connection from event to event and in the totality. Essentially, the "originality" of the phraseology proves to derive from the maximally dense juxtaposition and extension of individual parts that are themselves rather literally "Webernian," so that the evident intricacy is more external than contextual. And the special sonority of frequently heard composers. Thus Mark Brunswick, Miriam Gideon and Vivian Fine were members of a group of serious and accomplished composers who centered around Roger Sessions in the 1930s, and whose work was quite regularly performed in prewar contemporary music circles, along with that of such important younger composers as Edward Cone, whose omission from the present album is especially regrettable.

In general, these composers were influenced by Sessions' concern for the unfolding of structure through an unbroken, "long-line" continuity in which differentiations evolve out of the inflecting lines of a continuous, densely interwoven counterpoint, rather than as explicitly articulated "contrasts." The manifestations of this idea in the work of the postwar generation of Sessions-oriented composers are represented in the album by the work of Earl Kim (whose recent compositional reawakening, notable especially in the performances of his Dead Calm given at Marlboro and at Tanglewood last summer, has been one of the gratifying developments of the past year) and of Robert Helps himself. And Ben Weber's kind of 12-tone music, with its strongly traditional-associative, soft-textured surface, seems also to derive from this approach. (Whereas, for example, the 12-tone music of Paul Pisk stems directly from the Viennese source.)

The two aspects of "neoclassicism" that were perhaps the most powerful presences on the prewar American musical scene were associated with the work of Stravinsky and Hindemith. Of the composers in this album, Ingolf Dahl was once widely known and performed as a principal exponent of Stravinskian thought, but in the powerful backwash of Stravinsky's own reorientation he has paid the price of obscurity for his continued faithfulness to Stravinsky's earlier approach. In this connection, the absence of music by Louise Talma and Alexei Haieff who, with Dahl, Harold Shapero and Irving Fine, were the real virtuosos among the "classic-surface" Stravinskians, is really unfortunate, given the sense that its inclusion would have provided of the range, nature and prevalence of these qualities in American music up to the very recent past.

The Hindemith orientation, with its emphasis on maximally unambiguous connections in sonority, line and contour in every dimension, and maximal clarity of event-demarcation and a kind of orderly succession of events that seems almost independent of their interior content, is still occasionally evident in the Mel Powell piece included as well as in the music of Leo Kraft and Norman Cazden. The Six Preludes of George Perle are characteristically idiosyncratic in their completely personal exploration of highly original ideas—here, particularly of rhythmic succession and harmonic structure—and characteristically impressive in the degree to which they project both coherence and contextual identity against what often appear to be formidable obstacles of constraint and speculative extension.

Arthur Berger's Two Episodes (1933), surely among the first American attempts at 12-tone composition, are remarkably mature in technique and invention, with a "harmonic," "phraseological" control of the 12-tone unfolding that is astonishingly sophisticated for such an early attempt by a 21-year-old composer in a direction whose ostensible further pursuit in his own work was deferred for a twenty-year "neoclassic" interim. This aspect of the Episodes also anticipates, indeed illuminates, some of the special qualities of continuity and sonority that made Berger's music the most "internally" generated, as well as the most externally original, of the Stravinsky school—those characteristics that led to Berger's being described as a "diatonic Webern." And Milton Babbitt's Partitions (composed for Helps) is perhaps the best possible introduction to his work: it realizes within a minute time scale a completely developed and extraordinarily ramified structure and projects, in two or three minutes, at least as many suggestions and articulations of ideas about the compositional possibilities of piano sound, registration and technique as can be found in all the rest of the album.

Partitions, too, is above all the piece for Helps's pianism, with its combination of a Lisztian mechanical command and an effortless fluency that conjoins a remarkable combination of articulative "coolness" and inflective sensitivity under the most strenuous technical conditions. But Helps's capacities also result in wonderfully intelligent and considerate performances of all the works; perhaps the beautiful penetration to the somewhat oblique qualities of the Berger and Perle pieces are the real musically tours de force, if not the most spectacular coups de doigts, in the entire collection.

In thus satisfying a serious need for representation—in adequate performance—of serious music otherwise unavailable, Victor (subsidized here by the Abby Whiteside Foundation) has performed a substantial service. But given the care and distinction of Helps's playing, and its invariable association, whenever I have heard him in live performance, with an extraordinarily delicate and lucid piano sound, the wash-tub sonority produced by whatever combination of instrument and engineering that emerges from these records is—in the one area for which the record company itself was wholly responsible—symptomatically lamentable.

$2.95
each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your
home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send
check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER
UPON REQUEST

PERSONALS

MEN SHOULD CARE FOR BABIES NOT KILL THEM

Write for information on draft resistance, tax refusal, pacifism. Send 10c for your copy of "Up Tight With The Draft." Send $1 for special "draft packet" that includes a copy of Handbook for C.O.'s. Write:

WAR RESISTERS LEAGUE

5 Beekman Street, Dept. J, N. Y. C. 10038

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 2-13-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

Crossword Puzzle No. 1188

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Fast guns, as they might be called, offering a certain amount of protection. (9, 4)
- 10 Are books so called? (5)
- 11 The goings are tough for those who may have voted for Maddox. (9)
- 12 The sort of island met in the strip? (9)
- 13 A foreign word for toast. (5)
- 14 If somehow a girl ran, was a common land controlled by them? (8, 4)
- 19 Might be rather high for ship-owners who like things neat for the sailor. (8, 4)
- 22 Where the stars might stand assault? (5)
- 24 Likely to turn out well, as the wedding couple might be. (9)
- 25 Choice expressed, or pertaining to the choice expressed. (9)
- 26 Macbeth's tale-teller? (5)
- 27 Agreeing to be keeping in touch? (13)

DOWN:

- 2 How people take in the behavior of a practical joker, by the sound of it. (6)
- 3 It might be rather showy to have the gear handy when it is moved. (9)
- 4 It happens every day darkness and autumn seem to go together. (9)
- 5 It might be a tie or a suspender. (5)
- 6 Subjects of eager desire. (5)
- 7 Search all over an Arabian country for such an interpreter! (8)

- 8 With it, one should be able to dig up something in a dark suit. (5)
- 9 Impractical slogan for the austerity minded. (7)
- 15 Serious misunderstanding. (9)
- 16 Zeroed in? Made 9, rather. (9)
- 17 It's bad, in a way, to sign in the middle. (7)
- 18 He raised quite a storm in order to get along well with the circle. (8)
- 20 We all hope to have it good, as mystics might see it. (6)
- 21 A barrier of stone. (5)
- 23 You could be in a class by yourself, if one does it to you! (5)
- 24 Performs in a hair-splitting way for such characters? (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1187

ACROSS: 1 Promulgate; 6 Clef; 10 Lafitte; 11 Circuit; 12 Hoes; 13 Stalactite; 15 Isthmus; 16 Delphic; 17 Unpiles; 20 Run down; 22 Ivory Coast; 23 Mine; 25 Offense; 26 Toadies; 27 Sari; 28 Second gear. DOWN: 1 Pulchritudinous; 2 Off-beat; 3 and 24 Untoward; 4 Ghettos; 5 Tackled; 7 Loutish; 8 Father confessor; 9 Crackling; 14 Employing; 18 Proffer; 19 Slovene; 20 Risotto; 21 Olivine.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

ORIGINAL LITHOGRAPHS, ETCHINGS: Chagall, Miro, Braque. Moderately priced. Send 50c for color-illustrated catalogue. Kirschner, 90-59 58th Avenue, Elmhurst, New York 11373.

PUBLICATIONS

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

DOES UNCLE SAM WANT YOU? Escape from "Freedom," a new pamphlet explains Canadian immigration procedures. Send 50c plus handling to SUPA Anti-draft Program, 658 Spadina Avenue, Toronto 4, Canada.

EDUCATIONAL

Training for Leadership in Social Change The Upland Institute

One-year graduate level professional training. Studying theory and strategy of the great traditions of social change. Field experience with institutions of social change in Philadelphia area. Co-educational, non-sectarian. Admission requirement: B.A. or equivalent training and experience. Write:

JOHN W. THOMAS
THE UPLAND INSTITUTE
Chester, Pa. 19013

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

MEETING

HEAR ABOUT THE MOVEMENT TO STOP MASS MURDER IN VIETNAM

Speakers:

A. J. Muste, just returned from North Vietnam; Rev. James Bevel, of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, and National Director of the April 15 Mobilization in New York and San Francisco; Grace Mora Newman, recently returned from Hanoi; Dave Dellinger, Editor of Liberation.

Monday, February 13, 8 P.M.

Community Church

30 East 35th Street, New York City

Contribution, $1 — Students, 50c

Sponsored by

FIFTH AVENUE VIETNAM
PEACE PARADE COMMITTEE

5 Beekman Street, New York City 10028

'The habit grew on me...'

So writes a subscriber, explaining why he has been reading The Nation for the past thirty years.

In an age of hyperbole, The Nation makes few claims for itself. It will not make you rich or alluring to the opposite sex.

Some readers buy it because it carries the toughest crossword puzzle now being printed in America. More buy it because the editors have a greedy curiosity about what really happens behind the velvet curtains of public relations and the pious admonitions of government.

The truth is not often given away free — you have to dig for it. The Nation has been digging for 101 years and its readers never seem to tire of watching the editors work.

subscribe to

NATION

America's most habit-forming magazine

THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM

"This book raises vital questions about our policy of escalation in relation to peace proposals."

Senator Vance Hartke,
Indiana

"A most important and revealing history, and a clear demonstration of what is wrong with the strategy of escalation."

John Kenneth Galbraith

FREE with each NEW subscription

THE NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM.

☐ 1 Year, $10

☐ 2 Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian Postage, $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

ETHIOPIA NEIL G. KOTLER

THE NATION

FEBRUARY 20, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME

FEB 21 1967

LIBRARY

Taps, Bugs & Spies

ANYTHING TO GET HOFFA

FRED J. COOK

Week of the Angry Arts

CURTIS HARNACK

MAX KOZLOFF • DENISE LEVERTOV

U.S. Civil Service

Washington's Bland Bondage

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

U-32-67 P. 1-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

phone call

Lexington, Mass.

DEAR SIR: A measure of the seriousness of the "credibility gap" resulting from President Johnson's foreign policy can be obtained by considering a perfectly possible event: suppose one of our bombing planes patrolling in Europe wandered from its course, due to human or technical failure, onto Russian territory, crashed near a town, and one of the bombs exploded. (Admittedly, this is a chain of highly improbable events—but Palomares, last year, taught us how events can infringe on the improbable.)

One of the functions of "credibility" is to provide a margin of protection against the dangers of just such improbable, but not inconceivable, events. But imagine, after such an explosion, the telephone call over the "hot line" to President Johnson by, say, Mr. Brezhnev. The President, undoubtedly, would strive to reassure his caller. But Mr. Brezhnev, as an official responsible to his own people, would have to measure those assurances in the light of our many recent protestations of innocence that have been belied by facts; and of our peace feelers accompanied by acts of escalation. What value could he assign to these predictable protestations? . . .

Add to the costs of the Vietnamese War, via the "credibility gap": a decrease in the protective value of the "hot line." Armand Siegel hang on to Lyndon

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIR: The throes of California at this stage lead me to worry about the recent trends in liberal thought as exemplified in your pages. Many of us were lukewarm about Governor Brown, as you have been about President Johnson. We now have Reagan. Perhaps it is time for all liberals to rally around the President and bury our differences lest we have a Reagan on the national scene. Believe us Californians, there is a difference!

In other words, a few less critical remarks re Vietnam, etc. A few more words on the patience and moderation of the President, and his wisdom in internal affairs. We in the West now know the alternative. . . .

W. H. Spooner

befuddlement

Regina, Sask., Canada

DEAR SIR: Inasmuch as Allen Guttman said in his review of Say That We Saw Spain Die (The Nation, Jan. 16): "Because any appreciation of Marxism is likely these days to bring accusatory letters, I should add that I am not a Marxist," I feel compelled to write an "accusatory letter." . . .

To paraphrase Albert Fowler in his article, "The Death of Liberalism," in the November, 1966, Fellowship, if liberalism received its death blow at the hands of the warfare state, it can be argued that the warfare state came into being because of the failure of an already stricken liberalism to deal effectively with the myth which was allowed to grow over the past few decades that Marxism and/or communism was "the enemy."

Poverty, disease, illiteracy, discrimination—i.e., colonialism, both at home and abroad—fostered by capitalism, not communism, is "the enemy," and as long as the Allen Guttman of this world contribute to the befuddlement of the people by remarks such as the above, we in the so-called liberal democracies will not get about the business of change which is necessary.

Milnor Alexander

EDITORIALS

The Swinging Senator

"They've got the money," said Sen. Robert F. Kennedy at the close of the controversy over the Manchester book, "and we've got the public relations problem." In a possible reaction to the public relations problem, the Senator then departed for a quick tour of European capitals—London, Paris, Bonn, Rome (and the Vatican)—and way stations. At Oxford he received a standing ovation; and everywhere (such is the charm of his personality, in transition from boyhood to middle age) he was well received and well headlined. His image began to glow again, and the improvement may be reflected in the upcoming popularity polls.

From the standpoint of peacemaking, however, the Kennedy mission was less successful. In this phase of the trip Mr. Kennedy may have had the purest intentions—"Blessed are the peacemakers"—but on the topic of Vietnam he was as cautious and evasive as George Romney. If he was going to be critical of his country, he said, he would be critical not in Europe but in Washington. By the time he reached Bonn, however, he was a mite critical, like a swimmer dipping his toe in chilly water. "We"—meaning the Johnson Administration—had not sufficiently pondered what we were going to negotiate about. Asked whether the United States should demand guarantees from Hanoi before halting the bombing of North Vietnam, he said coyly that perhaps his own position was somewhat different from that of the U.S. Government, and that he had entertained "some serious reservations about the military usefulness of the bombing in any case." He did not say he disapproved of the bombing, or that he approved. By repeating what almost everyone has already said about its military effectiveness he was on safe ground.

What got him the headlines was his statement at Oxford that he thought the next three weeks would be "critical, crucial weeks." If the Senator was not just talking through his hat, this remark indicated that he knew something that hardly anyone else knew. Coupled with his trip to Paris, where General de Gaulle has been urging Washington to stop beating up the little brown brothers in Vietnam, all the signs and portents now pointed to the Senator as a messenger of peace. The notion that Kennedy was indeed the key figure in a prospective settlement of the war was fostered—but only briefly—by Newsweek's story that he was bringing back a French-sponsored, three-point peace formula.

The reason for the quick disillusionment was that the Newsweek story originated from a high but mysterious source in Washington. That this source had a pipe line to the White House was almost a foregone conclusion. A combined Kennedy-de Gaulle peace coup would be about as welcome to President Johnson as a nuclear bomb dropped on 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue. His dislike for both the Senator and the General is no secret. When they enter into a cooperative peace coup, or seem to, the Presidential blood pressure is bound to rise. The News-week coup was a skillful piece of deflation. Even if Kennedy had a message, he would be forced to deny it. In any case, the suspicion would grow that he had nothing specific, but was just maneuvering to keep himself in the headlines.

The President put the Senator in his place by first having him talk to Under Secretary of State Katzenbach; only then did he grant the messenger of peace a Presidential interview. That Senator and President buried any personal differences in this meeting may be doubted. That peace was brought any nearer by the Kennedy journey and its attendant speeches is equally unlikely.

What the episode does reveal, not for the first time, is the weakness of the top echelons of the State Department—in particular the paucity of ideas and initiative coming from the Secretary himself. He expresses himself succinctly, but he has been saying the same thing for all these years, and everybody is tired of it. He tells us that he and Mr. Johnson yearn passionately for peace, but the North Vietnamese must be taught to let their neighbors alone. We will stop bombing if they will stop infiltrating. Then we can all gather around the peace table and we will take them apart there instead of on the battlefield.

It almost makes one excuse the Kennedy play for the headlines. If, in his present frustrated state, he could bring himself to make an unequivocal move for peace, the nation would be in his debt. His speech at the University of Chicago on China offers some hope that he may now find time and courage to address himself to the issues in Vietnam.

No Two Sides

There are, as the saying goes, two sides to every question, but occasionally one side is so frail that its existence may be doubted. There is really nothing pertinent to be said against the proposed Soviet-American consular treaty now before the Senate. The deluge of "hate mail" on Senatorial desks merely uses the treaty as a warning to the legislators that no easing of East-West tensions will be tolerated. If the treaty fails of ratification, all efforts in this direction might as well be given up, at least in this session of Congress, and probably in the next as well.

The notion that the treaty, if put into effect, would release an army of Soviet spies on the United States belongs in a pulp magazine, not in the deliberations of the U.S. Senate. The treaty does not provide for the opening of consulates, either Soviet consulates in the United States or U.S. consulates in the Soviet Union. The treaty only sets up the machinery for doing so. The Johnson Administration could open consulates now but without

IN THIS ISSUE

February 20, 1967

EDITORIALS

226

ARTICLES

230 Taps, Bugs & Spies:
Anything To Get Hoffa

Fred J. Cook

236 Ethiopia:
The Over-Present Americans

Neil G. Kotler

239 U. S. Civil Service:
Washington's Bland Bondage

Robert G. Sherrill

243 California Revolution 4:
A Rage for Awareness

Donovan Bess

BOOKS & THE ARTS

245 Week of the Angry Artist . . .

Curtis Harnack

246 Advent 1966 (poem)

Denise Levertov

248 . . . A Collage of Indignation

Max Kozloff

251 Films

Robert Hatch

252 Theatre

Harold Clurman

255 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor	CAREY McWILLIAMS	Washington	ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Managing Editor	ROBERT HATCH	Paris	ALEXANDER WERTH
Literary Editor	HELEN YGLESIAS	Theatre	HAROLD CLURMAN
Poetry Editor	MICHAEL GOLDMAN	Art	MAX KOZLOFF
Copy Editor	MARION HESS	Music	BENJAMIN BORETZ
Advertising Manager	MARY SIMON	Science	CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 204
No. 8

the reciprocal guarantees and sanctions which the treaty would provide. Nor is the idea of expanding consular representation of Democratic origin. The proposal originated with President Eisenhower, and has been hanging fire since he laid it before Congress some fourteen years ago.

J. Edgar Hoover complains that his spy hunters would be overwhelmed by the Soviet officials imported to man the consulates. Undoubtedly some of their consular officials would spy at every opportunity, as would ours in the Soviet Union. About a dozen people in each consulate might be in a position to do effective snooping, and there might be one or two Soviet consulates in the United States. This would not be much of an increment to the approximately 400 Russian diplomats now accredited to the United States, some of whom are gathering legitimate intelligence, some of whom are stepping over the indistinct line which separates allowable intelligence activities from those proscribed.

The chief purpose of the treaty is to protect U.S. citizens who travel in the Soviet Union. The Soviets can now arrest an American tourist and are under no obligation to report the fact to our officials. The treaty provides for notification after no more than three days, and for visits by consular officials to the person arrested. We accord these rights to Soviet citizens, but at present there is no reciprocity. Since some 18,000 Americans visited the Soviet Union last year, this is no slight matter.

The President has supported the treaty, but in a rather feeble manner. His objective seems to be rather to get a fringe benefit for himself in the form of a split among Republicans. The most vigorous support for the treaty has in fact come from liberal Republicans like Thruston Morton and George Aiken. Irreconcilable opposition has come from Senators like Karl Mundt, whose horror of any easing of East-West tensions goes back to the anti-Bolshevik frenzy of the 1920s. But the chief opposition is not American at all. It comes, as Senator Aiken has pointed out, from certain émigré groups, such as those that, on every occasion, fill literally hundreds of pages of the Congressional Record with boiler plate extolling the "captive nations" and excoriating the Soviet Union and the Eastern European nations. This is a well-financed, continuing operation. If it were exercised on behalf of Communist countries, it would have been hacked to pieces by HUAC and kindred investigative and propaganda bodies decades ago. But because it appeals to anti-Communist sentiment, Congressmen fawn upon its lobbyists and put the Congressional Record at their service. One would think that the Ukrainians, Estonians, et al., were laying down the guidelines for U.S. foreign policy. It would be much to the point, in connection with their present onslaught on the consular treaty, to learn where their organizational financing originates. It would also be a good opportunity for the United States to rid itself of these political scolds.

'Poor Power'

There are 34 million impoverished people in the country, of whom 7.4 million are on welfare. Three hundred of the latter met in Washington recently (the National Welfare Rights meeting) to devise better ways of organizing the rest. It may seem that 300 is a pretty small fraction of 7 million, but the organizational meetings of Dr. Martin Luther King's bus boycotters in Montgomery, Ala., in what now seems like an ancient era, were no larger. In fact, the 300 at the Welfare Rights conference represented about 10,000 organized welfare recipients across the country, and the movement is spreading swiftly, fired by almost intolerable conditions. In Mississippi, some people on welfare get as little as $8 a month. In Ohio, $2.50 is sometimes allotted for a child's winter coat. In New York, prices go up drastically on "check day" in grocery stores serving the poor. In Philadelphia, a couple and eight children are expected to survive on $198 a month—a fairly typical concept of "welfare" as uncovered at this convention.

There are three times as many impoverished whites as blacks in the country, but the percentage of Negro poor is three times higher. The welfare movement is not entirely without a racial tone, but it is not primarily an adjunct of black power. Whites are welcome. The rallying cry is something that has not been heard since the 1930s and, before that, in the old Populist movement—"poor power." Negroes dominate because, more than whites, they are aware that for them welfare is likely to be a permanent way of life, and they are more eager to set their shelf in order. There is a Dostoevsky-like naturalism about a convention whose highest aim is to achieve reasonable poverty, but that was precisely the goal in this instance. These poor are demanding that all states be required to give welfare grants that would bring the recipients up to the federal "poverty line," or, failing in that, permit the welfare recipients to work enough to bring their income up to the poverty level without losing welfare money as a penalty for working. Other demands are modest enough: that the federal surplus foods program be available in every state (Mississippi wants to get rid of the program in order to starve out unneeded black farm workers, whom it already openly offers free bus tickets to Northern and Western states), and to require all states to provide aid to dependent children (only twenty-one states give this aid at present).

Unlike the civil rights movement—which these people speak of in the past tense, accepting it as dead—the welfare rights movement has no delusions about brotherhood as a quiescent but arousable passion in the bosom of the white man. Dr. George Wiley, former associate professor of chemistry at Syracuse University and former associate national director of CORE, is the leader of the Welfare Rights movement. He was boisterously applauded when he said, "If we learned anything from the civil rights movement, it is that it is a mistake to think the liberals and moderates would grant what we are entitled to once the Negro stood up and demanded his rights."

It is a brave venture, launched on the theory that the organization can be held together with dues squeezed out of people who already do not have nearly enough. Wiley put his followers on notice that "we are going to have to organize independently of churches, unions, poverty programs." The New York Times' A. H. Raskin recently predicted that one of the top priorities on Walter Reuther's schedule, now that he has freed himself from Meany's drag, will be the organization of the poor. If this is true, it is news to Wiley, who has had no offers of help from labor. Even less does he expect help from the Office of Economic Opportunity, which Wiley contends is doing what it can to frustrate all organizing by the poor themselves.

The convention leaders asked President Johnson for an audience, but not only did he turn them down, he refused to let them talk to any member of the White House staff.

It was no disappointment. The officials of this movement expect nothing that is not forced from the Establishment. They hope eventually to have the strength to squeeze. Now they've scattered to their twenty-five states, their seventy cities, to recruit. The potential is there. As one woman put it fiercely, "We've got more po' folks than Johnson's got rich folks." That's the way they talked. Not "the President," and never "President Johnson." Niceties are for people who can afford them. These people are broke, angry, desperate and active.

The Arms Sales Racket

The Nation has been hammering away at the arms-sales program of the Department of Defense so long that, more than once, we have felt like apologizing to our readers for harping on an issue that seemed to agitate no one else (see "Kuss of Death," January 24, 1966, which referred to four earlier editorials on the subject, and "Arms-Twisting Arms Salesmen," June 20, 1966). Now, thanks largely to the efforts of Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy, the staff of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee has issued an excellent report on the program. Again and again the public has been assured that no arms sales are made without careful checks. But the staff report indicates that sales have been largely immune from policy considerations—except as the Department of Defense determines foreign policy. The Arms Control and Disarmament Agency does not sit at the high table; the State Department's Office of Munitions Control has had virtually no influence over these transactions. In this field, as in many others, State is the tail wagged by Defense.

The arms-peddling program was instituted under the Mutual Security Act of 1957 with a $15 million fund which soon became a revolving fund and hence a permanent fixture of the defense setup. With success, it grew to $300 million. The legislation was amended, some years ago, to place a total government guarantee behind the sales—a guarantee of market, of profit, even of collection if the credit of the buyer was dubious. What manufacturer could ask for more? With the exception of a few vigilant voices, Congress allowed this program to expand without inquiring into the reasons for it or checking up on the consequences (as in the India-Pakistan flare-up or, more recently, in the Middle East). J. K. Galbraith explains this remarkable lassitude as "the curious obtuseness which excessive preoccupation with cold-war strategy produces in otherwise excellent minds." The recommendations in the staff report, if adopted, should bring this irresponsible arms-peddling program under proper control. The report is one more welcome indication that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is beginning to win back for the Senate a larger role in the formation and conduct of foreign policy.

The Bentley Award

The appropriateness of presenting the George Jean Nathan Award for Dramatic Criticism to Eric Bentley is so obvious as to require almost no comment. Not only is Mr. Bentley one of the most stimulating of critics; he is also so effectively engaged in teaching, translating, editing and directing as almost to comprise a theatre movement in his single person. He could as suitably have received this recognition in any of the past six years since the award was founded, but we are pleased for him that its $4,000 comes at a moment when he is going on leave from Columbia University to carry out ventures in the theatre which he has had in mind for some time.

The first George Jean Nathan Award was made to Harold Clurman; its presentation to Mr. Bentley gives us the illusion that The Nation has been honored a second time. Over the years, we have come to think of him as the voice in our wings: the phone rings, a batch of clippings falls on our desk, a poem is offered, a letter beginning "Sirs:" takes us to task. It is Eric Bentley tipping us off, adding zest to our propositions, rapping our knuckles—and in whatever role showing an intense interest in what we say and how we say it.

It is an illusion, though, to suppose that this shows in Bentley any special concern for The Nation—he conducts himself with the same committed energy toward many of the contemporary journals of news and debate. He does so out of a conviction that men of letters, artists and critics, have a duty of citizenship to participate in the critical issues of their day. Bentley is English by birth and education, and his attitude is more common in Great Britain. We wish it would grow here, and that to encourage it someone would offer an Eric Bentley Award for men of letters who contribute usefully to the political, social and ethical dialogue of their day.

The Fighting Johnsons

When President Johnson was on his wild-swinging Far East tour, he stopped off in Korea to cheer the troops and it was there, in at least one speech, he made the claim that his great-grandfather died at the Alamo—that most sacred battle in Texas' war for independence from Mexico, a battle in which about 180 defenders (different historians give varying figures) died to the man. A Texas politician lucky enough to have had a relative at the Alamo would never pass up an opportunity to mention it. But not until 1966 did President Johnson make the claim. Why? Marquis Childs, reporting the incident, put the reason with gentlemanly subtlety: "This came as news to the Texas reporters" who heard the speech.

Now it seems that ad hoc history is taking hold. On January 15, James Reston of The New York Times wrote that Johnson is ". . . as idealistic as Wilson at Versailles and as savage as his grandfather at the Alamo."

TAPS, BUGS & SPIES

ANYTHING TO GET HOFFA

FRED J. COOK

Mr. Cook is the author of many important articles for The Nation.

In an era when only power counts, the long jungle warfare between James R. Hoffa and the U.S. Department of Justice has gone into a new, stimulating, and sometimes hilarious phase. It might be called, considering the government's protestations of hurt innocence, the Case of the Wire-Tapping Gremlins; it involves, among other things, the spectacle of J. Edgar Hoover's chosen heir apparent, Cartha DeLoch, with his foot in his mouth; and most of this can be attributed to a verity of modern American ethics: $200,000 in one pot will always outweigh a steady gratuity of $200 a month.

When the U.S. Supreme Court last December upheld his 1964 Chattanooga conviction for jury tampering, Hoffa let it be known that $200,000 in reward money awaited the man who could prove that his telephone lines had been tapped and his hotel premises bugged during that very period in 1964 when he was trying to consult with his attorneys and defend himself against the government's jury-tampering charges.

This munificent offer lured into the open one Benjamin David (Bud) Nichols, of Heiskell, Tenn., an expert in electronic gadgetry, who deposes that for the past ten years, in return for that $200 monthly bounty, he has been tapping and bugging at the whim and direction of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. One of his chores, he says, was the bugging and phone tapping of rooms occupied by Hoffa's entourage and by the jury during the Chattanooga trial.

There is not much doubt about the motivation that

The Nation wishes to do what it can to keep the ancestry of President Johnson inviolate from myth, and to that end points out the following: One of the President's grandfathers, Sam Ealy Johnson, Sr., was born in 1838, two years after the Alamo fell, and his other grandfather, Joseph Baines, was born "in the mid-1840s." Two Johnsons were killed at the Alamo but it would have been impossible for either of them to be his great-grandfather, since they died two years before the older of his grandfathers was born.

Just in case the history books referred to had goofed, The Nation telephoned Booth Mooney, LBJ's authorized biographer (The Lyndon Johnson Story) to inquire if he had ever heard Johnson mention this mysterious fighting ancestor. He hadn't.

This is not to disparage the President's ancestral ties to Texas history. After all, he did have a great-great-Uncle Bunton who fought at the battle of San Jacinto.

led Bud Nichols to make these belated revelations; hence, there might be some natural skepticism about his testimony. But the new motion that Hoffa's attorneys filed with the Supreme Court at the end of January does not rest upon Bud Nichols' story alone. His account is bolstered by the sworn statements of four public officers, who aver from their own personal knowledge that Hoffa and his attorney of record, William E. Bufalino, were victims of widespread and persistent wire tapping.

This new evidence reinforces what was patent to all but the innocent and the credulous in the record of the Chattanooga trial. A bit of background here becomes necessary.

Hoffa's trial in Chattanooga was based upon the earlier, so-called "Test Fleet" trial in Nashville, Tenn., which had ended in a hung jury. Hardly was the first trial over when Hoffa and a number of co-defendants were indicted and brought to trial in Chattanooga on the charge of tampering with the Nashville jury.

The government's ace in the hole in the Chattanooga trial was Edward Grady Partin, an ex-convict and a Baton Rouge, La., Teamster boss. Partin had been a constant Hoffa hanger-on during the Nashville trial and had ended up as a kind of sergeant-at-arms at Hoffa's door. Yet all the time, it developed, he had been an informer for Robert F. Kennedy's Department of Justice.

Partin had been in jail in Louisiana on charges of embezzlement and theft of union records, first-degree manslaughter and kidnapping. According to an affidavit later supplied to the Hoffa defense by a cellmate, Partin had announced that he would get out of jail by turning in Hoffa. He didn't care a damn about Hoffa, he reportedly said; a man had to look out for himself. And so it transpired; bail was supplied; Partin was sprung; and at once enlisted in the ranks of justice as an undercover man.

The day after his release, Partin telephoned Hoffa and invited himself (as the government's own recordings of this and a subsequent conversation showed) to join Hoffa in Nashville. Partin went to this self-arranged rendezvous primed by government agents to look out for jury tampering. With this strong hint to guide him, he soon began turning up just the kind of stories his new employers wanted. Though government witnesses walked the thin line of perjury in denying that Partin was a paid informer (a violation of federal law), the government eventually was compelled to admit that more than $1,500 had been paid to Partin's wife in regular monthly installments. There was other evidence of a quid pro quo. Once Hoffa was convicted with Partin's help, the government thoughtfully overlooked some $5,000 in income tax evasion charges, and the indictments for embezzlement and manslaughter and kidnaping have remained suspended.

All of this the U.S. Supreme Court, with only Chief Justice Earl Warren vigorously dissenting, upheld as perfectly proper conduct in its December decision rejecting Hoffa's appeal. In doing so, the court also overlooked and condoned the fact that Hoffa and his lawyers and his witnesses had been subjected to constant surveillance by a squad of twenty-five FBI agents in a fleet of roving cars, directed from a radio command post, during the entire course of the Chattanooga trial. Patent on the record were indications that Hoffa's telephone lines and hotel suite must have been thoroughly tapped and bugged.

There was, for example, the Bernard Spindel incident. Spindel is a skilled wire tapper and electronics expert, and Hoffa, in the middle of the trial, had decided to call him to Chattanooga to counterspy electronically on the Department of Justice. The summons had been relayed to Spindel at his New York home by telephone, and when Spindel landed in Chattanooga, a small army of FBI agents was on hand to tail him from the airport to Hoffa's hotel headquarters. It was clear from the testimony of the government's own witnesses that they knew exactly who was coming and where and when to meet him—a most remarkable instance of forensic telepathy.

New light is now shed on such mysteries by the affidavits of Bud Nichols and four assorted public officers. According to Nichols, in an affidavit he signed for Hoffa's defense on January 11, he had been employed for ten years as a private snooper for the FBI, working out of the Knoxville office under the direction of FBI Agent John A. Parker. In summarizing his relationship with America's most sacrosanct agency, Nichols said:

I have been an informer for the FBI; I have tapped many telephone wires and performed many functions for the FBI; I have stolen for the FBI in conjunction with other agencies that required such service, the details of which have been incorporated in a statement given to Mr. Hoffa's attorneys. I feel that I have been a captive of the FBI. . . . I have made available to Mr. Hoffa's attorneys certain pertinent documents substantiating not only my qualifications in the electronics field but other evidence with respect to my association with the FBI and other agencies.

All this, if true, must come as a great shock to J. Edgar Hoover, who touched off a recent war of words by insisting his boys would never, never have practiced such black arts except for the explicit orders of Robert Kennedy. Ten years' service, of course, predates Kennedy's brief reign as Hoover's titular superior. Any pain that Hoover might feel by such revelations, however, must be mild compared to the anguish that will be Kennedy's if he ever reads the remainder of Nichols' affidavit.

According to Nichols, this is the way it happened:

About the middle of January, 1964, he was summoned by FBI Agent Parker for duty on the Hoffa case, and on January 16 or 17, Parker himself delivered two tape recorders and a batch of eavesdropping equipment to Nichols' home. Nichols was instructed to go to Chattanooga the next day and to call the FBI office there, using the code name of Major. He followed instructions and so met Walter Sheridan, Kennedy's special delegate in charge of the rackets squad entrusted with the task of nailing Hoffa. Sheridan, Nichols said, introduced him to another man with the words: "This is Major and he will work with you." Then, he said, Sheridan handed him a sketch and gave his new partner a set of keys.

Nichols and his newly designated aide departed about 9:30 or 10 P.M. for the Read House, a hotel in Chattanooga where the Hoffa trial jury was to be sequestered. They went to the tenth floor, and Nichols placed tiny radio transmitters in various rooms in accordance with the sketch given him by Sheridan. He also tapped all the phones. A recorder and a receiver were placed in a central room next to the elevator. Then Nichols walked through each room, counting in a soft voice to make sure the bugs were working, and picking up each telephone and counting softly into its mouthpiece. Satisfied that no spoken word could elude the sensitive electronic gadgetry, the two men went over to the Patten Hotel, where they similarly treated Rooms 906, 908, 912 and 914, all of which were to be occupied by Hoffa and his retinue.

Nichols' story is that he was kept on duty in Chattanooga throughout the trial, receiving an additional compensation of $842 from the federal government. On one occasion, he says, he received an emergency summons to meet Walter Sheridan near the Patten Hotel. The tape recorder on Hoffa's taps appeared to have gone haywire. Nichols says he found a jack was loose and shoved it back in. Sheridan, he adds, "picked up several tapes and told me to go to the car and that he would be out in a minute. He came out to the car with the tapes in an envelope. I know this, for he referred to them in his conversation as we were going down to the Read House and stated that he knew they were going to win this case because Hoffa and his 'legal beagles were going crazy.'"

After another brief stop at the Read House, Nichols says, Sheridan "came down with an identical type of package which contained tapes, and he indicated that the jury pretty well had made up their minds."

Such is the Bud Nichols story. Naturally, there has been the very devil to pay. One tactic has been to denigrate Nichols. He was sentenced to six months at hard labor while in the army in 1948; he had four forgery charges lodged against him by Columbus, Ga., police in 1949; and he was sentenced to four months in the workhouse in Knoxville on two forgery charges in 1951. He enlisted for a second hitch in the army in 1958 (this, he says, was at the behest of the FBI for whom he was doing undercover work), and was arrested as a deserter in February, 1959. On the whole, the government implies, here is an untrustworthy character—almost as untrustworthy as Edward Grady Partin.

James R. Hoffa

Walter Sheridan is now an executive with the National Broadcasting Company. Enraged at the Nichols story, he told The New York Times: "I never met him [Nichols] in my life. I don't know of any wire tapping or bugging in the Hoffa case. As far as the statements made about me being involved in any bugging or wire tapping in this case—they're absolutely false."

FBI Agent Parker, the man who, Nichols says, gave him most of his orders during the years he lived underground with the FBI, seemed to have a different reaction. Asked if he knew Nichols, he groaned: "Oh, good Lord." And then shut up.

As for the Teamsters, they insist that they treated the Nichols tale with the greatest circumspection. Nichols was brought to the Washington headquarters of the Teamsters and grilled for a whole weekend by Teamster attorneys. "We checked every facet of his life and story before we would accept it," one Teamster spokesman says. Bernard Spindel was brought in to question Nichols about the details of the electronic eavesdropping, and assured the Teamsters that Nichols' description of the rooms and telephone hookups in the Patten and Read House was accurate in every detail. In addition, Teamster representatives say: "We have documentary evidence of things he did for the FBI. We can't say what it is at this time, but it is good and it is solid."

Whatever private documentation the Teamsters may have about Bud Nichols and his activities, they have offered the court affidavits from three public officers who swear that they heard Walter Sheridan play back tapes of conversations that had taken place in Hoffa's suite in Chattanooga. Here again some essential background is necessary.

One of the stranger aspects of the jury-fixing tales spun by Edward Grady Partin involved a Huntington, W. Va., businessman named Nicholas Tweel. Partin's story was that on October 22, 1962, the very day of his arrival in Nashville to begin his spying on Hoffa, he had happened to meet Tweel in the lobby of the Andrew Jackson Hotel. He had never laid eyes on Tweel before, nor Tweel on him, but according to Partin they struck up such a fast and furious friendship that Tweel told him all about Hoffa's plans to fix the Nashville jury. Subsequently, Tweel and a business associate, Allen Dorfman, of Chicago, an insurance man who handled Teamster funds, were indicted with Hoffa on jury-fixing charges.

At the resulting 1964 Chattanooga trial at which Hoffa was convicted, Partin's account of the Tweel-Dorfman involvements in the alleged conspiracy received some rough handling. Tweel insisted he'd never known Hoffa, never met him, right up to the moment they were arraigned together on the jury-tampering indictment. Tweel's whole contact, it developed, had been with Dorfman, with whom he was planning a business venture. They had been scheduled to meet elsewhere, but Dorfman had been summoned to Nashville by Hoffa to bring some records that might be needed in the pending "Test Fleet" trial—and so Dorfman had asked Tweel to meet him there. Tweel was in Nashville for only one day and part of another; he discussed his business deal with Dorfman, then went back to Huntington, and never returned to Nashville. Even the jury that convicted Hoffa couldn't buy Partin's tale of Tweel's involvement, and both Dorfman and Tweel were acquitted.

But it was as a result of the Tweel tale told by Partin that three Huntington public officers became involved in the case and ultimately found themselves indicted. The key figure in this offshoot of the Hoffa case is Herman A. Frazier, now retired after twenty-four years' service with the Huntington Police Department. Frazier at one time had served as acting chief of the department, and in the fall of 1962 was Chief of Detectives. He had also been long active in the Fraternal Order of Police, a national organization with some 60,000 full-time police officers as members, and from 1961-65 was vice president of this organization. In addition to his official duties, he and two brother officers had organized the Huntington Research Bureau, a private agency concerned primarily with polygraph work, screening employees for private industry and national defense agencies.

On October 19, 1962, three days before Partin in Nashville was to encounter and implicate Tweel, Frazier received a visit from a mystery man who identified himself as Jack Wrather. He told Frazier that the trial was to start in Nashville the following Monday and said that Hoffa's forces needed a check on the panel from which the trial jury would be drawn. Frazier expressed some surprise that the Teamsters, with their resources, wouldn't already have gathered all the information they needed, but Wrather silenced his doubts by giving him two $100 bills and six $50s. Frazier agreed to take off for Nashville, to register at the Noel Hotel, and to get in touch with Wrather who would be at the Andrew Jackson.

To help him, Frazier enlisted Police Capt. Alfred Nelson Paden, of the Huntington force, and Albert P. Cole, who at the time was personnel director of Huntington. Frazier later testified that he began to have some qualms about this whole mysterious business and that these qualms were intensified when an unknown man appeared at his hotel room and began instructing him about the procedure for checking on the jury panel. Frazier's two comrades were absent, and when Frazier expressed some doubts about whether they could fulfill their assignment, the man said, oh, it was very simple, he would show Frazier how it was done. Picking up Frazier's hotel room phone, he made a few calls to prospective jurors, pretending he was a journalist doing a story. Frazier began to dislike the look of things and said he wouldn't do anything until he had talked to Wrather. So he went to the Andrew Jackson Hotel and asked for Jack Wrather. And was told that no such man was there, or ever had been.

While at the Andrew Jackson, Frazier chanced to meet Nicholas Tweel, whom he had known since school days in Huntington. That night, he and his friends had dinner with Tweel, did the town a bit; and the next day they all went back to Huntington, never having heard from Jack Wrather again, never having done anything in Nashville. But behind them, on the record, of course, were those telephone calls that, according to Frazier, the mysterious visitor had made from their hotel rooms.

Now matters began to get sticky for Frazier, Paden and Cole. On February 1, 1963, two FBI agents called on Frazier. He was later subpoenaed to testify before a Nashville grand jury investigating the alleged jury fixing, and he was questioned many times by Walter Sheridan. Sheridan, he says, demanded that he take a lie-detector test. Frazier at first demurred, but later agreed. He was given a long and exhaustive lie-detector test by the FBI; and, as he never heard anything about it again, as the results were not subsequently used to challenge his veracity, it must be assumed that he passed with flying colors.

Despite this, Frazier, Paden and Cole were indicted for attempted jury fixing. They were tried twice. The first jury disagreed and the second, in a trial in early 1965, acquitted them.

During all the months that their fate hung in the balance, Frazier says in the affidavit he has now furnished the Teamsters, he and his companions were repeatedly questioned and pressured to get them to testify against Hoffa. "It would require many pages to tell all the harassment, pressure and embarrassment we suffered at the hands of some members of the United States Department of Justice," his affidavit says. He charges that much of the pressure came from Walter Sheridan, and he relates one incident in which, he says, Sheridan exposed himself.

"At one such interview before my indictment," Frazier's affidavit reads, "Sheridan asked me several questions subject of which he could only have known by listening to my phone conversations. I told him he was tapping my phone and he would not deny nor admit it.

"Nelson Paden and I decided to lay a trap by phone to prove to Sheridan that we knew he was tapping our phones. We decided on a name few people have and that we would discuss that name when we called each other. We used the name 'Armentrout' and indicated that he was connected with our being in Nashville. Apparently, Sheridan couldn't contain himself and he asked me who Armentrout was and why we hadn't told him of Armentrout. I then accused him of tapping my phone. I told him that Armentrout didn't exist and that he had fallen into our trap. He did not deny the accusation."

Sheridan remained convinced that Tweel and Dorfman, acting as go-betweens for Hoffa in the jury-fixing plot, had been responsible for the presence of the three investigators in Nashville, and so, Frazier says, he kept trying to get what he called "the truth" from them. According to Frazier, Paden and Cole, Sheridan was finally driven into committing the indiscretion of playing his tapes. Frazier says that on one occasion Sheridan turned on a tape recorder for him, and—

Two men were talking. One was Hoffa's voice. Sheridan said it was Hoffa and that the other was an attorney. . . . Hoffa was asking this man who the hell Frazier, Paden and Cole were and who the hell brought them to Nashville in the first place. The other man said he didn't know who they were. . . .

Frazier says in his affidavit that Sheridan played another tape:

I could hear a noise like a phone ringing and a voice said, "Hello." Hoffa's voice said, "Bufalino, do you know who the hell Frazier, Paden and Cole are and how the hell they got involved in this case?" Bufalino said: "Jimmie, I really don't know. I do know Nick Tweel knows them."

Hoffa and Bufalino discussed the problem some more, and Hoffa decided to get an opinion from Z. T. (Tommy) Osborn, Jr., one of his attorneys in Nashville and a man who was to be indicted and convicted on jury-tampering charges. Sheridan, Frazier said, then played another sample of his tape library that began by a sound like a phone ringing. Then a receiver sound and a female voice saying three names, I don't remember the first two, but the third was Osborn. Hoffa's voice then said, "Hoffa—put Tommy on the phone." A man answered and Hoffa asked, "Tommy, do you know those men from Huntington, West Virginia?" Osborn said he had met them. Hoffa asked if Tweel and Dorfman knew them. Osborn said yes, he understood they did. Hoffa asked if Osborn thought he should be contacted for statements. Osborn said he saw no reason for us to be interviewed . . . then the conversation ended by Hoffa saying, "Our troubles are big enough now without taking on someone else's troubles." Osborn agreed.

Sheridan's purpose in playing the tapes, Frazier said, was to demonstrate to the three investigators that Hoffa wasn't going to help them—and so they had better play ball with him. On one occasion, with all three of the accused investigators present, he played a tape to emphasize this very point. The recording apparently had been made of the conversation of a group of men sitting around a table talking. "One had Hoffa's voice saying Tweel and Dorfman denied any connection with us and that they [Tweel and Dorfman] weren't going to involve themselves with us."

Police Captain Paden's affidavit adds more details about this last scene. He recalls that Hoffa said at one point that he knew nothing about Frazier, Paden and Cole "and we could all go to hell, or something similar." After giving this a chance to sink in, Sheridan, according to Paden, turned to them and said: "See, you don't mean a thing to these people. Your only chance is to change your story and involve Tweel and Dorfman."

Cole quotes Sheridan as telling them in addition: "These are the big boys—these are Hoffa and his attorneys, sitting there discussing you fellows. And you can see now that Tweel and Dorfman have abandoned you. You are getting nothing from them—the Hoffa organization—you boys are on your own. I'm the only person that can possibly help you."

Since Frazier, Paden and Cole still refused to play ball, they were indicted and forced to go through two trials to clear themselves. All three men say that Sheridan asked them not to disclose his tape playing, and Frazier says that he told Sheridan they wouldn't. However, Frazier adds, after the Supreme Court turned down Hoffa's appeal, he read that Hoffa "had only thirty-eight days to file an appeal or he was going to jail," and he decided he couldn't keep silent any longer. He telephoned Paden and Cole and told them what he had decided to do. "They both advised me to go ahead and they would back me all the way," Frazier says. The dovetailing affidavits from all three followed.

There is other confirming evidence. About the time that the Supreme Court was turning down Hoffa's appeal, wire tapping and bugging began to become a highly sensitive issue. Forced disclosures that these arts had been practiced on a wide scale led to the overturn of several convictions, most notably that of Fred M. Black, an associate of Bobby Baker, for income-tax evasion. The Internal Revenue Service, its prosecutions put in jeopardy by these disclosures, called for a study of all cases in which such eavesdropping might have been involved. The overturn of convictions and confirmation of the long-standing belief that no man can be sure of privacy in a world of snoopers began to give law enforcement a black eye, and J. Edgar Hoover, who does not take criticism gracefully, threw the blame on Kennedy. Kennedy expressed utter surprise.

J. Edgar Hoover

Such was the situation when William Loeb, the wealthy and ultraconservative publisher of the Manchester Union-Leader in New Hampshire, had what he described as a most revealing conversation with Cartha DeLoch, Assistant Chief of the FBI and the man reportedly favored by Hoover to succeed him. In an affidavit later supplied to the Hoffa defense, Loeb said on December 20, 1966:

DeLoch stated to me that during his tenure Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy had a special unit of three individuals mainly responsible for wire tapping. He said that the unit was headed by Walter J. Sheridan, Special Assistant for Kennedy, and that the actual wire tapping was done by a man named Eddie Jones. DeLoch stated that Jones had been placed on the payroll of the Immigration and Naturalization Service through the efforts of the Attorney General. . . . He said the third member of the group responsible for wire tapping was a Carmine Bellino. He further stated that Attorney General Kennedy had instructed the Internal Revenue Service to tap wires.

DeLoch, in discussing the James R. Hoffa case, suggested to me that I suggest to the Hoffa lawyers that their best move would be to ask the Department of Justice to conduct an investigation of wire tapping in connection with the various Hoffa trials. He said that if such an investigation were conducted he was sure that it would turn up extensive evidence of wire tapping in connection with the trials of Hoffa.

Loeb added that he telephoned DeLoch the next day and said he thought that what he had been told was so newsworthy he should use a story about it. DeLoch replied, Loeb's affidavit states, that "if I attempted to publicize this information he would deny that he ever talked to me about the matter."

So Loeb put the information in an affidavit for Hoffa—and things started to sizzle. FBI spokesmen pointed out that Loeb had obtained a $2.5 million loan from the Teamsters for his newspaper chain and that he had been offering a $100,000 reward for anyone who could turn up evidence of eavesdropping on Hoffa. DeLoch himself was not available for direct quotation, but FBI sources indicated that he had denied all.

This counterattack incensed Loeb. His loan from the Teamsters is paid up to date, he said (the Teamsters themselves insist that it has been an excellent business deal), and besides the issue was simple: who was telling the truth? To determine this, Loeb challenged DeLoch to take a lie-detector test, offering to take one himself. He pointed out that what was at stake was whether a man should unjustly go to jail; then he added, turning the knife:

"Of equal importance also is the fact that you are frequently mentioned as Hoover's successor as head of the FBI. It is therefore important that if you are to succeed Hoover it be determined right now whether you have told the truth in this situation."

While Washington was chuckling over this contretemps, the Teamsters were further documenting for the Supreme Court the extent of the espionage that, they claimed, had violated Hoffa's rights. In additional affidavits, William E. Bufalino, Hoffa's attorney of record, described his experiences with federal bugging and wire tapping.

On November 15, 1961, he and the late James E. Haggerty, Sr., of Detroit, the courtroom strategist for Hoffa, were in the San Juan Hotel in Orlando, Fla., preparing Hoffa's defense against charges that had been brought against him there. Bufalino states:

I was in Haggerty's room discussing the pending case with him when Haggerty reached for the telephone to make a call. He dropped a piece of paper on the floor and bent over to pick it up. He called my attention to a piece of black adhesive tape which was hanging from the underside of a shelf of the telephone table. The lower side of the shelf was approximately ten inches from the floor. We looked underneath the table and I observed an object two inches wide and an inch-and-a-half thick. It was taped to the underside of the shelf and appeared to be of black, plastic material.

Haggerty and Bufalino notified the Orlando Police Department of their find, and were told by Lieut. Bill Yohn that they had discovered "an electronic wireless transmitter." Orlando police thoughtfully turned the gadget over to the FBI for "investigation." Haggerty and Bufalino had an appointment to meet with FBI agents in Orlando, but the FBI canceled out. Hoffa subsequently charged that evidence used as a basis for the Orlando indictment had been illegally obtained through the wire-tapping activities of Edward M. Jones, then an employee of the McClellan committee. Subpoenaed, Jones testified that he was a wire tapper, that he had tapped for the McClellan committee; but then, asked directly whether he had tapped Hoffa's wires, he refused to answer, taking refuge in the fact that the McClellan committee had invoked Senate Rule XXX, which conveniently provides that no Senate employee can be compelled to produce documents or reveal information without the consent of the Senate.

Against this background, William Bufalino's most recent experiences with wire tappers become fascinating. For many months, he and his wife had complained to the Detroit Bell Telephone Company that the phones in their Grosse Pointe Shores, Mich., home appeared to have been tapped; but, until the summer of 1965, they had no proof. Then, on June 10, 1965, Mrs. Bufalino dialed from her home phone, Tuxedo 1-6859, to a number in Kingston, Pa.—Area Code 717, Butler 7-2024. Minutes after the call had been completed, Bufalino charges in a suit he has brought against Detroit Bell, some unknown caller telephoned the Butler number, trying to find out who had made the long-distance call. Not getting any cooperation, the caller said he would find out in Detroit. Shortly afterward, Bufalino charges, his wife's phone rang and a caller, identifying himself only as "a telephone company employee," insisted that she identify herself and give her telephone number. When she refused and asked the caller to identify himself, he became abusive and threatened to cut off her telephone.

Robert F. Kennedy

"If I really want the number, I'll make you report it out of order and I know I got the right line," the caller said.

Shortly afterward, Tuxedo 1-6859 did indeed go dead, and Bufalino raised a storm with Detroit Bell. Service was restored the following morning. About 10:15 A.M., June 11, 1965, while Bufalino was talking to his wife from his office, there came an interruption, and suddenly Bufalino found himself listening in on the conversation of two unknown men. Having a free phone handy, he switched on a dictaphone and recorded the conversation. The two chitchatting ghosts, who later identified themselves as Frank Kaminski and Robert Koss, both employees of Detroit Bell, were discussing the hard time Mrs. Bufalino had given them the day before:

KAMINSKI: You know I'm so mad I'm shaking. Bob. If I had her, honest to God, I'd kick her right in the teeth. How can you talk nice to people like that is what gets me. Huh?

KOSS: She thinks she's King of the Hill.

KAMINSKI: Ain't no way for a telephone man—how in hell can you identify if she—if she misconstrued it what I told her yesterday. I told her—I say if re—I really want that number, I'll make you report it out of order and I know I got the right line (click). Who's on here?

HOLOWICH: Holowich.

KAMINSKI: Holowich, I'll put you on hold. It'll probably be a couple of minutes, or give me a call in about five. It'll be better off then.

HOLOWICH: I'm up the pole now, Frank.

KAMINSKI: Well, you'll have to hang on now, Dick.

With Holowich waiting up the pole, Kaminski and Koss resumed their conversation about all the troubles the Bufalinos were giving them. At one point, Kaminski said he'd bet Bufalino was talking to "her" right now about them.

KOSS: Can you put her line up and check?

KAMINSKI: Oh, that's easily done (pause; click). No. No. She ain't—she ain't there now. See? She reported this yesterday.

Koss: Yeah?

KAMINSKI: Yeah (pause). Well, when is he going to pick this up? (Pause.) Kinda exciting, isn't it there?

Here Bufalino came on the wire, got the two talkative telephone employees to identify themselves, and then notified them he would see them in court.

Subsequently, in pretrial depositions, Bufalino established that Detroit police had set up a wire-tap listening post in a second-floor apartment at 15414 East Mack Avenue. One of the policemen who monitored the taps finally acknowledged the part he had played. In a pretrial deposition on November 6, 1966, the policeman, Paul L. Quaglia, conceded that he knew Walter Sheridan and said he had worked on the wire-tap detail with Sgt. Walter DePugh, who left the Detroit force to join the Internal Revenue Service in November, 1963.

According to Quaglia's pretrial testimony, repeated in an affidavit he gave Hoffa's lawyers at the end of December, the East Mack Avenue listening post was equipped with four tape recorders and four sets of earphones. There was also, he said, "a pen register on the Bufalino wire tap" that traced out the numbers of phones being dialed. Quaglia said that throughout the fall of 1962 and part of 1963, he monitored the Bufalino wire taps. Detroit police, he said, had no interest in Bufalino, and it was his understanding the taps were being made for federal authorities. Many of the calls, he said, dealt with details of Hoffa's legal problems, and many of Bufalino's recorded conversations were with other defense attorneys.

Although Solicitor General Thurgood Marshall has submitted a formal memo to the Supreme Court, denying that government agents used bugs or wire taps before or during Hoffa's Chattanooga trial, it is not necessary to interpret the evidence detailed above as casting doubt on Mr. Marshall's word. More likely, he is only one of many Americans who have not yet grasped the extreme sophistication with which certain government agencies cut the corners of veracity.

Nor are the circumstances here set down of concern only to Hoffa and his colleagues. They involve the question of whether any man, even one as powerful as Hoffa, has a fighting chance to defend himself if, as the record seems to indicate, he must battle the paid and planted informer, the agent provocateur, the wire tapper eavesdropping on his most private conversations with his attorneys. The pioneers who founded this nation fled from oppressive systems in which a man accused by authority virtually stood condemned. Now, in this age of massed and overweening power, the rights, the dignity and the freedom of the individual are scorned by an immune and sanctified authority. That is the real issue that Hoffa has presented to the Supreme Court.

ETHIOPIA

THE OVER-PRESENT AMERICANS

NEIL G. KOTLER

Mr. Kotler served in the Peace Corps in Asmara, Ethiopia, from 1964 to 1966, teaching Ethiopian history at a secondary school and at a university center.

In terms of money spent and personnel assigned, America is more deeply involved in Ethiopia than in any other African country. But for all this involvement, most of it a substantial help to Ethiopia, we have provoked hostility among all groups in the population, ranging from suspicion on the part of the masses to anger among the students. I judge the Russians, who have contributed far less materially, to be more appreciated. In surface reactions, Ethiopians praise our economic and technical assistance; when their deeper feelings are elicited, however, they often admit to finding our presence repugnant. They concede that our economic assistance programs are generally beneficial, but regard our military assistance and our own military activities as harmful.

To be sure, a nation that possesses vast global interests cannot expect to be loved or trusted in every quarter, but we should be able to presume at least respect for our position and even at times appreciation for the good we may have accomplished. When our policies evoke fear from a people who are not our adversaries, or suspicion from a people whom we claim to be helping, we should ask what produces these disconcerting reactions.

Ethiopia is the oldest independent country in sub-Saharan Africa. Its situation on the Red Sea gives it strategic commercial importance, and its agricultural resources, if properly exploited, could make it the breadbasket of Africa. It comprises about 450,000 square miles (larger than Texas and California combined), and its population is estimated as high as 20 million, third largest after Egypt and Nigeria, on the continent. The prowess of its soldiers and its ancient and glorious past have won it a position of great influence in contemporary African affairs.

Since World War II the United States has given Ethiopia several hundred million dollars in economic and military assistance. To a country whose literacy rate is less than 10 per cent, the Peace Corps since 1962 has supplied nearly 1,000 teachers. In the academic year 1962-63, Peace Corps volunteers teaching in the general secondary schools outnumbered the Ethiopians. The American Government has helped finance and develop the national university and is building there the John F. Kennedy Memorial Library. American money has supported the education of a large proportion of Ethiopia's elite who have studied at American universities.

We built the first agricultural school in a land that derives nearly all of its revenues from agriculture. We also built the first public health college. Ethiopia's mountainous terrain has put tremendous obstacles in the way of unification; American money financed an excellent system of roads and communications. The two major jet airports in the country were built with American money, and Ethiopia's national airline, the most profitable in Africa, was launched with American aid and the technical skills of TWA. Ethiopia has fought many wars against foreign invaders and still must protect its territory against encroaching neighbors. American military assistance has equipped its soldiers with modern weapons and trained them in the techniques of modern warfare.

In return, our single most important benefit is treaty rights to large plots of land in Eritrea, the northernmost province, on which the U.S. Army operates the largest military communications installation in Africa. Known as Kagnaw Station, it performs highly complex functions, serving as a vital link between East and West, monitoring other countries' broadcasts and communications traffic, participating in space communications. This property is so valuable because its location, close to the equator and at an elevation of several thousand feet, provides excellent atmospheric conditions. Ethiopia's port of Massawa on the Red Sea offers excellent harbor facilities for the American Navy in an important part of the world. And beyond these material assets our assistance to, and support of, the Ethiopian Government has won us considerable influence in the shaping of Ethiopian foreign policy and, because of Emperor Haile Selassie's prestige among African leaders, the shaping of African policies as well.

At present, what with the military, USAID, USIS, the embassy and the consulates, at least 10,000 Americans, plus their dependents, are stationed in Ethiopia. Though concentrated in the major cities, they are also scattered through the countryside, and highly visible to both villagers and peasants. In Asmara, Ethiopia's second largest city with a population of about 150,000, 2,000 American soldiers and officers, with some 5,000 dependents, are attached to army, navy and air force units at Kagnaw Station. A large residential section of Asmara has become an American colony. Many bars and brothels have sprung up catering only to American soldiers. Small towns near Asmara that offer good vacation facilities have become American resort centers. In one such town the American military operate a spacious rest center which has the only outdoor swimming pool in the province; it is off-limits to the local people.

At Addis Ababa, the capital, American military personnel live in a suburb close to an airfield and near the only golf course in the capital. In one remote provincial center, a block of rooms in the best hotel is reserved for our military; a special table, marked with American-style condiments, is set aside for them in the dining room.

Ethiopian reaction to this weight of Americans varies among the different groups in the population. Peasants who farm the fields around Asmara regard the radio transmitters and tracking stations as objects of menacing proportions. One piece of equipment, a satellite tracking screen that measures more than 50 feet high, is assumed to be a gigantic military machine capable of incalculable havoc. All the instruments are in themselves quite harmless, but they look dangerous to illiterate Ethiopians.

Fed anti-American broadcasts from Arab capitals and Communist stations overseas, even many Ethiopian students believe that Kagnew Station is more than a communications center, that it conceals dangerous armaments, even missiles, which might drag their country into a global war. These fears are false, but before discounting them as fanciful, it is well to remember that in the popular mind, especially the mind of students fascinated by the intrigues and power struggles of the cold war, any military establishment must be serving some warlike purpose.

Ethiopians in Asmara often see American soldiers drunk, loud, rude and cavorting with prostitutes in the streets. Our troops did not introduce drinking and whoring into the country; indeed, many Ethiopian males are notorious in these respects. But their cultural habits—and the fact that they are at home—lead them to pursue such activities out of the public view. Their real complaint is that Americans (at least a rowdy minority of Americans) do not abide by Ethiopian standards of public conduct.

Many responsible Ethiopians—often those enjoying top government positions—complain because, under the existing status-of-forces treaty, American soldiers who fall foul of the law are judged and punished solely by American military authorities. It is an affront to their proud tradition of independence and sovereignty.

Most of the cars in Asmara are American-owned, and accidents are frequent. The average Ethiopian is incredibly innocent of the facts of automobile traffic. Peasants drive their herds through city streets; horse-drawn carriages make driving in Asmara an adventure. Our automobiles are adding complexity and strain to Ethiopian life. Ethiopians cannot understand, if we are encumbering and endangering their daily lives with our machines, why they cannot at least take steps to control the dangers and judge the violators. In a twofold sense, we deny them control over their own environment.

As always, American soldiers in Ethiopia have a reputation for being careless with money, and they are often victims of swindle and theft. Last year a drunken American soldier beat an Ethiopian to death. The military trial brought out that the dead man had been trying to rob his assailant, and the soldier was acquitted on the grounds of lack of intent to kill and provocation. The decision may have accorded with legal principles, but it evoked widespread indignation among Ethiopians, who felt that in a matter as grave as this their officials should have some jurisdiction.

Politically minded Ethiopians are particularly sensitive about guarding their country's independence and neutrality in the cold war. The students take seriously one of the principles of the Organization of African Unity which their government helped found: that no African country should permit foreign soldiers on its soil, especially in peacetime, and thereby fall under the domination of a great power. But American military advisers are attached to most units of the Ethiopian army, and recently our guerrilla experts have begun advising and directing Ethiopian soldiers in the field in the government's campaign to destroy Eritrean insurrectionists. (The Russians have no military activities in Ethiopia.)

A more serious indictment of our military activities is the charge that we are propping up a corrupt and moribund regime. During a period of acute political crisis in the spring of 1966, rumors spread from the university that tens of thousands of American soldiers had landed at a deserted airfield and were ready to rescue Haile Selassie's government from an incipient coup. The rumors were false, but the students were remembering that back in 1960, when the regime was almost toppled by a group of young military leaders, Americans gave active help to the government.

For several years an insurrectionary movement in Eritrea has been attempting to win independence for that province or at least to make it an autonomous unit in a federated Ethiopian state. In the spring of 1965, politically inspired strikes in the schools stirred rumors that the insurrectionists were ready to invade Asmara. The commander of Kagnew, fearing for the security of his base, ordered all military personnel to wear battle dress and arm themselves. Military jeeps patrolled the city with American soldiers alert behind the machine guns. United States officials later divulged that the guns had not been loaded, but many Ethiopians understandably resented a parade of strength which had the effect of supporting the government.

The hard-boiled question to be asked at this point is, so what? How important are the feelings of a minority? How much do the students count? Is it not enough that the masses, who probably support the existing government, are not seriously concerned about our military activities?

In fact, however, one aspect or another of our presence in Ethiopia has stirred anger among every group in the population. The masses are passive, but suspicious, and can be easily aroused by inflammatory leaders. Many young military officers, who represent a highly influential segment of the population, resent the extent of our political involvement. Students and intellectuals are openly hostile, and we commit a serious error if we underestimate the potential influence and power of such a group in developing countries. They are the only ones, except for foreign technicians, who will be able to manage the increasingly complex processes of government and business.

When an American works in a developing country, he makes a double impact. The first and most obvious is functional—supplying material goods and technical knowledge. The second, more subtle, is exemplary—the transmission of values, ideas and types of behavior to a people urgently searching for new ways of thinking and acting.

We do not operate in a vacuum overseas, but within other cultures. The peoples of developing countries are searching for ways more appropriate to the modern world, but always first trying to adjust their own customs to new imperatives. In terms of our second impact, it matters whether we impose ourselves upon their culture or work within their culture.

If we were to examine some of the cultural values of Ethiopians, we should find that we have heedlessly done many things to violate them. Ethiopians are deeply suspicious of foreigners, especially foreign soldiers, and yet we have created a large military presence and made our technological apparatus conspicuous. Ethiopians are intensely proud of their independence, but we have needlessly interfered in their affairs. Ethiopians have strict standards of public conduct, which we have often flagrantly violated. Ethiopians are painfully embarrassed by impoverishment and we have thoughtlessly made a show of our opulence. Leaving aside the question of propriety, has all this been sensible?

There is no simple policy that would at once elevate all the good things we do abroad and eliminate the undesirable things. Nor can we automatically win the hearts of foreigners merely by limiting ourselves to the "good" programs of economic and technical assistance. What we do in any country is invariably colored by what we are doing elsewhere in the world, and at present most of the peoples of the world disapprove of our global policies.

But we could at least take a closer look at our interests and policies abroad, and ask ourselves whether programs calculated to promote short-range tactical advantages advance our interests more than policies which might establish enduring relationships. Especially at a time when the world is aware of the destructiveness of our military machine, it might be wise to limit our military activities in areas where they obviously serve no strategic purpose. And if we must sustain some of these activities in Ethiopia, should we not at least try to curb the undesirable by-products which the Ethiopians resent?

U.S. CIVIL SERVICE

WASHINGTON'S BLAND BONDAGE

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington, D.C.

The United States Civil Service, like the old French Foreign Legion, is an excellent place to lose one's identity, but its other virtues are less easy to discover. In the vast Sahara of government service the worker is beset by deadly conformity, conflicting loyalties and sniping from unseen enemies. And just as the old recruiting posters of Paris used to tell baroque falsehoods about the romance and glamour of La Légion étrangère, so Civil Service recruits with myths.

The federal government describes itself as offering dignity, job security and appreciation for talent. It is instead a place where:

Spy holes are condoned in men's rest-rooms at the Pentagon. (Excuse: to combat homosexuality.)

Internal Revenue Service phones are tapped. (Excuse offered by IRS Commissioner Sheldon Cohen: "We supervise these phone calls for several reasons—to check the accuracy of tax information furnished by these employees, and to insure absolute and unfailing courtesy on their part." He said the eavesdropping is, of course, "completely impersonal.")

In some post offices, two-way mirrors (you can see through from the back) are used for spying on employees.

Dissident workers can be branded as mentally ill and dismissed from government service without the opportunity to protest or present contradicting evidence. Sometimes they are classified as mentally disturbed without being given a medical examination.

Both incoming and established employees are badgered with loyalty investigations to equal anything in the McCarthy era. Prying into the "loyalty" of workers in non-sensitive positions was supposedly ruled illegal by the Supreme Court in 1956, but it still goes on under a different guise—to determine "fitness" or "suitability." The USCS Bureau of Personnel Investigation employs 1,200 clerks and 800 agents as snoopers, and these are joined by the full force of the FBI. In fiscal 1966 the FBI handled 423,000 security forms submitted by federal workers, and the BPI dug around for subversive clues in the backgrounds of half a million new employees. Each routine inquiry costs the taxpayer $5; a complex job of sniffing about is much more expensive. (Excuse offered by Civil Service Commission Chairman John Macy: "The thoughtful applicant will recognize that the investigation process is a safeguard—to himself, for he can be confident that the work force he seeks to join is a select group. . .")

An unnatural interest is shown by the USCS in the sexual activities of its employees—not only via peepholes but through an unending flow of questionnaires. The experience of a job applicant at the National Security Agency, Fort George Meade, Md., was not unusual. Strapped to a polygraph—"lie detector"—he was asked: "When was the first time you had sexual relations with a woman? How many times have you had sexual intercourse? Have you ever engaged in homosexual activities? Have you ever engaged in sexual activities with an animal? When was the first time you had intercourse with your wife? Did you have intercourse with her before you were married? How many times?"

Employees are coerced to buy government bonds and to support charitable drives. Sometimes workers are ordered to give to charity a certain percentage of their salary; and those who balk at joining the bond drive may find their names posted on the bulletin board. Secretary of the Army David E. McGiffert has publicly admitted that "coercion and public humiliation" was used on civilian workers in at least one instance by a base commandant who warned that "anyone working under my supervision and does not wish to comply with my desire to participate in such a worth-while program is not a member of my 'team.'"

With the logic typical of the Pentagon, Assistant Defense Secretary Thomas D. Morris has asserted that coercion is impossible because page 17 of the Civil Service Commission chairman's 1961 "Manual on Fund-Raising Within Federal Service" clearly forbids it. He conceded that there might have been some "excessive zeal."

Postmaster Lawrence O'Brien, who has no time to work on improving a shoddy postal service because of all the other chores assigned him, strong-armed the last U.S. Savings Bond drive and told department secretaries that President Johnson would settle for nothing short of 100 per cent participation. The way to get it was demonstrated at the White House by Marvin Watson, special assistant to the President, who gave White House employees two chances to buy voluntarily—and then deducted the money from their pay checks.

Government workers are still required to state their race on questionnaires, the excuse being that the Civil Service Commission wants to keep track of its minority-race employment progress. Any supervisor who isn't blind should be able to tell, with only a few bad guesses, who of his workers are Negro, who are Latin American, who are Oriental, who are American Indian. But instead of going about it quietly through the supervisors, the USCS has forced the workers to put it down in writing. (Tempers flared at this one: 5,000 employees of the U.S. State Department solemnly recorded their American Indian ancestry.)

Intimate prying into workers' financial affairs is commonplace. A twenty-year employee at Kelly Air Force Base was fired for nonpayment of an $83 debt. An employee at a federal hospital in California was suspended for six months for falling briefly behind in his payments to the employees' credit union. A new series of questionnaires relating to stocks, bonds and other property, owned not only by employees but by their relatives, has recently circulated. Another form required workers to list all gifts received during the previous year. A woman in the Patent Office refused to fill it out because she couldn't remember all the little gifts, like perfume, she had received from friends. She got a letter from W. E. Ingram, personnel officer of the Commerce Department, saying: "Your evasiveness indicates that you may have some conflict of interest which you are anxious to avoid disclosing. This is a very serious matter." Another Commerce employee was threatened with disciplinary action for not listing bottle stoppers received from a welcome wagon.

Employees are discouraged from airing their gripes. And when they are punished or fired it is increasingly difficult for them to get a satisfactory hearing from the Civil Service Commission. Decisions that the commission should be able to render within thirty to sixty days are delayed from six months to a year; often the employee despairs of ever getting justice and turns elsewhere for work.

Lower-level review boards set up under Civil Service appeals procedure are generally described as "kangaroo courts" by workers who have had any dealings with them. They are usually made up of management-level employees who got to their relatively lofty perches by demonstrating utter loyalty to the Establishment's wishes. And when the Establishment wishes to fire or punish a worker. . . .

All in all, the nation's biggest employer, the federal government, subjects its 2,500,000 workers to conditions that are rampant with backbiting, rumor mongering, character assassination and promotion by favoritism. This may have been what Secretary of Labor W. Willard Wirtz had in mind when he told a trade union convention recently that "employment relationships in the government in this country are exactly thirty years behind employment relationships in private industry." He was including state and local government employees; had he been speaking only for federal employees he could have said seventy years behind private industry, for what exists today under the USCS is all too often—not always, but very often—like something cooked up by Carnegie and Frick.

As might be expected, morale among government workers is not high. A recent poll taken by The Federal Times, a government employee-oriented newspaper, found that 69 per cent would not go to work for the government if they had it to do again (72 per cent of the top-level employees) and 70 per cent would advise their children to steer clear of such employment.

Although government workers as a group are still very much the underdog, in recent years their troubles have attracted some able allies who are beginning to work occasional reforms. These are the American Civil Liberties Union and its chief Washington war hawk, Lawrence Speiser; two journalists, John Cramer of the Washington Daily News and Joseph Young of the Washington Star; and a couple of unions, especially John Griner's American Federation of Government Employees (200,000 members). And perhaps the most important ally at the moment is Sen. Sam J. Ervin of North Carolina, whose still plastic legislation to create a "Bill of Rights" for government workers has already won nearly half the Senate as co-sponsors. For months, drawing on information in the files of the ACLU and the unions, and on the excellent investigations conducted by his own staff, Ervin has been lifting Civil Service lids.

Most government workers do not publicly protest the intrusion of the FBI and the BPI into their political beliefs for the rather pathetic reason that most people who go into government work have already come to terms with their pride. Thus, a surprisingly small number of federal employees turn to the American Civil Liberties Union to fight the harassments and indignities they suffer. But those who do bring evidence of what must be happening on a rather large scale.

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare has a record for pestering its employees about their loyalty. A research chemist in the HEW's Food and Drug Administration was asked to explain his presence, eight years previously, at a couple of meetings held by the Labor Youth League and by the Student Socialist Society in Philadelphia. Was he a Communist? He filled three single-spaced typewritten pages answering all the loaded questions passed down to him by the Civil Service Commission; after which, though he was cleared, he packed up his Ph.D. and quit in a rage. It's the mood in which a lot of bright men and women leave Washington.

A young woman working as a program analyst in HEW's Water Pollution Control division was accused of being invited to attend (she wasn't accused of attending) a forum sponsored by the Socialist Workers Party of Philadelphia. She was also accused of being on the mailing list of the Socialist Party.

These heinous things had occurred four or five years before she went to work for the government. The specific questions asked of this employee—who was not, remember, in any way involved in work with classified information—were as follows:

(1) The extent of your knowledge of the Communist Party membership and activity of your father, your father's views concerning communism and the aims and purposes of the Communist Party to the best of your knowledge, and the extent to which your father has influenced you, or attempted to influence you, concerning communism and the aims and purposes of the Communist Party.

(2) The names of the associates of your father known or believed by you to be members of the Communist Party or sympathetic to communism and the aims and purposes of the Communist Party and the nature and extent of your association with these individuals.

Similar questions were asked about her aunt, her uncle and her sister. The price of holding her job was an expose of her whole family.

When employees come to him with this kind of case, Speiser has a rather easy time making USCS Commissioner Macy back down. Speiser indicates that the ACLU will insist on an open hearing at which the source of the rumors and the names of the accusers will be demanded, and that if necessary he will go to court to establish a ruling against such covert plying. Speiser wants to get into court with such a case, but Macy gives way every time, to block the making of a precedent.

In this way, Macy wins by losing: except in the handful of cases that Speiser has championed, the Civil Service bloodhounds go right on demanding, and getting, information that is none of their business.

Testifying before a Senate Subcommittee on Constitutional Rights, Speiser gave these examples of questions which had been asked of job applicants:

"Are all of your friends in favor of the democratic form of government?"

"Are you associated with people you can classify as leftists?"

"Why did you protest against racial discrimination in the Washington, D.C., area?"

"Do you have any friends you think might be to the right of Center?"

"Do you have any friends that are in the middle?"

"Where does your father fit in on this scale from right to left?"

"Is he a member of the Socialist Party?"

"Are his views further to the left than yours?"

"How about your mother?"

The long, patriotic arm of the USCS reaches even into the affairs of the United Nations. American citizens who work there must satisfy the Civil Service Commission of their loyalty by answering questions not only about their attitude toward the Communist Party but also about the opinions and activities of their parents, spouse, divorced spouse, children, brothers and sisters; countries visited since 1930, purpose of the visit, etc.

Sometimes the super-patriotism of the Civil Service Commission drives it into comically embarrassing corners. In October, 1966, the USCS accused a William X of having falsified his application for federal employment, and ruled that he would have to stand aside for ■ year before reapplying. According to the investigators, X had lied in saying that he had never been a member of the Communist Party. The USCS accused him of having belonged for three months in 1943 and of attending Communist social functions in Pennsylvania.

This was a bizarre accusation considering X's background. For seven years (from 1958 to 1965) he had been an investigator for the House Committee on Un-American Activities, working intimately with ex-FBI agents and FBI informants. If X now made a public stink over the way the USCS was treating him, it would be embarrassing—especially to HUAC.

So, although his answers to the charges were not the kind that normally get people off the "loyalty" hook (he admitted that he "might have" attended one social affair, and he stated definitely that he had played in the orchestra at a social given by Mother Bloor; but he "didn't recall" other activities attributed to him, and he pleaded that "to the best of my knowledge" he had never been a member of the Communist Party), a great shuddering sigh of relief could be heard throughout the upper regions of the USCS when the ACLU took X's case. The USCS, in line with policy, could now back down, and did so by ruling that, "in view of the length of time that has elapsed since the incident is alleged to have occurred," there was no reason to give him a hearing. He was cleared without a fight. This was the first time that the Civil Service Commission has ever accepted the antiquity of Communist activities as an excuse.

The Civil Service Commission has so keen an interest in the amours of its employees that it will, if necessary, act as matchmaker to deliver its wards from a sinful life. Consider, for example, the case of a young woman, a research associate in the Office of Economic Opportunity. She had been going with a well-known liberal journalist and in April of last year received a letter from H.C. Bolton, chief of the division of adjudication of the BPI, warning that she would be fired if she didn't come up with a very good explanation for having spent a weekend in a Virginia motel with her boy friend.

The ACLU jumped eagerly into that one, making some sarcastic remarks about the improbability of the USCS being "filled only with investigators who have never engaged in sexual intercourse outside of marital relationship," and promising a court fight. Fortunately for Macy, the couple had meanwhile married; he therefore decreed, in a great show of charity, that since the employee was no longer sinning, he was able in good conscience to forget the motel.

Although the BPI detectives can be ruthlessly puritanical in judging the conduct of the fiancée of a journalist who is writing critically about the present Administration, they can also be wonderfully tolerant of the same kind of conduct in others. For example, a former Presbyterian minister joined the U.S. Office of Education not long after he was named in a well-publicized divorce trial as the marriage counselor whose instruction of the wife had been more intimate than professional. He subsequently left the ministry, but went into government work with no trouble from the BPI.

In a letter to the Mattachine Society of Washington, Macy wrote: "We reject categorically the assertion that the commission pries into the private sex lives of those seeking federal employment. . . . We know of no means consistent with American notions of privacy and fairness and limitations on governmental authority which could ascertain the nature of individual private sexual behavior between consenting adults as long as it remains private: that is, if it remains undisclosed to all but the participants, it is not the subject of an inquiry."

This is not even good sophistry. What Macy means—as proved by the conduct of his investigators—is that when questions of the most intimate kind are put to the subject's neighbors, friends and fellow workers without uncovering even one smutty rumor, then the undisclosed sex life "is not the subject of inquiry."

Evidence that Macy is not easing up on homosexuals may be found in an important case now bouncing around in the courts. A man who had worked in various administrative positions in the Department of Labor for seventeen years, including time out for eighteen months in military service during World War II, left for private employment in 1956, but in 1962 decided to return to government. He is well qualified, passed a competitive examination and was notified that he was eligible for "personnel positions" at top grades (GS 9, 11 and 12).

Then he ran into trouble. Appearing before a civil service investigator in April, 1962, he was ordered to explain a 1947 arrest for "loitering" around the men's room in Lafayette Square. He had been run in by the police after entering the men's room twice within ten minutes. He was also ordered to explain a 1951 arrest "for investigation." And, finally, he was ordered to give a rebuttal to "information indicating that you are a homosexual."

The applicant refused to comment, on the ground that his sex life had nothing to do with his performance on the job. So he was disqualified for employment.

At that point, showing considerable courage, he began to lay the basis for his present court fight, in which he is being aided by the ACLU. He asked that the Civil Service Commission supply him with "specifications of how, when and where he had allegedly conducted himself immorally," so that he could answer the "broad, indefinite allegation of 'immoral conduct.'" The commission refused. Its Board of Appeals and Review replied only that "the record disclosed convincing evidence that you have engaged in homosexual conduct, which is considered contrary to generally recognized and accepted standards of morality."

What record? What evidence? What conduct? In the 1920s, Justice Holmes ruled that no one has a constitutional right to a particular government job. But thinking has begun to change. Many jurists now hold that one does have a constitutional right to it, if one proves his qualification for the opening and the bureaucrats cannot offer good, specific reasons for refusal. Just because one is a Negro, or just because one is a Jew is no longer considered a good reason for accepting refusal. Should an otherwise qualified homosexual accept rejection on the ground of homosexuality alone? This man said no; he and the ACLU went to court.

At the district court level they ran into the usual Comstockery, but in May, 1965, the U.S. Court of Appeals ruled that employment had been unfairly refused. In what may turn out to be a landmark declaration, Chief Judge David L. Bazelon ruled that the Civil Service Commission was wrong in not specifying the misconduct and in not permitting the applicant to defend himself against the accusations. Said Bazelon: "An applicant has a right to be free from governmental defamation . . . the government is required to justify imposing the stigma of disqualification for immoral conduct. With this stigma the commission also jeopardized his ability to find employment elsewhere." (Certainly true. While he awaited the outcome of the trial he got a job with the county of Fairfax, Va., but the Civil Service Commission released its secret files to county officials and he was fired.)

Bazelon ordered the government to give the complainant a hearing at which he could confront his accusers and attack each item of defamation. So far the government has refused, and the case is still working itself out in the courts. But there seems to be a good chance that this man will eventually win, and if he does, it will set a historic precedent—and not just for milder treatment for homosexuals. The principal point in this case is that it may establish a procedure of hearings whereby all job applicants can force the government to lay open their files and show exactly who has charged what. And if this is accomplished for new job applicants, it will of course easily be conveyed to probationary workers, who now have next to no rights and who frequently are kicked out of government work carrying a smear that they know nothing about except that thereafter they have trouble getting work in private industry.

(To be continued next week)

A RAGE FOR AWARENESS

DONOVAN BESS

Mr. Bess is on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle.

San Francisco

For a century, California has been good soil for spiritual, emotional, political and moral experiments. The state has been settled mainly by émigrés from the East, who hope to arrest the effects of illness and brake the aging process, or by younger men and women whose personalities were cramped by the American way of life. These persons came West unconsciously expecting some kind of salvation, or at the least a life more productive of thrills.

But since World War II, the pilgrims have encountered an environment souped up by the greatest military-fed electronic complex in the world. The aura of materialism is as great here as it is in Texas. During the postwar years, thus, social and personal crises have escalated, often to revolutionary intensity, and especially among younger persons. Until the 1950s, California's proliferation of psychiatric services was the main recourse of the disenchanted or the mentally ill. But "one-to-one" psychotherapy, which casts the analyst as a demigod, is now considered inappropriate—and antisocially expensive. True to the California taste for gaudy experiment, the discontented are moving toward democratic get-togethers in which healing or growth or faith, or all of these together, are produced in a new setting: groups in which every man is a potential demigod.

Forty years ago, California extremism was scorned by the serious-minded. They smiled at such grandiose productions as Upton Sinclair's campaign for governor, or Aimee Semple McPherson's religious circus. Today, the state's extremism has engaged thousands of highly educated men and women. On the one hand, there is Ronald Reaganism, and on the other a continuing revolt, led by the University of California's Berkeley campus, against a freezing of the educational alternatives. Even more radical is what Robert Scheer, managing editor of Ramparts, scoffingly calls "the psychedelic Left." But the largest volume of experimentation has been in adult get-togethers, convened in the name of "more awareness" or "greater consciousness." Most such groups are led by professionals, usually psychologists; but some do very well under lay leadership. A few groups have no leaders and are equipped only with "kits."

The usual group goal is to become more aware of other persons and of the environment and its cultural layers. The typical participants are lawyers and teachers and college-educated housewives; few blue-collar workers or members of minority groups indulge. The pay-off in awareness comes through bluntly honest verbal exchanges, meditation (often holding hands in circles), various body-contact experiments, old-fashioned intellectual inquiry, and even extrasensory adventures, when groups of six or less ingest a psychedelic agent like morning glory seeds, or an ego-reducing herb like marijuana. Mothers and fathers, in parent-development sessions, confess that they don't reach their children and "role play" their way to solving family problems. Executives, backed by corporation funds, mingle with subordinates, and through painful verbal wrestling reach a common human base.

The awareness capital of California is at Big Sur Hot Springs, on a bluff above the Pacific Ocean, about halfway between Los Angeles and San Francisco. A rambling building there houses The Esalen Institute, amid the heroic scenery described by Robinson Jeffers, who lived about 40 miles to the north. The institute exposes curious or desperate men and women to experiences euphemistically labeled "weekend seminars." Its youthful president, Michael Murphy, speaks for what he calls the "psychic astronauts" of California:

Two thousand of them have come through here in the past four years. They seek some sort of enrichment and release from old patterns. Some of them are very healthy people who just feel they're not fully awake.

These people are the raw and leading edge of what's going to amount to a cultural shift in our leading aspirations and values. . . . These attempts at self-renewal are growing in popularity because psychology has neglected those domains, because religion failed to provide the rich context for personal growth, because modern life has become so regulated and harried.

Just as past cultures have made room for yogis, Zen adepts, contemplatives such as St. John of the Cross, so our society could create programs to develop modern psychic adepts—persons highly developed in realms of feeling, sensing and intuitive knowing.

California's awareness movement does not include the activities of the Sexual Freedom League which, while producing much gregarious nudity, insists less on greater consciousness than on freedom from prudery. And the movement does not countenance mass "turn-ons" with LSD. (One such occasion took place last spring at a garden party south of San Francisco, when a third of 300 guests disrobed and arranged themselves in a number of "love heaps." The occasion probably produced little awareness, as defined by Murphy.) However, the day may come when LSD will be a standard catalyst for awareness groups. An underground psychological encounter group in Southern California holds meetings at which everybody takes a dose of at least 100 micrograms of this hallucinogenic drug. They report some extraordinary therapeutic breakthroughs, because the chemical suspends the usual "ego games." (Marijuana has also been tried en masse by young California intellectuals; but the result seems to run mainly to frivolous escape.)

More and more the California experimenters are respecting, or welcoming, religious experience as a valid route to awareness. Men who ten years ago would have blushed to confess a belief in God, today boast of it. Even journalists admit "soft spots." George B. Leonard, a senior editor of Look magazine and its West Coast manager, told an audience: "What the mystics promised is upon us now, not out on some apocalyptic plain, but in the laboratory, the church, the classroom, the home. . . .

We believe that most people can best find God and themselves through heightened awareness of the world, increased commitment to the eternal in time." Leonard was not speaking of California's traditional religious fringe groups which have flourished for a century, mainly in and about Los Angeles. That area still supports such organizations as the Institute of Cosmic Wisdom, the Self Realization Fellowship and Sufism Reoriented; but their appeal is chiefly to older persons.

A quite opposite approach to awareness was introduced into California last year by Rey Anthony (Maxine Sanini), author of The Housewife's Selective Guide to Promiscuity. She conducts "beginning and advanced sensuality workshops," and has a following of men and women who suffer from sexual confusion. They pair off and play such games as "tell me which part of your body you would like me to touch." Maxine says this makes them more aware of "pan-sensuality," which she defines as response of the was unable to remember the names of several friends with whom he dined.

Gunther ran an even less orthodox weekend in September at a woodsy center in the Santa Cruz Mountains, under the auspices of "Eden West Seminars." The subject was "Keeping in Touch with Massage." At another Eden West awareness weekend, participants were kept in one room for fifty hours (they were permitted trips to the bathroom) and were required to participate in the nude.

Michael Murphy has become an impresario of "the human potential" at his Big Sur institute. Weekend seminars have featured Episcopal Bishop James A. Pike and S. I. Hayakawa; Prof. B. F. Skinner of Harvard; the late Paul Tillich; Dr. Jack Downing, organizer of a county mental health program at San Mateo; Albert Ellis, the sexuality expert—as well as "fringe" explorers.

Perhaps the most dramatic person on the Big Sur aware-entire body to any other body, regardless of sex, age or race. She likes to prepare people for such encounters by enrolling them first in "communications workshops," where the action is only verbal.

Body awareness groups are legion in the state. The most famous teacher of this approach is Bernard Gunther, a soft-spoken young man whose eyes seem to emit electricity. Late in September, during a "trips festival" on the San Francisco State College campus, he lured several hundred young people into building up one large mass of swaying bodies. He begins his classes by urging his pupils to "leave the reality of the verbal . . . and become the infinite thing you really are." During a recent session at Big Sur, his class included a physicist, a psychiatrist, an internist, a social worker, a church education director and a mathematics teacher. Gunther arranged his pupils in pairs and conducted them through a variety of mutual patting, thumping and stroking exercises. Finally he put out the lights, set a lit candle on the floor, and assembled all in a circle, hip to hip. The pupils swayed in the dim light to almost hypnotic incantations by Gunther. When it was over a young housewife told how radiant she felt and added: "We're all so head-oriented in our culture." A middle-aged teacher confided that the workout had bewildered his ego so severely that later in the evening he ness scene is Dr. Frederick Perls, a 74-year-old renegade from Freudian psychoanalysis, who now lives there. He bluntly tells seminarians that individual psychotherapy is a waste of effort—at least when competent group work is available. Perls assembles his men and women in groups of from sixteen to forty and "works with" volunteers called forward one at a time. He sets up a contest with the person's defensive attitudes, whether manifested by body movements or words. An actor of some prowess, Perls can be as patient as a spider, as gentle as a young mother, as sudden as a rattlesnake. Those who don't "work" gain self-knowledge by intense watching and listening. During the past two years, dozens of tearful women have flung their arms around Perls, in appreciation of his genius. (He loves to kiss the young ones; and I have heard two of them say: "Fritz kisses better than any man I ever met.")

The Esalen seminar topics in recent months reflected California's awareness spectrum. The list includes:

"Bodily Release through Sports," led by a Stanford track coach and a psychologist; "Ramakrishna, Ramana and Krishnamurti," led by Alan Watts; "Non-Verbal Experience and Communication," led by staff members from the New School for Social Research of New York; "Status

(Continued on page 254)

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Week of the Angry Artist . . .

CURTIS HARNACK

"We're angry! We're angry!" shouted poet Dick Lurie from a truck platform to the gathering street-corner crowd at the intersection of the Grand Concourse and Fordham Road. "We are poets and actors protesting the war in Vietnam!" Behind him the Pageant Players in motley costumes began cavorting to the jingle of a tambourine.

"We're here to make you happy!" chanted the Domino, as the players skipped around in front of the satiric backdrop of Johnson in Uncle Sam stripes. "Let's see those Colgate smiles! This is America, making the world happy. We drop presents from the sky . . . napalm bombs."

From the Bronx housewives: "You scum of the earth, you!"

"You yellow bastards, why aren't you in uniform?"

"What have you bums ever done—why don't you have a job?"

"We are here," said Lurie serenely into the microphone, "as part of the Angry Arts festival. All over New York City this week there are concerts, performances, exhibits and demonstrations in protest of our government's policy in Vietnam."

The crowd was increasingly vociferous, with shouts of "Treason!" and "Communists!" but the police held them at bay and Paul Blackburn mounted the truck to read from a thick sheaf, his voice lost in the general hubbub of the housewives. Dauntlessly, the poetry reading went on. Tony Weinberger began his verse: "I was born in America thirty years ago . . ." which ended with, "America, we will never again be believed by our children."

"My husband was in two wars—and he lived through it," came a loud voice. "It's just something that's got to be faced up to—you cowards!"

Poetry shouted from street corners, the muse in service to politics—did it make for good art, or effective politics? Or was that even the question? The poets' caravan which toured the city was largely manned by skinny-legged, bearded, East Village types, certain by their very appearance to antagonize most of the middle-class audience they sought to reach. "The way they dress—those beatniks, you know they're idiots," said

The articles below, by Curtis Harnack and Max Kozloff, discuss some of the events held in New York from January 29 to February 5, under the general title of "The Angry Arts," in which writers, painters, poets, dancers, musicians, actors and film makers took part in a weeklong protest against American policy in Vietnam. Mr. Harnack teaches at Sarah Lawrence College and is the author of Persian Lions, Persian Lambs (Holt, Rinehart & Winston). Mr. Kozloff is The Nation's art critic. Denise Levertov, author of "Advent 1966," was formerly The Nation's poetry editor.

one young Bronx matron with a child in a stroller. "They look like they're doped-up."

The poets were out to succeed politically; hadn't they thought of the defiance implicit in their garb? The relation between poetry and anger over the war was not very clear to the people who heard the performers of the caravan. The problem for the promoters of Angry Arts' week was to make the arts and anger a single, necessary combination.

At midweek in the Eisner auditorium of New York University the issue was joined. Robert Bly was in charge of what was advertised as a Napalm Poetry Reading. Beginning with some fine translations of current Vietnamese verse by Robin Morgan, there were readings by Muriel Rukeyser, who evoked village life in the Mekong with her "Delta Poems" (" . . . a girl and a young man walk near the water"); Denise Levertov (" . . . burned human flesh is burning in Vietnam as I write"); Robert Creely reading Robert Duncan's "Up Rising" [published in The Nation, September 13, 1965]; John Logan reading a poem of Isabella Gardner; Joel Oppenheimer with his poem for the occasion, "Tomorrow is Ground Hog Day," a line of which read: "I ask you to think just once, what you have done." Interspersed with these performances, colored slides of napalm-maimed Vietnamese children were flung upon a screen—photos taken by William Pepper. In the darkened auditorium Bly gave a chalk talk on the facts of weaponry, quoting from government sources, ordinance journals and the news magazines.

By the time Mitchell Goodman rose to the platform to say, "I confess I don't know why we're here—unless it is just to torment ourselves," it was a feeling many of us shared. The 700 or 800 people who jammed the auditorium needed no convincing about the horrors of the war. Quoting Shelley's "Poets are the unacknowledged legislators of the world," Goodman asked: "Where were we three years ago—before any of this we've seen here tonight had happened?" His just composed poem, "Too Late," was an agonized self-indictment and led to the second phase of the meeting, the call for action. Everyone was aware how dangerous it could be to pour out emotion too easily by cathartic participation through events such as the Napalm Poetry Reading. An appeal was made to aid the Committee of Responsibility, which is seeking to treat the wounded Vietnamese children by transporting them to this country or Switzerland.

As the social-political aims became uppermost, did aesthetic standards wane? Critics of such affairs as the Napalm Poetry Reading suspect that sincerity and right thinking tend to supplant normal standards for good art—that in fact the poetic emotion and the political emotion are incompatible in the same breast. Such complaints are reminiscent of the 1930s or any other time when the artist has been asked to justify his talent and the privilege of being an artist by committing himself to the proper cause in the political arena. But what was new about today's situation was that the most active poets conscious of Vietnam were not misty-eyed idealists rising on the semblance of a literary talent to give voice; they included an extraordinarily large number of the leading writers in the country. Furthermore, they were thoroughly aware of the old arts-and-politics arguments. What surmounted all the wrangle was the need, as Mitchell Goodman put it, "to declare ourselves human."

And here, the poets felt, was their province, for who could better calibrate the chilling desensitization of Americans by just examining the current language of the war? Thus Charlie is the convenient code name muffling the necessity to feel the enemy as a man. Lazy-dog, scrutinized closely, is not just the ghoulishly ironic name of a shrapnel bomb but is charged with a linguistic valence of the sort poets traditionally seek, in their life-celebrating verse. The United States is like Germany in the early thirties, said Bly: "A golden ship drifting toward an iceberg—the iciness of desensitization." He quoted an Army report on why the new type of napalm was preferred to the old because it was found to be more effective, "particularly with regard to adhesion." Attuned as the audience was to the resonance of language in the poetry readings, this ham-handed but chilling phrase proved horrifying—and also proved the point as to why poets were necessary at this time. It was their responsibility to fight and expose the desensitization of language, a symptom of the thickened sensibilities of the American people.

Bly read aloud a letter from a State Department official explaining why the U.S. Government could not participate in the transport of wounded Vietnamese children to hospitals in Europe or America in the Terre des Hommes project. The language used was the glib jargon of the social scientists—the "cultural shock" involved in removing the children to "an alien environment so far away from their homes and families . . . everything that modern psychology tells us advises us against such procedures. . . ." In effect one was hearing a kind of poetry in reverse. We heard these over-familiar stock phrases afresh precisely because in this application they were so monstrous. We heard parts of speeches studded with statistics or the folksy patter of Johnson in a context that chilled the heart. Now the poets were not saying listen to me; they were saying listen to them.

On the following evening in the basement of the Washington Square Methodist Church a symposium was held on "The War, The Artist, His Work." Moderator Paul Goodman began the discussion by saying: "This meeting is a ritual affair. I don't know what other meaning it really has, except to register simple disgust. What will it do to end the war? The answer is nothing." But there was a "poison in the air" which needed to be named—what could be done about it was another matter. He proceeded to suggest various schemes that might really work toward ending the war, such as simultaneous draft-card burnings on campuses across the nation, 10,000 strong. But his comments ground down to a helpless admission that to organize such an underground movement, loaded with illegality, was simply not feasible—or at least he didn't know how such a thing could be done.

Harold Rosenberg put it bluntly: "What can art do in politics? Nothing except say, 'I'm against this war.' But to expect that you can produce a result is a dumb idea." Nevertheless, "you can't go about your business these days, especially if you're an artist. That is a disaster. Nobody can go about any creative work without having this thing over their shoulders." The fact was, "art cannot be itself without criticizing the world"; and he pointed out that we weren't having an Interior Decorators' Angry Week in protest—it is the special province of art to be concerned about such matters.

All this partially cleared the way for Robert Bly to denounce the climate of American literature during the past couple of decades, when writers under the unhealthy influence of the New Criticism subscribed to the strange doctrine that there could be a divorce of the world itself from the world of a poem. "We have therefore only the personal poet entangled in his own psyche." It would be hard to overestimate the significance of this, Bly maintained. Last year in his organization of anti-Vietnamese War poetry readings at universities throughout the country [see "Poetry of the Read-Ins," The Nation, May 30, 1966], he found many university officials who would have no part in these ventures, saying that poetry must be kept pure of politics (he mentioned the University of Washington, which had ironically hired and kept Theodore Roethke on its staff). Such a stupid notion, he insisted, could only be widespread because of the heritage of the New Critics—John Crowe Ransom and the whole lot. Even a fine poet like John Berryman, he said, had refused on similar grounds to participate in an anti-war reading at the University of Minnesota. For the writers of this country, therefore, a poet like Pablo Neruda was a revelation, "for some of his most powerful poems have political content." Too many of those poets who were

ADVENT 1966

Because in Viet Nam the vision of a Burning Babe is multiplied, multiplied,

*the flesh on fire
not Christ's, as Southwell saw it, prefiguring the Passion upon the Eve of Christmas,*

*but wholly human and repeated, repeated, infant after infant, their names forgotten,
their sex unknown in the ashes,
set alight, flaming but not vanishing,
not vanishing as his vision but lingering,*

cinders upon the earth or living on moaning and stinking in hospitals three abed,

because of this my strong sight, my clear caressive sight, my poet's sight I was given that it might stir me to song, is blurred.

There is a cataract filming-over my inner eyes. Or else a monstrous insect has entered my head, and looks out from my sockets with multiple vision,

seeing not the unique Holy Infant burning sublimely, an imagination of redemption, furnace in which souls are wrought into new life, but, as off a belt-line, more, more senseless figures aflame.

*And this insect (who is not there — it is my own eyes do my seeing, the insect is not there, what I see is there) will not permit me to look elsewhere, or if I look, to see except dulled and unfocussed
the delicate, firm, whole flesh of the still unburned.*

DENISE LEVERTOV

descended from the Ransom school of thinking, such as Howard Nemerov and W. D. Snodgrass, continued to explore their private worlds. Robert Lowell was the only one of that group of poets to take a strong public stand, he said, though his work itself seemed strangely devoid of antiwar content.

"How can poetry touch upon things like napalm bombing?" asked Bly. "The political poetry of the 1930s doesn't give much help in this direction because too much of it expresses opinion, merely. Because of the tradition of the personal poems in this country, these poems are only part of the poet's change of personality and have no further meaning." The poets today must "write out of their own ego and into a larger ego. . . . The political poet must be like a grasshopper and leap into the psyche of the nation."

This attack upon the New Criticism and its inability to deal with the facts of the contemporary world was met with glee by Maxwell Geismar. "I've been sitting out the cold war, the silent generation. To have the thing turn full circle . . . as I'm hearing tonight—this is very exciting. I'm hearing a poet make fun of the poets I grew up with."

Geismar spoke of his failure ever to get James Jones or William Styron to sign a political statement or testimony; he took their behavior, so uncharacteristic of them personally and so out of keeping with the nature of their artistic thrusts, to be the dead hand of the "silent generation" and the doctrine of the New Criticism, which arbitrarily set up a division between the artist and his time. "This meeting tonight is important—it's not a ritual. It marks the celebration of the arts of life!"

Geismar, who is well known as an anti-Jamesian, cited him as a typical, even central figure of the cold-war culture. Henry James, "with his inner fantasies, his personal world, a world that never did exist except in the peculiar mind of the artist himself," was the culpable spirit behind the American writer's failure to deal with reality in the forties and fifties.

In the audience, Marguerite Young, whose grumbings over Bly's slander of John Crowe Ransom were audible, now called in a firm voice: "Let's talk about the Vietnam war, not Henry James!"

Geismar was willing to chuck the subject of James, but he thought the Hiss case must be mentioned as a key factor of the last twenty years. Bly tried to get the topic back to the artist and the war, but Rosenberg began pulling in another direction: "I want to talk about the demoralization of the American Left—to be historical! . . . we must go back to the Communist movement of the thirties and the Stalin take-over." The groaning objections from the audience rose to drown him out. The meeting became increasingly chaotic. Coming round front, standing almost at the speakers' table, a young Negro began making a speech.

"State your proposition—what is your point?" shouted moderator Goodman, but the audience would have none of it.

"Let him talk," someone called, "he's got more to say than you do." But the gist of the address was chiefly that not enough of the audience was Negro. "You talk of writing having to do with reality," he said to Goodman, "and Mr. Geismar mentioned Dreiser as the only writer in this century who dealt with reality; now what I want to know is: What makes you think your reality is my reality?"

There was continued heckling on the artist's responsibility. "When does the artist become a political animal—and stop hiding behind his art?" But before any discussion on that could be gone into, another rose to suggest a massive boycott of museums and galleries, with blank spaces in the newspaper columns where normally advertisements would be carried. "Get scientists not artists to protest," said another, "then the country would listen." A poet from the caravan told of a riot at 137th Street and Broadway that afternoon, when their truck was stormed by a mob of Cuban exiles. Some of the poets had been beaten up. "Now if a few really big-name poets, instead of small-fry like us—if Bly had been with us and got his ass kicked, then something could be made of it. It's names that get into the papers."

Another, identifying himself as of the New Left, chided the old Left for passing the buck. He was busy organizing a group to go to Hanoi and rebuild bridges. "Don't pass the buck—to the artist, as this audience is doing tonight. You do what you think is right."

Now a poet who had been on the caravan street travels said angrily: "You guys sit there talking about art. But what are you really doing except sitting here talking?"

"Don't be so pretentious about what you've done in the street," said Leon Golub, one of the panelists. "Some of the rest of us have—"

"All I can say," cried a woman in the middle of the audience, rising to her feet, "all I can say is, it's a good thing

"Unquestionably one of the most important books published in the United States this year"

—MICHAEL HARRINGTON, front page, N.Y. Times Book Review

"An immensely rich spoken record . . . A saga that will test the reader's powers of moral discrimination as nothing else has in a very long time."

—SAUL MALOFF, Newsweek

"Often reads like a novel, so vivid is its characterization and diction . . . by far the most searching examination of Puerto Rican life ever published." —JOHN BARKHAM, Saturday Review Syndicate

A Puerto Rican Family in the Culture of Poverty—
San Juan and New York

LA VIDA OSCAR LEWIS
the author of The Children of Sánchez

By OSCAR LEWIS
Author of
The Children of Sánchez
$10.00, now
at your bookstore

RANDOM HOUSE

the government is running the country!"

There was immediate silence.

"I've never attended such a disgraceful and disorganized meeting!"

In the hush someone said: "This is what anger looks like!" And everyone laughed.

As the meeting finally dispersed in its own chaotic fashion, a pretty girl at the door accepted contributions—passing the "hat," which appropriately enough was a toy U.S. Army helmet. There was a curious excitement and exhilaration in the air, despite the bickering and confusion of the discussion—which was what the minister of the church, our host, was trying to respond to when he stood on a chair and called to the people going home: "That such a thing could happen here—what happened tonight, makes me very grateful to you for having come. Let's meet again!"

He had been cheered by the evening's expression of a moral outrage and a willingness to do something about it. I knew that the assembly had actually been a prime illustration of why many poets and writers held back from joining the raggle-taggle ranks of political action and protest. Never had the woe-ful imperfection of man's abilities to reason aloud in committee been more amply demonstrated. By contrast, I thought of the usual condition of the artist: sole master of his discourse, cleanly emitting his poem to the best of his own ability. Exposure to a group process such as we had seen tonight could seem only a pitiful, even painful corollary to what he was used to doing better alone, and to his sole purpose.

But tonight, also, our panelists—with their hang-ups on the New Criticism, Henry James and the old Left—had by very reason of their all too human bias and limitations, shown us something else. At some point the artist might perceive that the maddening imperfections of the political arena were preferable—even desirable—compared to a silence or aloofness which could no longer be justified. The apolitical writer had always felt it to be his right to ignore the appeals of the social-action promoters. It might still be his right, but for a writer to ignore the Vietnamese situation could no longer be a mere oversight, or an expression of disinterest in "the subject." It became, rather, a judgment of him.

... A Collage of Indignation

MAX KOZLOFF

To write of art and politics in the United States in 1967 is surely to court futility in a context of provocation. And yet, to ignore the subject in print (however much it may prey privately on the mind) is to repress an urgency that makes the misgivings of an art critic almost weasel-like. It is the predicament of trying to resolve divergent obligations—intellectual and moral—which public life in this country is always prying further apart, with stupefying results. There is nothing like a national crisis—and the war in Vietnam is a crisis raised to the pitch of horror—to make aesthetic pursuits look pitifully insignificant. But there is also nothing like such a crisis to cause some of us to rethink the nature of our role as men involved or concerned with creativity.

We are in a time when the public that is aware of art assimilates all avant-garde hypotheses into an apparatus of mild titillation. It is the obverse of our insensitivity to the war images, the photos of burnt Vietnamese children, which daily flood it. How can a people that does not choke with revulsion and guilt at this visual evidence of its government's actions be in the least responsive to art's involuted censure? And how can artists who have all this time been hyper-defensive about their autonomy as creators, strive consciously to reach this population, and still view themselves as artists? What is more, the enormity of American war crimes abroad is accompanied by a permissiveness toward freedom of artistic speech at home which neutralizes the artist's tension and confuses his protest. Ends and means are turned inside out in this atmosphere, stigmatized by agitation and anesthesia. It is frightful to consider how insistently the present circumstances make a mockery of so much of current art's Dadaist presumption to operate within the "gap" between art and life. That gap never appeared wider.

By that very evidence, however, there would seem to be—in fact, there must be—more room in which to operate, rather than less. To the argument that the processes of visual art are metaphorical and ritually self-contained, whereas individual or collective "action" must be pragmatic and literal, I reply that we are probably guilty of a failure of imagination. In our situation, both metaphor and action are vital to existence. There is a level on which actions cannot focus or connect without the inner, intangible guidance of a vision. There is also a level on which the dream of a visual order will fade without the capacity to inflect human behavior, in whatever fashion, direct or indirect. The failure of imagination on the part of the public is its blindness to the truths behind socio-political protests or documentary images (let alone art). The comparable fault of the artists is their piety about art's boundaries. One perspective is phenomenally coarse; the other is excessively delicate.

What makes this condition so paradoxical is that both sides back away from limitless anxiety, as if from a menace that can be so little controlled that it must be ignored. But in the words of Karl Jaspers: "Large numbers, particularly of modern people, seem to live fearlessly because they lack imagination. There is, as it were, an impoverishment of the heart. The freedom from anxiety is but the other side of a deeper loss of freedom. Arousal of anxiety and with it a more vital humanity might be just the task for someone possessed by Eros paidagogos (informing passion)." In this

"A tremendous book, a psychological thriller.
...The definitive work on the ever-fascinating riddle of the Hiss-Chambers case."

—FRED J. COOK

FRIENDSHIP & FRATRICIDE

AN ANALYSIS OF WHITTAKER CHAMBERS AND ALGER HISS

by Meyer A. Zeligs, M.D.

"A profound contribution... Meyer Zeligs has supplied all the missing material to help our public put to rest the Chambers-Hiss controversy."

—MORRIS ERNST

Illustrated $8.95

THE VIKING PRESS, N.Y. 10022

light, insulation from disturbance, and a refusal to work to minimize one's own complicity in it, may become signs of an anxious rigidity. Yet, if there is one activity that is possessed of "informing passion" (Jaspers was thinking of psychotherapy), it is surely art. Notwithstanding the personal imperatives of extremely disparate styles (one of the strengths of current American art), the pictorial and sculptural work we see is charged with a proper disquietude. Or rather, a latency that can be read as such. Never in the last hundred years, has a serious, avant-garde art been so caught up with the confounding issues and pressures of its society—which is not to say at all that ours is a "protest" art. The crucial factor is precisely art's human latency, and how it can be grasped to produce a catharsis of "pity and fear" that does not dissipate after the experience but resonates as an image in the memory. Not purgation or exorcism of the demon—be it as specific as racial injustice, violence in the streets or the pitilessness of technology—but an aesthetic capable of holding its qualities in suspense, is the healing-wounding power of the work of art. But for others to feel that power their attention must be concentrated and attuned to the psychological ambiguities which forms may arouse within themselves. Just as art proposes simultaneously to be a manipulative and an optional experience, so must the spectator be credulous, and yet also detached. To complicate this state of affairs even more, ours is an age reverberating, as none earlier, with the presence of the visual image, a fact which has also brought about an unprecedented, and often justified, numbness before that very image.

Such are roughly the prevailing conditions under which we have seen the conclusion of a remarkable week of manifestations against the war, entitled overall, "The Angry Arts" (although surely, as many have pointed out, it would be more accurate to say, "angry artists"). The distinction between an actual antiwar iconography, and works that only "stood for" the individual's personal attitude, was sometimes waived or muddled, but the public sympathy for the programs (which were often mobbed) was unequivocal. One would be hard put to find in the history of the American arts anything to match this multi-organized demonstration of solidarity whose theme was one of outrage in the face of a national contempt for the life of other men. Of the dance, theatre, poetry and film, I withhold comment, particularly through lack of competence, but also because in their narrative structures and discursive potentialities they are amenable to political content. But painting and sculpture, mute and immobile, provide special problems. The section of the event to which more than a hundred artists in these media contributed was a linked sequence of twenty 10x6-foot many-imaged canvases, shown in the Loeb Student Center of New York University, and labeled, collectively, "Collage of Indignation."

Not since the WPA thirties has there been any tradition of political activism in American art. And for an immensely longer period it has been against their grain for visual artists to dispel their own sense of privacy and isolation, to work, yoked together in more or less the same space, for an immediate, short-term assault against a public attitude. Leaving aside the motley illustrations of the Neo-Impressionists in the anarchist press of their time, one thinks of the manifestations of the Surrealists as the only fierce outcry prior to the depression of a committed group of artists against the status quo—in work, significantly enough, that was restricted to the nonpictorial. (Yet, as Harold Rosenberg writes, "Breton and his group, while continuing its radical attack on the existing order, stubbornly rejected any substitute for the surrealist project of total liberation of individual desire and imagination. He sensed that to renounce feeling in favor of social action, meant not only to surrender a chief source of revolutionary vitality, but to lose the human standpoint from which to criticize revolutionary catchwords.") In the next decade, there were "Guernica" and the Mexican muralists, high-water points of art's rage against officially sanctioned brutality. For the rest, there are the vituperations of Grosz, the proletarian compassions of Kollwitz, the acerbic illustrations of Ben Shahn. And underneath them all, the propaganda posters of all nations, often enough academic in style, but frequently, as in Germany, expressionist in outlook. It is here, in the frenzy of Expressionism, that the Loeb Center artists, perhaps involuntarily and certainly discordantly, have tried to enfranchise their protest.

I say discordantly because this aesthetic wailing wall, this convocation of clichés and cretinisms, which was the "Collage of Indignation," was alienated and homeless in style, as it was embattled in content. Festooned with imprecations against Johnson as a murderer, and with phalluses colored in as American flags, it contained other visual combines even more impolite. Frequently one saw a viciousness that was determined to match what ■ was ostensibly exposing. As for the physical embodiment of this cataclysmic message, it might charitably be described as a nasty, degraded Expressionism, long ago discredited as an atavism in the history of American art.

The problem was not just that artists who had stripped themselves of everything but sincerity were still clothed in borrowed rags. Or that their response to a current situation was rendered in a vocabulary of the past. And still less is it that there were no kernels of truth in what they implied. The problem, rather, was in a failure of a quality of mind, or artistic imagination, which had not solved the rhetorical goal to which the common effort had been legitimately directed. Striving to elicit disgust against a vast outer evil, the artists only riveted distaste upon their own work. In its tawdriness and slovenliness, this art became the self-sacrificing target which opened itself to arrows of denial that it had wanted to channel into the American reality. Instead of illustrating, or alluding to the destructiveness of our country's military-industrial complex, it had obtusely and painfully acted it out. These "indignant artists" have become the casualties of ■ malaise—the embittering of the individual by the moral

▲ Bobbs-Merrill

The Essays of A. J. MUSTE

edited by Nat Hentoff

"In my mind A. J. Muste is the most astute political analyst in America, and an Authentic Great Man."

—PAUL GOODMAN

"Historians of the future who want to know what it meant to live with integrity in the twentieth-century era of wars and revolutions, will very likely begin with the life of A. J. Muste."

—STAUGHTON LYND,
Yale University

"A. J. Muste stands out in our time, and I believe he will stand out in history, as a great leader of ■ pacifism which is anything but passive."

—NORMAN THOMAS

"A. J. Muste has spent the better part of his life in search of a rare goal: personal fulfillment through public commitment.... This volume of essays is thus essential therapy for us all."

—IRVING LOUIS HOROWITZ,
Washington University

$10.00 at all bookstores

▲ Bobbs-Merrill

FREE with every new subscription to THE NATION

[The Politics of Escalation in Vietnam] is probably the best single investment anyone can make in the literature on Vietnam. It is a work I would like to see seriously and thoughtfully debated by Administration advocates. . . . It presents clearly much of the story of the failure of the American government to pursue a diplomacy that would lead to a negotiated settlement: the peace feelers that were missed, the ignored appeals, the 'cues' that were not given, the tendency of the US to escalate the war when chances for détente were most hopeful."

Bernard Fall

New York Review of Books, Feb. 9, 1967

"This book raises vital questions about our policy of escalation in relation to peace proposals."

Senator Vance Hartke,
Indiana

"This study of the American role in Vietnam seems to me very important, and one that deserves the attention of both supporters and opponents of the war."

Irving Howe

For your FREE copy of THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION
333 SIXTH AVENUE
NEW YORK, N. Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian Postage, $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

2-20-67

diffusion of the society—that many of their colleagues, during this extraordinary week, had confessed to as well.

Now I wonder if I have not also been sharing in this illness, or perhaps have been totally uncomprehending, when I impose, at least in part, aesthetic criteria upon a phenomenon which may be only nominally art. Surely this would be the last standard on which these artists care to be judged. In fact, their indifference to any kind of judgment was one of the most upsettingly original things about this "exhibition." If, in their passion and peculiar bravery they can chuck aside all artistic motivation, a critic can perhaps forgo his own professional scruples. The demands of immediacy, of directness of appeal, exceed a piddling aestheticism and, very possibly, form itself. These artists have demonstrated that they have vitality and conscience apart from what happens in their studios. Yet, I am afraid that it is not a question of direct appeal with which we are dealing, but a kind of visual expletive, a blurting forth at any cost to obtain emotional relief.

Looked at from any further perspective, such as that of effecting a spiritual or material change, the situation becomes very dubious indeed. Far from being an incarnation of activist art, the Loeb Center show was a spectacle of introversion. No one will "act" on the strength of such hysteria, however pure. By contrast, the indirection and ambivalence of ambitious art (Rosenquist's chrome-plated barbed wire is an example) is socially formulated because it is "distanced" by its creator. However, it is too sophisticated to produce any specific alteration in the body politic. And the more the war escalates, and the mood of the country uglifies, the more the function of such art will seem evasive, unreal. In scores of conversations, I have not met one artist who is truly unalarmed by what he can see or guess in the environment around him. But I have encountered many who are so entangled by the conflicting claims of ethics and métier that they mask out their concern with a kind of melancholy fatalism. They are so convinced of their powerlessness that they become powerless. Or rather, they will it into being.

But none of this is in the least fore-ordained. It could have been that the absentees (they tended to represent the more affluent, abstract, better-known practitioners in their field) almost foresaw the subordinate theme of immolation that ran through "The Angry Arts," and declined to participate, almost out of a sense of self-preservation. Many were the contributions that exhibited this hor-riefed empathy with the victims of American napalming. Before such an issue of charred flesh most other concerns became secondary. And it was from this feat of desperate imagination, even though the thought threatened innumerable artists, that the week of anger produced some of its most lasting effects. The poet Robert Bly presented color slides of burned peasants, interspersed with readings of poetry; the dancer Meredith Monk stood nude as a film projector played raging fire over her body—to the accompaniment of Green-sleeves! And the ceramicist Jeff Schlanger composed an unforgettable poster, which was plastered over New York. In its upper photo, a man's hand strikes a lighter close to the palm of a child (this captioned by the question: "Would you burn a child?"). Underneath, a tabloid shot of a burned Vietnamese child held by its mother, has the legend: "When necessary." Its compounded meanings and ironies worked on multiple levels, and yet were so drastically simple in effect that art and propaganda were blended with high purpose. If the object, instead of a mass-produced poster, had been a painting sensuously exciting in its own right, one could glimpse very well the direction some artists might go. Such particularity of reference is no more a sully of art than sensory richness is a token of indulgence. But to find the crystallization of metaphor and language which would kindle an audience to an antiwar purpose (and avoid the pitfalls of the "Collage" artists) is still beyond the imagination, if not the talents and energies of current painters.

No one can measure the impact of such a phenomenon as "The Angry Arts." But a phenomenon it was: a raising of the voice, sometimes even carrying to the streets, of dissent by artists who can articulate and dramatize what is, or should be, on the conscience of groups much larger than themselves. That they have been roused on such a scale, to such an extremity—that they have received so much attention—is a heartening sign. Because of their "uselessness," society views artists with a certain incredulity, but also with a certain fear. It dimly perceives how much art cuts away repressions and stereotypes in its impulse, not toward power (which governments can at least understand) but toward psychic freedom. A day may come when the creative forces in this country will have to fight for their lives, placed in hopeless, unnatural constraint by the energies of destruction. But in that vision, I hope that I am being very, very overimaginative.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

Alain Resnais' La Guerre Est Finie, an exceedingly well-made and sufficiently compelling film, is in danger of being defeated by the extravagant praise of its American notices. Except for a most successful structural innovation, to be described in a moment, it is not an extraordinary work, and the suggestion that it must be seen two or three times to grasp its complexities will, I think, puzzle more viewers than it convinces.

Yves Montand, who dominates the picture, plays a member of the Spanish Communist underground who has been operating in Madrid for many, many years at the risk of his life and the cost of whatever career he might otherwise have had. He has come to Paris at a moment of great peril for the movement and is there confronted with a variety of illusions about the progress of revolution in Spain. His party superiors wish to advance according to a doctrinaire program for the popular seizure of power. His mistress wants to go back to Madrid with him, and is hurt by the suggestion that his life there is already sufficiently in hazard. Through a girl who has been instrumental in saving his life and with whom he has an abrupt affair, he meets a group of young idealists who dismay him by their impatience with ideologies and tactics and their faith in the curative powers of plastique. To all these, Montand seems slack, disillusioned, bereft of vision and hope. It is not true, but he has no way of convincing them—as traditionally the men who fight have been unable to convince the men who plan that wars are won more by endurance than by blueprints. Elegant, exhausted, resilient and courageous without illusion, Montand is impressive.

Nevertheless, it is a familiar tale and

PINTER'S "THE HOMECOMING"

"A MASTERFUL PLAY. PINTER IS AN ARTIST, ONE OF THE BEST TO HAVE ENTERED THE WORLD'S STAGE IN THE LAST TEN YEARS."

—Harold Clurman, The New York Times

THE ROYAL SHAKESPEARE COMPANY IN
THE HOMECOMING

PRICES: Mon. thru Sat. Evgs.: Orch. $7.50; Front Mezz. $6.75, 5.75; Rear Mezz. $4.75, 3.75; 3.00. Wed. & Sat. Mats.: Orch. $5.75; Front Mezz. $5.25, 4.75; Rear Mezz. $4.25, 3.25, 2.50. Please enclose stamped, self-addressed envelope with order. List several alternate dates. MUSIC BOX THEATRE 239 W. 45 St., N.Y. 246-4636

MAC BIRD! BY BARBARA GARSON.

"The funniest, toughest-minded, and most ingenious political satire I've read in years."—DWIGHT MACDONALD, N.Y. Review of Books.

The complete text — now 75¢ — wherever paperbacks are sold. Or you may order directly from the publisher. (Please enclose payment with order, and add 25¢ for postage and handling.)

GROVE PRESS
315 Hudson Street,
New York, N.Y. 10013

it takes a long time in the telling (there is also a thriller subplot, with the motives of the French police probably not what they appear to be on the surface). The ideas fall into place with smooth familiarity and the people have a depressing way of turning out to be exactly what they seem at first glance. The picture gives the impression of being always at the point of breaking loose from its formula, but in retrospect it has never done so.

The exception to this is Resnais' inventive handling of Montand's interior monologue. The style of the picture is cinema verité—gray skies, newsreel camera angles, cramped interiors. The editing is chronologically straightforward, except that when Montand thinks ahead to a coming test, when he speculates about what may happen, his imaginings are introduced with no break in the narrative flow and no change of style. Thus we see him planning to catch a train, and a moment later see him catching it; we see a dozen girls emerging from a Paris apartment gateway as he tries to imagine what his unknown benefactor might look like; we see disasters occurring as he sets his plans to avoid them.

At first, the jumps are disconcerting, but you soon learn to trust the basic clock of the film and can then take the interior passages in stride. The method produces an illusion of subjective insight much more powerful than the usual "identification" which is felt primarily in the muscles and nerves. Resnais gets you inside his hero's mind—altogether a more compelling experience. The device also offers possibilities for conveying psychological narrative information that Resnais only begins to explore in this picture. It is notable, for example, that although Montand worries a great deal about what may be happening to his comrades still in Spain, these thoughts never break into the picture track. The idea, presumably, is that he cannot allow himself to "see" what he fears may be taking place. The opportunities provided by this editing "within the brain" of the characters are obviously enormous. Resnais used similar approaches in Hiroshima and Marienbad, but he has now advanced to an easy mastery of the shift from exterior event to inner monologue that "reads" smoothly in the flow of the picture. It is a brilliant, utterly cinematic device.

If we are ever to overcome racial antagonism in this country, Negroes will have to disabuse themselves of their romantic notions as to how white people behave toward one another. Or so it occurs to me from having seen Sweet Love, Bitter, an independent film made in New York by Herbert Danska and Lewis Jacobs, starring Dick Gregory and Don Murray. Gregory, a jazz musician who can't get a cabaret license because he is a dope addict, befriends Murray, who is headed for skid row after having killed his wife in a car accident. The Negro helps the white man to pull himself together, and the white man fails the Negro in a moment of violence. The betrayal hurts so deeply that the Negro goes off on a final, fatal narcotic binge.

But race has nothing to do with the betrayal. Murray plays the kind of well-intentioned weakling who will always collapse in a tight spot; part of the art of survival, whatever your color, is learning to recognize the type and not being surprised when it lets you down. So unless the film means to say that Negroes can become friends only with morally flimsy whites—an absurd hypothesis—it is sociologically irrelevant.

A picture is under no compulsion to make a social point, but the tone of Sweet Love, Bitter and Gregory's record in the civil rights movement suggest that it intends to teach a lesson. What it teaches, though, is the difficulty of distinguishing racism from the general human squalor.

Gregory plays his first dramatic role in a mood of cool violence, an implacable clowning, that is utterly convincing and almost physically painful to watch. It is a pose that too many talented Negroes adopt today—too many, because, while the reason for it is clear enough, still clearer is the fact that its principal victim is the man who adopts it. Gregory's characterization says a great deal more about the black-white situation than does the story in which he plays. The dialogue, what I could hear of it, is stiff with irony; a good part of it is lost in the mumble of jive talk and an inferior sound track.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

Norman Mailer's The Deer Park (Theatre de Lys) is a good show. There are pretty ladies in it, attractive clothes, handsome men, a hint of Hollywood glitter, some silken writing and several ideas. It provides a more absorbing evening than most uptown drama. It is not a good play.

It would be insulting to Mailer at this point to say that he has talent. If the play he has made from his 1955 novel about the capital of the movie industry and its infernal suburbs in the opulent desert doesn't hit the target, it is not from lack of skill or poverty of material. The fault lies deeper.

There's a peculiar confusion in it, a variety of intentions. The basic plan is to portray two near artists at opposite poles of their careers. The first is Sergius O'Shaugnessy, a young man just released from the Air Force who enters upon the American scene immediately after the war in which he had occasion to drop jellied gasoline on Japanese citizens and to down three enemy planes. He narrates the play's incidents. Sensitive and bright, he is not yet a formed person. He might possibly develop into a writer of merit or he might conceivably become a film star. He is a promise.

The central character of the play, Charles Francis Eitel, is a better than average motion picture director in his middle forties, educated, good-looking, of an intelligence distinctly superior to his surroundings. He has never made

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00

PAGEANT PRESS

101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

I WANT TO KNOW

(How Citizen Exchange Corps Helps Americans Find Out)
IF RUSSIANS HAVE HORNS

Send me Free reprints of N.Y. Times articles and editorials telling about CEC, a non-profit, tax-exempt foundation. Tell me how it brings together Americans and Russians of all ages and occupations to meet their counterparts in both the United States and the Soviet Union... and how I can participate in this program, which will lead eventually to exchanges of Americans and Soviets to live and work in each other's country for 6 months to 2 years as a major step toward mutual understanding and survival.

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____
CITY _____
STATE _____ ZIP _____

Mail to:

CITIZENS EXCHANGE CORPS,
Dept. N2-20, 550 Fifth Avenue
New York, N. Y. 10036

the kind of film he feels qualified to produce. Though certainly not a Communist, he volunteered to fight on behalf of Republican Spain and has thus run foul of the "Subversive Committee." Blacklisted by the industry as an uncooperative witness and sentenced to a term in prison for contempt of Congress, he is now back in the lap of luxury at a resort which goes by the name of Desert d'Or. He hopes for a comeback, resolved to direct his own script and make a Great picture.

Eitel is a flawed man. His promiscuity, his divorce, his indulgence in the perquisites of easy success have incapacitated him for self-realization. He compromises with the Hollywood big shots, he has a hectic affair with an intensely neurotic girl. When he settles down fitfully in marriage he is stricken by a heart attack. The strain of his life has destroyed him.

Sergius who has been befriended by Eitel is compassionate and horrified. At the nodal point of the Hollywood hell stands Marion Faye, a bisexual pimp who embodies (or symbolizes?) the self-loathing and conscious nihilism latent in the environment. Both Eitel and Sergius (two faces of the same figure at different stages of development) see in Marion the extreme degradation of the world they inhabit. Eitel resists it but succumbs because he has imbibed too much of its poison. Sergius sees Marion as the emblem of a society so debased that only total destruction can cleanse it.

Mailer in some measure identifies himself with all three men. In addition, he has a fixation on the surge and flow of the sexual instinct, regarding it as the nexus through which the affective and creative forces in man may achieve integration. For all his effort, Mailer fails to make his sexual mystique convincing.

The entirely credible facts of the play's milieu are stated clearly enough, but they are true only to the degree that a map represents a place. It is all surface and explanation. What we miss is living impact on our spirit and senses. The dramatization of sex is forced and dry, never stirring. (This may be one reason why the play's verbal obscenities, bolder than any previously heard on our stage, do not excite or shock.) I can accept Mailer's interpretation of the central situation in The Deer Park, but I have no feeling of having made contact with the flesh of human aspiration and suffering that it should convey.

There are exceptions. Two characters emerge with astonishing comic verve. The lesser is Carlyle Munshin, a producer, who collaborates in and deforms Eitel's would-be masterpiece. Even better—a triumph of caricature—is Herman Teppis, boss of Supreme Pictures.

In this disarming monster, this lachrymose villain, Mailer sums up a broad aspect of American character and life. Aggressive, voracious, predatory, Teppis is altogether sincere in his professions of benevolence, humanitarianism, commitment to the accredited virtues. Everything presumably good and actually evil coexists in him without his being in the least embarrassed by the contradiction. He is a bulldozer gushing with affection as he rips into and flattens his subjects. He exudes universal kindness, unquestioning patriotism. He hasn't a single base motive, but he must have his way. It is the only right way, sanctioned by flag and Constitution and the two religions he has embraced (he is also cordial to the Mohammedan). We are strangled by his gorilla tenderness.

The play gives the impression of a slick movie, an impression heightened by a technique of episodic exposition in terse intercut scenes. The fact that it deals in reality but does not project as real leads to a question which is also a paradox: why should the objectively delineated characters—Teppis and his appendage Munshin—prove so much more vivid than those wrought from Mailer's inner being?

The two wholly realized characters have been studied by the author with an adult, a dispassionate mind; the others spring from the self-absorption of a boyish heart. He has something in him of a brilliant kid, an immensely gifted adolescent, tumescent with sensibility, ideas, instruction, intuitions, unable to organize all this and give it a body independent of himself. He stands in the way of his own vision. A lack of artistic discipline is evident, for example, in the last twenty minutes in which he muses and philosophizes to no effect.

The play is well cast. Leo Garen's direction tends to stress external characterization: details of behavior and speech. Though this produces a certain effectiveness it often exposes the script's shallows. Ann Roth has dressed the actors knowingly, and Will Steven Armstrong manages with comparatively modest means to lend his all-purpose set a Hollywood shimmer.

Hugh Marlowe has a gratifyingly resonant voice and plays with good sense but only suggests the torment in Eitel. Rip Torn's Marion Faye is sharper as image and presence than as a person. Gene Lindsey can be little more than sympathetic in the sketchy part of Sergius. (The use of Sergius to recall the play's events and comment on its meaning is in any case a dubious device.) The women—Rosemary Tory, Beverly Bentley, Margret O'Neill—all look right and give themselves devotedly to their roles.

Mickey Knox has the oily bluff and energy for Munshin. Will Lee, a talented and endearing actor with subtle gifts in gesture and movement, paints the clown in Teppis rather than the devouring Gorgon. But these notes on the actors are to be viewed in relation to factors in production not of their making.

DINNER

in tribute to

DR. EDWARD K. BARSKY

on the

Thirtieth Anniversary of the War in Spain

• • •
Friday, Feb. 24, 6:30 P.M.

Imperial Ballroom Hotel Americana

Seventh Avenue & 52 Street, N.Y.C.

• • •
For information or reservations:

Phone: EN 2-5727

133 West 72 St., Room 604, N.Y.C.

The Best Way
To Get

THE NATION

2-20-67
THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

as an Evil Motive," led by a psychologist who lived through a psychosis induced by an LSD experience; "An Encounter Group for Families"; "Intensive Marathon Group Experience" (a therapy that ran from 8 A.M. Friday for twenty-four hours straight, with emotional breakthroughs popping up out of the exhaustion); "Discovering the Here and Now Self," in which a UCLA psychologist employed "alternate periods of meditation and group encounter for our personal enrichment," and a weekend when video tape was used to "enable the individual to confront himself in action to clarify attitudes toward himself."

This fall the institute will push on further with: "Mask, Myth and Dream," in which Joseph Campbell, author of The Hero with a Thousand Faces, will seek to connect his 20th-century seminarians with the mythic qualities which, according to Jung, are part of everyone's psychic inheritance; "The Evolution of Love and Awareness," led by Dr. Ashley Montagu, anthropologist-author-social biologist (it will include consideration of "nonverbal acts of communication which begin to be operative before birth"); "Training the Senses and the Emotions," led by Dr. Sidney Cohen, America's most experienced medical experimenter with LSD.

This past summer, scores of the men and women attending the Big Sur sessions have beefed up their awareness with special treatments (at $35 an hour) from Ida P. Rolf, a biochemist from New York City who has developed a system called "structural integration and postural release." She reorganizes muscular relationships by deep probing and fierce pressures, from toe to head. The body is said to behave in a much more integrated way after this painful work, and Dr. Rolf's patients usually report a corresponding emotional release.

The mainstream of California's awareness quest comes from the Esalen Institute, or through it. Psychologists from the East make it a stopping place when they visit the West Coast. But a few California consciousness-seeking groups are paddling away from the mainstream. One of these is the Guild for Psychological Studies, founded twenty-five years ago by the late Dr. Fritz Kunkel and Elizabeth Howes, a Jungian psychotherapist. Each summer the guild holds seminars on a 257-acre, sylvan retreat in Lake County. The groups usually investigate a theme from early myth or discarded religion, thereby increasing the flow between their unconscious minds and their daily conscious lives. Another group, San Francisco Venture, concentrates more on Christian values in weekend seminars at Pescadero, near the Pacific. One of their more dramatic groups is run by Jerry Smith, a marriage counselor, and his wife. Families learn to share by various techniques, including painting murals together.

The most pyrotechnic of the encounter groups are the "square games" that stemmed from the Synanon movement for curing narcotic addicts. "We have only two rules," said Dan Garrett, a square-game master. "No violence or offers of violence, and no chemicals (such as LSD)." The players sometimes make brutal personal attacks on one another. They must feel it does them good, for 150 persons are on waiting lists for playing space in Northern California alone. "It's good for you the way playing tennis is," Garrett said. "You may even find you can get along with your old lady, after a few games. You get a more flexible view of life. You don't get stuck in the old Aristotelian categories."

Less explosive, but more prevalent, are the many "T-groups" in which all kinds of middle-class men and women strive to be honest emotionally. The University of California Extension even has a "class" in T-grouping—a method devised by an existential psychologist, Carl Rogers, a staff member at the Western Behavioral Sciences Institute in La Jolla. (He has proposed that his technique be considered as a way to make top Washington administrators more human in their contacts with foreign negotiators.) The graduate School of Business Administration at UCLA is particularly taken with this approach. A professor there has tried it out on football players, with the result in one case, that a halfback found he was able to express rather subtle feelings toward teammates, became less hostile toward some of his fellow players, and improved team efficiency. A San Francisco psychologist took a score of business executives out to sea on the California Maritime Academy ship, the Golden Bear. They spent three tense days locked up with their own emotional interactions, and returned to port prepared to conduct themselves with greater emotional honesty, both in the office and at home.

Another order of awareness groups emphasizes creativity. The most innovative protagonist of this approach is Eugene Sagan, a Berkeley psychotherapist who has organized The Institute for Creative and Artistic Development. He got the idea while taking modern dance lessons, and has borrowed ideas from Stanislavsky, founder of the Moscow Art Theatre, University of California sociologist Erving Goffman, Dr. Perls and the Bauhaus. Sagan works in collaboration with an educator, an oil painter, a free-flow dancer and an actor.

Awareness through creation is also practiced in San Francisco by A. A. Leath, a bearded modern dancer who co-starred with Ann Halprin in Birds of America, The Five-Legged Stool and other avant-garde productions. He holds weekly classes in "how to use movement creatively." Last summer, during one class, eight of his students decided to do "something creative" about a husky young man who, they felt, was too embarrassed to be spontaneous in his movements. They executed a "pile up" on him: held him flat on his back until he screamed obscenities at them so loudly that they let him up. "He's doing very well now," said Leath, with a mysterious smile.

But the ultimate in awareness training is being offered by the controversial Free University of Berkeley, which is sponsored by nonconformists who reject the Educational Establishment. They provide, along with a good deal of "radical strategy and philosophy," a course by Richard Alpert, a young psychologist who was ejected from Harvard along with Timothy Leary for unacademic LSD experiments with undergraduates. Alpert's course, called "Journey into Awareness," includes "methods of breaking the subject-object barrier, vertical and horizontal confusion, and maintaining new levels of consciousness."

Vertical or horizontal, all roads in California today lead to the expanded consciousness.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1189

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 Used to raise things and grow a pink bed of it. (6, 6)
- 10 You'll strike out if you make one. (7)
- 11 Did she hold a man for seven years with improvised lyrics? (7)
- 12 Part of the athlete's problem is likely to be waste. (5)
- 13 Shaping up the farm vote, I see! (9)
- 14 Obviously not a tame animal! (10)
- 16 The fourth man? (4)
- 18 Warm up for the race? (4)
- 20 Watch for the midwestern sort. (4-6)
- 23 Did it once call for a certain amount of pull in the Navy? (2-5-2)
- 25 Labeled mostly poplar? (5)
- 26 Good, but not grand. (7)
- 27 Cold pack? (3, 4)
- 28 Sounds like what the scribe did, getting protection for some work. (12)

DOWN:

- 2 It takes far from a little to be sick in the servant's quarters, perhaps. (7)
- 3 You might get to raise his from the deep. (5, 3)
- 4 Does one do it with the knees and feet clung together awkwardly? (9)

- 5 Noted name in gastronomy and the movie industry. (5)
- 6 Bill used to be bigger and went further.
- 7 You've probably heard this song before. (7)
- 8 Horse lovers go to the track to find an association with agriculturist's helper's pursuit. (3, 3, 4, 3)
- 9 A word of warning, cut off and reduced for the sake of perspective. (13)
- 15 Calling on, in addition. (9)
- 17 Melting a form of bond? (8)
- 19 The language of the chairman, endlessly confused? (7)
- 21 What on earth do people do? (Some do a subject for a long time.) (5, 2)
- 22 One might after calling, and also dress. (4, 2)
- 24 Don't go out and list things! (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1188

ACROSS: 1 Lightning rods; 10 Paged; 11 Georgians; 12 Dismantle; 13 Skoal; 14 Agrarian laws; 19 Barnacle Bill; 22 Onset; 24 Promising; 25 Electoral; 26 Idiot; 27 Corresponding. DOWN: 2 Ingest; 3 Hydrangea; 4 Nightfall; 5 Moose; 6 Rages; 7 Dragoman; 8 Spade; 9 Useless; 15 Imbroglio; 16 Nullified; 17 Abdomen; 18 Prospero; 20 Vision; 21 Agate; 23 Tutor; 24 Parts.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address your request to Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 65 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

ORIGINAL LITHOGRAPHS, ETCHINGS: Chagall, Miro, Braque. Moderately priced. Send 50c for color-illustrated catalogue. Kirschner, 90-59 56th Avenue, Elmhurst, New York 11375.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publisher, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor calls on the World Council of Churches, the Vatican, and the United Nations to urge President Johnson to call a CONGRESS of all elected, and other heads of all Nations, to arbitrate the Vietnam War, and all Future Wars.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 514 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

AUSTRALIA WANTS YOU! Government assisted passage. Unlimited Opportunities. Latest Government Information $1.00. Austco, Box 3623-FF, Long Beach, California 90803.

PERSONALS

Party for BARBARA GARSON

Author—Macbird
Thursday, February 23, 8:15 P.M.
WORKMAN'S CIRCLE HALL
132 4th Avenue, Room 617
Liquor, Entertainment • Pageant Players
Donation $2.00
Sponsored by:
Independent Socialist Club

Herman Schwartzman

Pianist - Teacher - Lecturer

Will Accept a Limited Number of Students in Piano and Two-Piano Literature.

128 Devoe Avenue YOnkers 3-4582

MEN SHOULD CARE FOR BABIES NOT KILL THEM

Write for information on draft resistance, tax refusal, pacifism. Send 10c for your copy of "Up Tight With The Draft." Send $1 for special "draft packet" that includes a copy of Handbook for C.O.'s. Write:

WAR RESISTERS LEAGUE

5 Beekman Street, Dept. J, N. Y. C. 10038

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

"A wondrous and terrifying and profoundly moving experience."

—DON ROBERTSON,
Cleveland Plain Dealer

"The vitality of the spoken word has somehow survived transcription in these interviews . . . The differences in vocabulary alone — between the schoolteachers, prostitutes, pensioners, hot-dog stand owner, magazine writer, night watchman, machine operator, business executive — are as informative as a social study and as fascinating as the dialogue of a play."

—NADINE GORDIMER $5.95

A vivid re-creation of the turbulent months after which France —and Europe—would never be the same

"The best account of the revolution available in English."

—PROFESSOR CHARLES TILLY,
University of Toronto
Introduction by George Rudé.
$6.95

THE POORHOUSE STATE

The American Way of Life on Public Assistance

By RICHARD M. ELMAN. "The triumph of this grim book lies in the dramatic rendering of what it means and how it feels to be indigent, abjectly dependent on handouts."—SAUL MALOFF, News-week $5.95

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF POWER

By R. V. SAMPSON. This humane, provocative book — which probes man's urge to dominate — was the subject of an extraordinary review by Christopher Lasch last November 28th in The Nation. $5.95

FOUR LIVES IN THE BEBOP BUSINESS

By A. B. SPELLMAN. The lives and music of Ornette Coleman, Herbie Nichols, Jackie McLean, and Cecil Taylor reveal the day-to-day realities of being a black jazz musician in America. "An American J'accuse!" — RUDIBLESCH, Life $4.95

CONTEMPORARY CHINA

Edited by RUTH ADAMS. Jan Myrdal, Han Suyin, and other leading experts present a detailed report on China today. "Precisely what is needed . . . an excellent picture of this vast and secretive state."—Washington Star $6.95

Now at your bookstore.

25TH ANNIVERSARY YEAR
Pantheon

THE

FEBRUARY 27, 1967 35 cents

THE MASSES / MICHAEL BREWSTER FOLSOM
SMART SET / KENNETH S. LYNN

UPLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
UPLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

before the fall

Croton-on-Hudson, N. Y.

DEAR SIR: Henry W. Berger in "American Labor Overseas" [The Nation, Jan. 16] has made a valuable contribution, deepening the work of Stanley Meisler and Sidney Lens in exposing the role played by the leadership of the AFL-CIO as accessories of the State Department against the interest of the workers of Europe, Asia, Africa and Latin America, and of the workers in the United States itself. Unfortunately, Professor Berger has also done an injustice to the finest traditions of the American labor movement. He writes as if the current policy of the AFL-CIO leadership were a direct continuation of the AFL from its inception. "The main tenets of organized labor's present foreign policy," he writes, "were established in the early days of the AFL under the leadership of Samuel Gompers."

I do not know just what period Berger is referring to, but the AFL was established in 1881, so the years up to 1905 would constitute the "early days." Yet during this period, the AFL, under Gompers' leadership, was in the front ranks of those who combated the rise of American imperialism. Gompers was a vice president of the American Anti-Imperialist League, founded in the midst of the war against Spain to prevent the acquisition of overseas possessions, particularly the Philippines, and to demand full independence for Cuba. . . .

When U.S. military authorities in Havana broke the general strike of the Cuban workers for an eight-hour day, the AFL convention, Detroit, Dec., 1899, condemned the action, and the delegates applauded Gompers when he urged the federation to back their Cuban brothers to the hilt. . . . Gompers warned that unless American imperialism was defeated, the workers in the United States would suffer the consequences along with those in the countries dominated by our imperialists. . . .

By 1905 Gompers and other leaders of the AFL had shifted their position, although a strong minority still existed in the federation which continued to oppose American foreign policy. This shift . . . coincided with Gompers' (and other AFL leaders') close association with the National Civic Federation founded in 1900 for the purpose of promoting peace and harmony in the industrial world. . . . Associating with Mark Hanna and with representatives of the house of Morgan, Gompers and his associates lost interest in combating American imperialism. . . . Soon they were to become the leading spokesmen for a policy of imperialism. But the early anti-imperialist traditions of the AFL are significant and should not be forgotten.

Philip S. Foner

rank and file

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In his article, Henry W. Berger refers to me as "associated with the AFL." Since the other names he lists with mine were, in fact, officials or employees of the AFL, his implication is clear. I was never an official or an employee of the AFL or the CIO; if I had been, I would be happy to affirm it. I have been a dues-paying member of the American Newspaper Guild, both before and after the merger of the AFL-CIO; that is all. . . .

John Herling

Burlington, Vt.

DEAR SIR: I regret that I left the impression that Mr. Herling was employed by the AFL which he was not, as I well know and as he has made clear. Mr. Herling was, however, the head of the Labor Relations Division of the Office of Inter-American Affairs and actively solicited the

(Continued on page 276)

EDITORIALS

The Professor & the CIA

For twelve years Dr. Evron M. Kirkpatrick has been executive director of the American Political Science Association, a prestigious fraternity which has about 16,000 professors in its membership.

He has also been, for the last ten years, executive director of Operations and Policy Research, Inc., an organization established to help the United States Information Service, the government's propaganda arm, distribute more persuasive broadsides and magazines and books both in this country and abroad.

Dr. Kirkpatrick (formerly University of Minnesota, formerly OSS, formerly State Department) sees no conflict in his dual role. Indeed, to create and polish the government's propaganda Dr. Kirkpatrick has said he employs on a part-time basis more than 100 professors, many of them members of his campus organization, the APSA.

Where does the money come from? In the early years of its existence, Operations and Policy Research, Inc., was supported solely by USIA funds. It still gets nearly $60,000 a year from USIA, but now also receives money from the Pentagon, the State Department and other government agencies. It will never lack for money ties, because one of Dr. Kirkpatrick's close friends is Vice President Humphrey; and Max M. Kampelman, vice president and attorney for Kirkpatrick's outfit, is one of Washington's leading Establishment liberals.

Even more significant, considering recent disclosures about the Central Intelligence Agency's fiddling with campus affairs, is the fact that OPR, Inc., has received large grants from the Sidney and Esther Rabb Charitable Foundation, one of the foundations identified as a conduit for CIA funds to feed the National Student Association. The Rabb Foundation gave four times as much to Dr. Kirkpatrick's professors as it gave to the students.

Another foundation helping to pay for Dr. Kirkpatrick's work is the Pappas Charitable Trust of Boston. In the last two years, OPR, Inc., has received more than $120,000 from Pappas. It may or may not mean anything, but Pappas also supports the International Development Foundation, Inc., which glows with the suspicion of being a CIA front since it was launched with a grant of $187,685 from the CIA-connected Radio Free Europe and $30,000 from the Beacon Fund, which has been identified by Congressional investigators as having put money into another CIA-conduit foundation, the Kaplan Fund. In 1964 alone, Pappas gave the International Development Foundation $102,000.

Dr. Kirkpatrick says it is "very likely" that these two foundations transmit CIA funds, and acknowledges that in 1963, 1964 and 1965 OPR, Inc., received CIA money, "principally" for studies of Latin American elections. No strings, he says, were attached to these grants.

Among its other duties, Dr. Kirkpatrick's organization reads and gives expert opinion on books which USIA then plants with commercial publishers—without, let us say, publicizing the sponsorship. One of the houses with which USIA has so worked is Potomac Books, whose secretary is Craig Colgate, Jr., formerly of the CIA.

Dr. Kirkpatrick's group also O.K.'d six books which USIA then published with Robert B. Luce, Inc. Luce—better known at the time as the publisher of The New Republic—was also a member of the publishing firm Grayson, Van Roijen and Luce, Inc., which three months after its founding became Potomac Books, Inc.

Nearly as talented a publicist as Dr. Kirkpatrick is his wife, Jeane, who in 1964 edited and wrote the introductory essay for The Strategy of Deception, a book which was published by Farrar, Straus, and made a "special alternate selection" by the Book-of-the-Month Club (at no time was it mentioned that the book's creation had been subsidized by the USIA).

The USIA did not pay Farrar, Straus; it paid The New Leader, whose editor, the late Sol Levitas, conceived of the book and peddled the idea to USIA. Mrs. Kirkpatrick said she had no idea that the USIA was subsidizing her book—a statement hard to accept, considering that one of its essays ("Communists in the CIO") was written by Kampelman, her husband's close associate in dealings with the USIA.

In the light of subsequent events, the slick brochure distributed by Book-of-the-Month seems almost to spell out the underlying plan. There, amidst patriotic endorsements by former CIA boss Allen W. Dulles and Senators Thomas J. Dodd and Paul H. Douglas, often collaborators in cold-war witch hunting, and Hubert Humphrey, was this note from the book club editors:

... the Book-of-the-Month Club is embarking on a distribution crusade on behalf of the book among institutions of higher education. To match every copy of The Strategy of Deception purchased by a member, a com-

West Coast Office

As of this issue, Frontier magazine has merged with The Nation. A West Coast monthly, Frontier has for seventeen years been giving its readers well-informed, ably presented comment on Western and national political and cultural affairs.

The new alliance will strengthen The Nation's coverage, most particularly in observation and comment upon developments in California and the other Western states. More effectively than ever, we shall be able to fulfill the implications of our name: we shall become more truly a magazine of the nation.

The Nation's new West Coast office in Los Angeles will be under the direction of Frontier's publisher, Gifford Phillips, and its editor, Phil Kerby. They are now on The Nation's masthead as associate publisher and associate editor, respectively. We welcome them warmly as partners in our enterprise.

THE EDITORS

IN THIS ISSUE

February 27, 1967

EDITORIALS

258

ARTICLES

- 262 Those "Mad" Chinese Morton H. Fried
- 265 U. S. Civil Service:
Rebels on the Potomac Robert G. Sherrill
- 268 On Location in Rostov:
Filming the New Revolution Desmond Smith
- 272 California Revolution 5:
Conservation Comes of Age Scott Thurber
- 275 Railroad Hypocrisy:
The Nuisance of Passengers William R. Wright

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 277 The Masses:
Working-Class Dreams Michael B. Folsom
- 278 Parting (poem) John Frederick Nims
- 279 And Middle-Class Daydreams Kenneth S. Lynn
- 281 Messages in a Bottle Paul Zweig
- 283 Architecture Ervin Galantay
- 285 Theatre Harold Clurman
- 286 The Maid's Story (poem) Howard Moss
- 287 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher	JAMES J. STORROW JR.	Associate Publisher	GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor	CAREY McWILLIAMS	Associate Editor	PHIL KERBY
Executive Editor	ROBERT HATCH	Literary Editor	HELEN YGLESIAS
Copy Editor	MARION HESS	Poetry Editor	MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Theatre	HAROLD CLURMAN	Washington	ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Art	MAX KOZLOFF	Paris	ALEXANDER WERTH
Music	BENJAMIN BORETZ	London	RAYMOND WILLIAMS
Science	CARL DREHER	Bonn	C. AMERY
Advertising Manager	MARY SIMON	Canberra	C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1434 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-3547. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 9

plimentary copy will be sent, pro bono publico, to the library of a college or university in the United States or Canada; and wherever it seems needed, two copies. Also, it will be suggested to the authorities of every such educational institution that the book be made required reading in all social studies and political courses. . . .

It did not matter to the USIA that it is forbidden by law from distributing its propaganda goodies in this country. Apparently it still does not matter, because according to USIA director Leonard Mark's testimony before Congress last year, the practice continues.

The full extent of the cooperation between the USIA and the CIA is just beginning to be uncovered, in their indoctrinating not only of foreigners but also of students in this country. When Congress begins its investigation, it might like to talk with Dr. Kirkpatrick about the extent to which he has induced the nation's political scientists to cooperate.

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

The Time To Negotiate

It is not only Ho Chi Minh who must be forced to the conference table; it is also Lyndon B. Johnson. Neither is completely a free agent: both must take into account changing circumstances, the vicissitudes of war, popular emotions, domestic political pressures. There may come a time when Ho will, all things considered, resign himself to negotiations. If this coincides with a similar situation for Mr. Johnson, obstacles to negotiation will be overridden. But it is also possible for one side or the other to be forced into negotiations by adverse developments, or the prospect thereof. Because of clear American superiority in weapons, this is much more likely to happen to Ho, but it is conceivable for Johnson too. He is under intensified attack from discerning (or apprehensive) Republicans, as well as members of his own party. Among the former, Senator Javits has recently given voice to relatively dovelike sentiments—the result, presumably, of the growing unpopularity of this most unpopular of American wars. Even hawkish sentiment in the polls is less an expression of belligerence than an impatient desire to end the war.

Mr. Johnson interprets every development in foreign affairs as it affects domestic politics. So viewed, it would be a political mischance if the North Vietnamese made unmistakable overtures for negotiations at this time. Mr. Johnson has expressed his heartfelt desire for a peace conference so often that, even if this "signal" were illusory, he might find himself trapped if Ho Chi Minh complied. It is not to be ruled out that Ho might find it expedient to talk—whatever his ulterior motives. His Russian ally is far away, and supplies from that quarter, if shipped entirely by sea, could be cut off by aerial operations against Haiphong. His Chinese ally is in a state of turmoil. For Ho, negotiating might become the lesser evil.

The South Vietnamese are in a condition of political chaos paralleling that of Communist China, only less noisy. No one knows this better than the South Vietnamese army commanders. James Robinson of N.B.C. News recently reported that eight of the ten military field commanders have made accommodations with the Vietcong—and last year 165,000 soldiers deserted. Robinson got this from a "ranking Asian intelligence officer," who compared the situation in South Vietnam to that in China in 1948. "Dry rot of accommodation," this official says, is widespread among the second and third echelons of the South Vietnamese bureaucracy, which is closer to the grass roots than the people in the U.S. Embassy in Saigon or the soothsayers in Washington. There might, then, be conditions in South Vietnam, as well as in the North, favoring an accommodation in the near future.

But how long could an agreement last, unless backed up by American air power and a readiness to renew the war? South Vietnam will shortly have a new constitution, whether on paper or in practical effect remains to be seen. Then elections are to be held. The military junta may remain in power, or there may be some degree of civilian control. In a year or so there might be enough stability so that the government could maintain itself against the Vietcong, who, by all indications, will not be wiped out in the countryside then, or any time. A peace no more precarious and hostile than that in Korea might then be established. But a peace made now might well collapse just before the 1968 elections in the United States, and where would that leave Mr. Johnson? On the other hand, a peace settlement a year hence would have a fair chance of enduring at least through the first Tuesday in November.

If, on the contrary, Ho remains obstinate and Mr. Johnson keeps insisting on a quid pro quo or the bombs continue to fall on North Vietnam, another danger besets him. American memories hark back to 1952, when General Eisenhower won on the promise to end the Korean War. And he did end it. If the Vietnamese War drags on, and Americans grow intolerably sick of it, there is no insuperable obstacle to a Republican victory in 1968.

No precise calculus can be applied, but these are some of the factors which are operating beneath the visible maneuvers and the audible speeches.

Cronkite's Alarm

Walter Cronkite, a plain and honest man, has had a long look at the United States credibility gap. He finds it frightening. "Today truth and honesty are surrounded by untruth and dishonesty, by dissembling and distortion, by cynicism and disbelief. In the area of government, this is a matter for which we all bear responsibility in a democracy and which should be a matter of direct concern and immediate action."

He thinks the problem not just moral or philosophic—his phrasing—but a real, immediate danger "that could directly affect our ability to survive." Therefore the C.B.S. newsman has tendered a criticism of government policy that is extraordinarily harsh, coming from a mild, earnest man dedicated to cool objectivity and avoidance of editorializing, as he nightly reads the news.

With reference to the war in Vietnam, he said: "This Administration and preceding ones did not level with the American people on the nature or scope of the commitment which, I submit, they themselves must have known was one of the ultimates of our policy."

Moreover, "misleading of the public has become general armed forces policy." And Cronkite's blasts carried beyond Vietnam. He made substantially the same charges in connection with the holding of aluminum prices and the Cuban missile crisis.

However, Cronkite did not broadcast these interesting views—based on his long news experience and deep belief in democracy—on his evening news program. He delivered them on February 9 in the comparative obscurity of a Johns Hopkins University lecture hall. It is as if James Reston were to correct in the Columbia Journalism Review errors he committed in The New York Times. Cronkite has a primary responsibility to his millions of viewers. It is to them he should be addressing his alarm about Administration deception.

What is perhaps even more disturbing than the uneasy feeling one gets that Cronkite's talk was mere rhetoric is the newsman's unquestioning acceptance of a governmental basic premise. "Our problem," he said, "is how the nation can be kept informed and how it can be given all the information that is necessary for the viable function of a democracy while denying to the potential enemy the information which is capital to his cause."

But that, basically, is the Pentagon view. Since World War II, the government has extended its definition of the state of war to encompass total war, undeclared war, hot and cold war, hence potential war. In such a state of perpetual terror, "the potential enemy" is always with us, free access to information is forever denied, and Cronkite really has no cause for complaint.

If Cronkite did not mean that, he should say on the air exactly what he did mean.

Off the Land

From the Mississippi Delta come stories like this one by Gene Roberts in The New York Times: Lockett Mayze, a 59-year-old Negro former sharecropper, is speaking. "I didn't hardly work at all last year. When the cap'n told me he wouldn't even have that much work for me this year, I up and left. The best week I had last year was $15, and that was a mighty unusual week."

Mr. Mayze, his wife and eight children, are now living in an abandoned house owned by a Negro friend. He told the reporter that he could not remember when he last had a dollar in his pocket. His family has been subsisting on surplus farm products, except that he was given a hog's head by a friend; that was an occasion. He is a poor possibility for retraining because of his age. "I never had me hardly any schooling," he says, "and all I know is farm work. I don't know what I'll do now."

Some 100,000 Negroes—counting women and children—don't know either. The prospect is that they will be deprived of all farm income this year. The pretext is the new $1-an-hour minimum wage law, which became effective on February 1. The Delta Council, an organization of cotton planters, announces that thousands of workers will be "replaced" by even more intensive use of weed-killing chemicals and mechanical cotton pickers. In just four Delta counties some 12,000 families are about to be dispossessed. Up to now they have been allowed to remain in their shacks on the plantations and live on welfare and surplus commodities, but even this marginal existence is coming to an end.

Michael J. Piore, an assistant professor of economics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, spent his Christmas vacation in Mississippi and talked to Amzie Moore, the leader of the civil rights movement in the four counties. He was impressed by Mr. Moore—"an intelligent, articulate and sophisticated man." Moore believes, as do most disinterested observers in the Delta, that the planters see the minimum wage as an opportunity to rid themselves of "their" remaining Negroes. In a number of Delta counties Negroes now constitute a majority of registered voters. Evicting Negroes is one way of turning a majority into a minority. An additional incentive is that the minimum wage applies only to farms with seven or more employees; below that figure, old sharecropping levels of compensation may be retained.

Those Negroes who had some chance of finding work in centers like Chicago, Detroit and Ohio cities have already left Mississippi and Alabama. Those left are described by an official of the Economic Research Service of the Department of Agriculture as possibly the "real hard core" of Southern Negro poverty. If these last victims migrate likewise, they will have to be supported on "welfare" wherever they relocate. There is no social or economic advantage whatever in forcing them from the places where they have lived all their lives into Northern ghettos.

Some form of rural resettlement, combined with industrial development and training for those who can be trained, is clearly in order. The Canadian Baby Bonus Plan, discussed by Ian Sclanders in The Nation ("Bonus for Babies," February 17, 1964) was considered at some length in recent sessions of Senator Ribicoff's committee. This kind of family income is not a novel idea, and there is a wealth of experience to recommend it, but there is need for immediate emergency action to mitigate the effects of the impending social disaster in the South.

THOSE 'MAD' CHINESE

MORTON H. FRIED

Mr. Fried, chairman of the Department of Anthropology, Columbia University, and member of the East Asian Institute, is the author of Fabric of Chinese Society (Praeger).

The predominant feeling among those who should know better seems to be that the Chinese have collectively gone mad in the present crisis. Sinologues and Pekinologists see what is happening as a struggle for succession to the powers of a sick and dying Mao; as an attempt by an old man to cleanse a failing revolution of waste products and restore a flaming élan; as a form of Oriental madness, a Chinese version of the Malay amok, which only an anthropologist would seek to explain.

The explanation of current Chinese events in terms of a hypothetical form of social madness is widely acceptable, perhaps, because it leaves the Chinese in a behavioral vacuum: they are acting as they are for reasons that have nothing to do with the United States or anything we have done in the past. Another plausible reason for the success of the theory is to be found in our faith that whom the gods would destroy they first make mad. Certainly U.S. News & World Report and Fortune look forward, as they have for almost eighteen years, to the momentary collapse of the Red Chinese state.

Whatever the basis for the popularity of the "madness" hypothesis, it has one crippling disability: it predicts nothing, offers no basis on which alternative courses may be plotted with any security as to the probabilities involved. Since China is, in a sense, the fuse in the bomb of contemporary international relations, the present status of our understanding is not merely ridiculous but suicidal. There is, however, another possible view.

This alternative interpretation of recent events in China dispenses with the notion that what is happening is in any significant way irrational or uncontrolled. This does not mean that each development is planned or that the tactical commands emanate from one source. There is real conflict and, as most analysts have already pointed out, there is an incipient civil war; one of the puzzles here to be discussed is why it remains incipient under conditions so conducive to outbreak.

At the core of my analysis is one assumption, but it requires no great flight of fancy. I assume that the Lin-Mao power faction (Lin Piao, Minister of Defense and de facto head of the military establishment, and Mao Tse-tung) believes that probably in 1967 or 1968, certainly within a very few years, America will attack, eventually invade, the People's Republic of China. From this assumption, bolstered daily by some action of the United States, some statement by one of our high officials, or some pronouncement by a current or former U.S. military leader, the present events in China flow as easily as spring freshets after a rain. The hard-line Maoists, expecting war and invasion, expect also to win it. Indeed, they welcome such a war and will do what they can to provoke it. But to win it, they must reverse some of the trends that have been growing in China for more than a decade. To win, they cannot rely on massed armies, big factories, orderly supply columns or centralized political control. They believe, and there is reason to agree with them, that reliance on such things will insure rapid defeat. And it is their view not merely that reliance upon these things in war will lead to the defeat of the Lin-Mao China but that reliance upon them at the present time will produce conditions leading inexorably to that defeat. It is therefore incumbent on the Lin-Mao group immediately to eradicate centralized government, urban domination of the society, concentrated industrial plants, even conventionally structured education.

If such a program can be realized, Lin and Mao will return China to structural conditions closely resembling those which they manipulated so brilliantly during the thirties and forties until, to the incredulity of the whole world, including the Soviet Union, they emerged victorious and grasped national control. Under such conditions, China becomes a vast trap. The invader may take almost any strong point he wishes, but at high cost, and always with the proviso that the terrain between strong points belongs to the guerrillas, as does almost everything in the night. Under such conditions, as Mao and more lately Lin Piao have confidently stated, the enemy, the United States, becomes the service of supply upon which the guerrilla armies rely.

With such a program the Lin-Mao group also disposes of the complex question that haunted Chinese strategy considerations for ten years until the emergence of the Red Guard movement.* This is the question of "Red or expert." There was a time when the idealistic zeal that so frequently clouds issues in Communist China indicated the solution of "Red and expert," but that was buried in the debris of the first Great Leap Forward. Now the Lin-Mao group relegates expertise to an inferior place in its scheme. The only form of expertise it encourages is that found in the thought of Mao Tse-tung, especially those portions of the ideology which deal with the science of resistance, struggle and guerrilla war.

The present relationship between China and the Soviet Union can be explained in terms of the analysis already made. Before elaborating on that acrimony, however, I want to take a look at the counter camp, which has been the butt of most of the Red Guard activity.

The faction in China against which the Lin-Mao group concentrates its force and venom is, as has been remarked by most of the experts, the main personnel of the Chinese Communist Party, together with nonparty managers of almost all kinds. Just as the figurehead of the Red Guard

*The present Red Guard is not the first to appear in Chinese communism. Mao speaks of Red Guards in his writings of the late twenties and early thirties, though the forces in question were not quite the same as those today, being more like a Red militia. At present there are actually two Red Guard movements, called by different names. We are familiar with the youth group; the other, deliberately counter to this movement, and closer to the militia of the past, is made up of peasants and workers.

is the party chairman, Mao Tse-tung, so the figurehead of the party is the head of state, Liu Shao-ch'i. The idea of persecuting a President while he remains in office, of adolescents making him stand on a table and publicly confess his sins (and doing the same to his wife) is so ludicrous that it seems to confirm the hypothesis of social madness in China. Can there be logical motivation for such behavior? To answer this question, we must assess what the Liu faction, the "proper" Communist Party faction, stands for.

Once again we need to make only one assumption and, as before, it arises from the facts as they have been reported. I assume that the Liu faction has maintained connections with the Soviet Union and to some degree represents the influence of Moscow. More than that, this faction presumably operates at least in part according to information from Moscow, and one salient bit of information from that source has been the assurance that Soviet military capacity shields China from American invasion. It guarantees that any American attack on China will be taken as an attack on Russia, with all the consequences that naturally follow.

Working from this assumption, it is reasonable to believe that the Liu faction favors development of China along lines that have already proved successful in the Soviet Union. This means concentration on industrial development, with associated emphasis on urban areas, unified military forces, centralized political structure and conventional educational development. To assist in the realization of this program the Liu faction is willing to rely on Soviet assistance, and that means a return to conditions of some years ago, when Russian specialists were numerous in China and Russian credits were a necessary supplement to Chinese capital development. It also means accepting once more various negative conditions, some relating to border definition and maintenance (as in Sinkiang, Mongolia and Manchuria), and to a degree of Russian intervention in Chinese internal politics.

Beaton, Toronto Telegram: Ben Roth

I believe that the Liu faction thinks it most unlikely that the United States will actually invade, and therefore concentrates on making China a world power in conventional terms. This means that the Liu faction stresses the role of expertise; but as matters evolved elsewhere in the Communist world, it now also means that they can stress "Red" as that term is usually understood outside Maoism. The Liu point of view accepts bureaucracy and, without taking a formal position in the matter, condones the emergence of a "new class," rather like that which survived Stalin and rode out the Soviet interregnum to reach the stable conditions of Russia in recent years. As a by-product, it also accepts routinization and consequently looks forward to the destruction of the personality cult of Mao with its charismatic convulsions.

Against that background, I submit, present events in China are revealed as anything but insane. While certainly violent, they can be seen as rational consequences of a basic split in strategy between the two factions now locked in a real contest for power. It is not, then, merely a battle for succession, at a time when Mao is in failing health, or worse (which I think may be the case). The real struggle is between camps holding totally antagonistic views as to how China's current problems can be solved. Obviously much more is implied on lower levels: there is, at the least, the opportunity afforded to the young and "out" to displace the old and "in" by destroying the established party structure. Actually, this is not a new theme within the young Chinese Communist state; one can read Franz Schurmann's Ideology and Organization in Communist China from this perspective and spot the latent impulses.

At this point, one may expect the question: "Why is so much hostility directed at the Soviet Union in the present movement?" The answer is implicit in what has gone before, but then we must turn to more difficult questions.

Abu, London: Ben Roth

The Red Guard hostility to Russia reflects the Maoist fear that Soviet Communists are misled by their own interests. This faction does not credit assurances of the Russian will and power to forestall American attack on China. Why should it? The USSR has on occasions past completely misread the Chinese Communist revolution and its prospects and offered direction and advice that led to disaster.

Even were this not enough, the Lin-Mao faction disagrees because it wants the coming war, seeing it more or less as the second version of a previous triumph. It doesn't really fear nuclear weapons, because it plans to decentralize. Having no political or industrial centers, and in general placing little reliance on cities, it sees no greater danger in the U.S. nuclear threat than there was in the Japanese bombing potential of the earlier war. What is more, the present failure of United States bombing in North and South Vietnam confirms the belief that air power, whether conventional or nuclear, is not decisive in the kind of war that the Lin-Mao faction expects to fight. On the contrary, its theorists look to such a war as a means of bleeding the United States until it loses the support of all its allies and finally suffers structural disintegration to the point that it can no longer meet its internal problems.

Pierre, Aux Ecoutes (Paris): Ben Roth

The Lin-Mao faction is willing to apply almost any degree of force to the Soviet Union because it anticipates only disaster from that direction. Worse than overt military interference would be any Soviet attempt to encourage centralized development of the Chinese economy, a development that would create incentives for the maintenance of peace.

There are two further questions which I consider more difficult to answer. The first asks why the Russians have not been more active in China than they seem to have been. Why hasn't there been an attempt to apply the kind of solution that the Soviet Union used in Hungary in 1956—that is, military support of the Liu faction? The second asks why the present Chinese revolution has been so disciplined and contained.

The first question has certain obscure aspects to which I cannot here turn. However, in the grossest approach, the limitations on Soviet intervention are similar to those that inhibit an American invasion. Even if the USSR took the position that it was intervening on behalf of President Liu Shao-ch'i, and assuming that he made a public request for such aid, Russia would still be undertaking a military adventure in a vast quagmire of land and people. The Kremlin may already have reviewed this situation and come to a firm "nyet," despite the urgings of such generals as may believe in the total efficacy of military power.

I find the answer to the second question much more baffling; it must be synthesized from a great many disparate elements. Workers and peasants have not been doing badly by Chinese standards. There have been uprisings, but conditions in the countryside have not yet provoked a real desire to attack and eliminate the Maoists, although further anti-materialistic Maoist excesses could produce the necessary reaction in short order.

Within the party itself, the word, I am sure, is restraint. A situation like the present one could easily bring the whole edifice of communism crashing to the ground, and the party hierarchy must be awake to the danger. The ideological revolution in China seems to have far outdistanced its technological and economic base, and a thoroughgoing counterrevolution is a definite possibility. Accordingly, successive steps must be taken carefully and in such a way as to minimize the shocks to the revolution that have already occurred. The party is thus forced to take a great deal of punishment to achieve the position that will enable it to consolidate advances without sacrificing fundamental accomplishments.

Although it goes beyond the scope of this article, I should like to add some suggestions about the present international activities of the United States as they affect the crisis in China. Specifically, I believe that our present involvement in Vietnam aids the Lin-Mao faction and may be the factor that brings it victory in the present struggle.

The presence of some 400,000 American combat troops on the Asian mainland, and the continued bombing of areas lying just beyond the boundaries of China, powerfully support the Lin-Mao contention that the United States plans to invade China. It is essential that real steps be taken to prove that the United States is intent on disengaging in Vietnam. The bombing should stop immediately, with every indication that it is a permanent and unilateral action. Thereafter, and as rapidly as possible, there should be some troop withdrawals. This would strengthen the sector that opposes Lin and Mao, and might so alter conditions as to bring victory to the Liu forces in the present internal struggle. This would not solve the world's problems, but it would offer the possibility of developments in Asia similar to those that have occurred in Eastern Europe since the death of Stalin.

We need not stand helpless as events in China drift toward a condition that almost guarantees World War III. To be sure, appropriate action requires great political sagacity and daring. In view of the alternatives there is no real choice, and hesitation itself leads to defeat.

REBELS ON THE POTOMAC

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington, D.C.

Of the many things precious to the United States Civil Service Commission (orthodox patriotism, orthodox sex and absolute obedience are all near the top of its list), nothing is held quite so dear as the concept of bossism, in the abstract and on the hoof. As a result, labor-management relations in the federal service is of a quality that (to use Washington Star reporter Joseph Young's description of a particular agency) "would have brought tears of envy to the industrial barons of old."

To the USCS, nothing is as sanctified as authority. The chain of command is and must remain inviolable. Not even national security is considered of greater importance. Kicking around on appeal now is a State Department case in which an employee in West Germany turned in his superior for slipping into East Germany to telephone someone in Poland. The subordinate paid for his zeal by being fired. Much earlier, in a case coming out of the Federal Housing Authority, an employee who accused three of his superiors of misconduct was dismissed. True, the three bosses were also fired for fraud, misuse of public funds and other improper conduct; the subordinate was discharged simply for reporting them.

Don't complain; don't criticize the boss; don't start trouble. These are the cardinal principles of the Civil Service Commission. Government employees understand this without being told, but sometimes they get it in writing. A memorandum in a Montana office of the Federal Aviation Agency reads like this:

Subject: Grievances
To: All Employees

It is an employee's right to file a grievance as outlined in the directives or to write a letter to his Congressman.

The consequences of doing either of these should be considered by the employee. It appears to me that unless a clean-cut and remedial situation exists, the chances are that your letter will do you more harm than good.

In the case of a letter of grievance, your superior will be called upon to justify his decision. He is not likely to do that by emphasizing your virtues. In other words, you are laying your career on the line for this grievance.
... (Emphasis added.)

That's clear enough. William F. McKee, FAA administrator, claims that the memorandum was "completely contrary to agency policy and procedure," but it was in effect three years and not until last January 25, when Sen. Samuel J. Ervin, Jr., protested did he get around to canceling it.

A man who joined the federal service as a laborer kept pressing for promotion to the grade of machinist. He had come into government work with twenty years' experience as a machinist and he wanted to make use of it. But his bosses—this was at the Barstow, Calif., Marine Corps Supply Center—didn't like the way he tried to sell them on his abilities, and he shortly received a letter from the industrial relations officer warning that "should you continue to be dissatisfied with the management of this center, the future of your employment at this installation will be in doubt."

There are numerous ways of getting rid of a "trouble-maker" who does his job very well and cannot be discharged for cause. One of the most common is to "reorganize" the office in such a way that his position is eliminated. This is done not only to get rid of trouble-makers but also to make an opening for one of the boss's pals. For example, an office of the National Aviation Facilities Experimental Center was jockeyed around until one of the compliance and security officers was squeezed out. He was ranked as a GS-12. At the same time, the same job was reinstated at a higher rank (GS-13), and a man with less experience, less government service and less education was transferred into it from New York. Only a hard fight by the American Federation of Government Employees (AFGE) won a reversal on that one, but the bosses in the USCS get away with similar maneuvers all the time.

Another ingenious way to get rid of an employee who rubs his superior the wrong way is to have him discharged, or retired, as a mental case. This is far more common than one might suppose. A study of 100,000 persons pensioned by the government between 1955 and 1962 showed that the third-ranking reason for leaving government work (behind heart trouble, 43,000, and ailments of the bones and joints, 21,000) was "nervous system disease," 13,300. Leading the list of these was "psychoneuroses," 6,271. In other words, 13 per cent of the pensions were given for mental or nervous disorders, and half of these were for the nebulous "psychoneuroses"—whatever that covers. The second-ranking nervous disorder was "schizophrenia," 2,293. And what is that? Dr. Karl Menninger told the Senate Constitutional Rights Subcommittee that if someone told him a man had "schizoid trends," that "would mean to me that he is like 50 million other Americans." Of course, some of these "nervous" people voluntarily left government service, but a Civil Service Commission survey covering the years 1954 to 1964 showed that half of the mental-nervous pensioners departed under protest.

If the Civil Service brass decides to hang a "psychoneurosis" label on an employee, there's not much he can do to get rid of it unless he is lucky enough to have the AFGE or one of the other unions fighting for him, demanding that a private rather than a government psychiatrist be consulted. If the worker is on his own, he's as good as out. There is no due process, no hearing either before or after the examination. The worker is told he needs "attention" and is ordered to undergo examination by a Civil Service psychiatrist. If he refuses, he can of course be discharged for disobeying an order. If he agrees to the examination, he thereby becomes a party to his own destruction. USCS psychiatrists, knowing that the "patient" wouldn't have been sent to them if somebody up the line were not unhappy with his work, are inclined to find that he is too nervous or too nuts to hold down his job.

The worker never gets to see the psychiatrist's report. He doesn't know if he has been marked down as a mild nervous case or a raving maniac. All he knows is that he will carry a semi-nut reputation for the rest of his professional career, with no way to disprove it at once or modify it later. With that on his record, it is not easy to move back into private industry.

A brilliant but quarrelsome doctor was recently dismissed from the National Institutes of Health as a "psycho." He was not even put through the routine mental examination, but was instead arbitrarily shoved out the door with a pension for life—a $470 a month pension which, at the age of 42, he did not want. When I talked to him, he sounded and acted sane enough; a conversation may not be the best proof of sanity, but on the other hand the Civil Service Commission had come up with not one scrap of evidence to indicate that he is mad. The only thing that has been proved against him is that some of his superiors disliked him.

A woman employed in the Defense Department has four times been ordered to be examined by a government psychiatrist and four times has refused, going instead to her own physician, who each time pronounced her calm and normal. Surprisingly, she has not yet been fired, although she faces charges of insubordination.

The most common method for getting rid of an employee who has ruffled the chain of command is to keep book on him, to watch his every activity, to scrape and rescraper through his original job application in search of technical defects, and then accuse him of "falsification." Charles Scanlan, one of the top attorneys for the AFGE, has noted: "If they want to find something to fire you for, it is a rare worker who can escape their searchings."

One of the most spectacular examples of this kind of harassment came out of Redstone Arsenal in Alabama. Billy J. White, Jr., an equipment specialist, made an error in filing a travel voucher. He had worked for the government twelve years and served in the armed forces five years without a blemish on his record. He overcharged the government 2c a mile, by mistake. When it was called to his attention, he filed a corrected voucher, but his superior refused to accept it and filed a charge of attempted fraud. An appeals examiner looked into the case and judged White to be innocent and advised the government to drop the charges. It might have done so, but White belonged to the AFGE and unions are hated by the brass at Redstone. The commanding officer, Maj. Gen. John G. Zierdt, refused to withdraw the charges. But union lawyers got White reinstated on a technicality; the next day, knowing that the military was out to get him, White resigned with the understanding that his separation form would not contain derogatory information.

Instead, Redstone authorities refiled the charges and had him arrested by the FBI. He posted bond and looked for work elsewhere, but couldn't find it because civil service officials—going back on their word—had inserted in his record that he quit while facing criminal charges. With the AFGE's help, he cleared his name, but only after a three-year fight and after the union had spent thousands of dollars to destroy the charges. This particular piece of governmental anti-unionism cost the U.S. taxpayers $30,000.

The commanding officer of the Panama Canal Zone got rid of two complaining government workers (one of whom was president of his union local) for committing the grievous crimes of writing a letter to the editor of the local newspaper and circulating a round-robin letter protesting police conditions. The U.S. Civil Service Commission upheld the firings, so the workers have had to take their case to the U.S. Supreme Court as a free-speech issue.

Most government workers belong to no union and most have no money to fight in the courts, so if the Civil Service Commission chooses to abuse them, there is little they can do about it. Typical of their ranks is Bruce Argon, an electronics specialist who was hired by NASA a couple of years ago after an exemplary dozen years in private industry. He did all right with NASA until one day he suggested to his boss that it might be just as well if he, the boss, came in a little more sober. After that, everything turned sour.

A couple of months later he was fired for having "falsified" his original job application. Going over his record with a currycomb, civil service investigators had found an omission covering four months in his work career. He had spent the time with a company that later went bankrupt.

That was not the end of his former boss's revenge. Argon, a year after being discharged by NASA, is still unemployed. All doors are closed to him in private electronics industry, which wants nothing to do with an employee who offended the contract givers at NASA. What is the full report in his files which seemingly has destroyed his career? NASA will not tell him; his files are closed to him; he is not permitted to face his shadowy accusers and rebut their accusations.

The U.S. Civil Service can survive a reputation for bullying and abusive insistence upon conformity. But it is doubtful that it could survive the demolition of its basic myth, which is that one rises through the ranks solely by competition and demonstrated merit. Pamphlet No. 5, issued by the USCS to prospective college applicants, makes the typical claim: "Most federal jobs are under civil service, and that means that they are filled through competitive examination and that employment and advancement are on the basis of merit. Appointments are made from among the people who receive the highest passing marks. This is the democratic way of choosing employees."

This may or may not be the democratic way, but it is not the way of the USCS. For the most part, only clerical, secretarial and manual workers are hired through competitive examinations. The blue-collar jobs, the routine office jobs—these are filled competitively. It is true that numerically they make up the bulk of government employment, but they are not the jobs that shape the character of government service.

Anything resembling a "professional" job is not filled via a competitive examination. Any good job in government can be had by manipulating the right credentials and the boss's whim. The USCS admits that 14 per cent of the jobs are filled on a noncompetitive basis, and while the percentage is probably much higher, even that comes to 340,000 jobs—the cream positions.

The Civil Service Commission claims that patronage scarcely touches its hem, but it is an empty boast. President Johnson or his chief patronage muscle man, Marvin Watson, personally interview candidates for the highest civil service jobs (about 1,000 positions in grades GS-17 and GS-18) and they are slowly beginning to work down into the GS-16s and GS-15s (another 16,000 positions).

Merit promotions are part of the legend that is slow to die. Most professionals under USCS will tell you that positions in the top eight ranks are customarily filled on the basis of personal friendship or patronage. There is a promotional board in each agency or division, and when it is confronted with three or four applicants qualified for a promotion, the board can be expected to pick one who will most closely collaborate with the Establishment; the one who will "fit in," not the fellow who has different ideas and may be a bit argumentative about them.

The system does not work well. It leaves a deep residue of bitterness. While the quit rate for government work is 8.5 per cent, the retirement rate is 22 per cent; for many talented professionals—stuck for years at the same rating while they watch the boss's favorites climb the ladder—take a pension at the first opportunity.

This is especially true of civilians who work with the Pentagon agencies where the top positions are, through the "buddy" system, often held open for retiring officers who shuck their uniforms, wait the required six months, and then come in the back door wearing civilian clothes to sit again at their old desk—but at a 50 to 100 per cent pay raise (combining their civilian pay with their military pension). One labor union's estimate is that 200,000 retired officers are now in government work, drawing two checks and crowding out the promotional chances of the career civilians.

Here and there the curtain of bureaucracy is pushed back to permit the entry of more individual freedom. AFGE attorney Elmer Neumann has forced one agency actually to write into its regulations that an employee on trial is innocent until proved guilty—a belief not yet widespread in the USCS. A U. S. appeals court ruled recently that an Oregon postal worker was not violating the Hatch Act when he spoke to a meeting of a county Democratic Central Committee. Previously, although Postmaster General Lawrence O'Brien could serve as the Democrat's No. 1 ward heeler on behalf of the President, the lowly letter carriers had to act politically deaf and dumb.

And Civil Service Commissioner Macy has promised—after reams of unfavorable publicity—to cut down on the number of questionnaires in which workers are repeatedly asked to state whether or not they are content with their sex life. One of the more civilized improvements was Macy's recent order that applicants are no longer required to list arrests for minor crimes committed before their 21st birthday (it used to be that all arrests after 16th birthday, whether charges were dismissed or not, had to be listed on the job application). At the same time he announced a policy of hiring "good-risk" former offenders. No, the U. S. Civil Service is not without hope; it is only thickly crusted with the inhumanity of big bureaucracy.

And to cope with that, outside scrubbing will be necessary. This may come with Senator Ervin's "Bill of Rights" legislation, which will, among other things:

Forbid asking any employee or applicant his race or religion.

Forbid the "indoctrination" of employees about any matter not related to their jobs.

Forbid any agency from requiring workers to take a psychological or polygraph test to get information about their private lives or sexual habits.

Forbid grilling a worker about suspected misconduct unless he has a lawyer at hand.

Forbid pressuring workers to buy U.S. Bonds or make charitable contributions.

Changes such as these would go a long way toward making a government job what it is—a job, and not a commitment. But these are not bread-and-butter reforms. Union men believe that while the USCS is being shaken up, it should also be forced to establish safeguards against what one AFGE lawyer called the "present murky labyrinth of administrative laissez faire." At present the agency that wants to fire an employee holds all the aces: it has the records, the witnesses, the lawyers, the exhibits. The agency makes the charges, prosecutes them, hears them, judges them.

The unions—and a great many nonunion workers as well—want a "public defender" for such affairs, a lawyer not beholden to the agency or to the USCS. They want a panel on the order of those appointed by the National Labor Relations Board to hear and judge the case. They want faster and surer appeals; more open files and more chance to face their accusers.

In short, a great many government workers are beginning—in the very decorous way that one must expect from government workers—to rebel. And if they continue to do so, the result is likely to be the greatest cleansing agent introduced into Washington since the British torch.

ON LOCATION IN ROSTOV

FILMING THE NEW REVOLUTION

DESMOND SMITH

Mr. Smith spent five weeks in Russia last fall as writer, director and producer of Ivan Ivanovich, a filmed portrait of a Soviet family living in Rostov-on-Don. The documentary is being shown on the A.B.C. television network on February 27.

I had arrived from Saigon the night before. At 9:30 in the morning, George Watson, A.B.C.'s Moscow correspondent, telephoned me at the Hotel National to say that if I would join him in the lobby, we could get on over to Novosti, the Soviet News Agency, and meet the officials responsible for making the arrangements for our film production. Since Watson had not arrived when I got downstairs, I walked into the Intourist office. Half-hidden by a group of wildly excited ladies, each wearing a kind of convention pin that read HADASSAH and the name of the wearer hand-inked, a very tall woman with blue hair was trying to establish order.

"Ladies! Ladies!" she shouted, "has anyone seen Mrs. Shapiro today?"

A sunburned matron ventured that she might be at the Central Synagogue. "She said so. She said she was going to distribute matzohs."

During this exchange, an Intourist guide was addressing a German tour group about the wonders of the Kremlin, a Japanese workers' delegation was attempting to confirm reservations to Tokyo, three very solemn-looking Hungarians at the currency-exchange counter were arguing about the price in zlotys of a gold medallion of Lenin, and a pretty young Intourist official was running around pleading: "Please do not smoke because we have no ventilation." Whether Mrs. Shapiro ever returned from the Central Synagogue I shall never know. At that moment Watson arrived.

Novosti headquarters is a modern concrete and glass building located just behind the Pushkin monument and the new "Russia," a super wide-screen movie house, in midtown Moscow. A display window on either side of the entrance was filled with blowups of Soviet parachute-club activities. Inside, we were greeted by Vadim Yakkovleff, our A.B.C. Moscow interpreter, who led us upstairs to the office of Vladimir Angarski, the Novosti official chiefly responsible for our production.

The film, Ivan Ivanovich, was based on an idea of Thomas H. Wolf, vice president in charge of documentaries at A.B.C. Wolf had talked to me earlier in the year about making an objective report about life for an ordinary Soviet family in the Kosygin era. Then, after a trip to Vietnam, he had flown to Moscow and patiently negotiated an agreement with Novosti. One interesting point in this agreement was the choice of a city other than Moscow for the filming. The location was to be Rostov-on-Don, a city about the size of Milwaukee, 900 miles south of the Soviet capital.

Before production could start we had to provide Novosti with a shooting outline. So a few days later, Angarski, Watson, Yakkovleff and I flew down to Rostov. We were met by trade union officials from the giant Rostselmash (Rostov Farm Machinery) factory, the biggest combine-harvester plant in the Soviet Union. Novosti had asked Rostselmash to propose several families. Watson and I to make the final selection. By the end of the week we had settled on the Maltsevs, who lived in a four-and-a-half-room apartment at 51 Kazakhsava Street, a housing project owned by the factory. Both Vladimir and his wife Anya worked for Rostselmash. They had two children. Natasha aged 14, and Sascha, 11. For the rest of our preliminary visit, we examined locations where the picture would be shot; in the evenings I worked on the shooting outline.

We returned to Moscow, greeted our camera crew on its arrival via Air France and departed again from Vnukovo airport at mid-morning, in light drizzling rain. I would not have believed that any plane could be so crowded. We were sitting four abreast, on either side of a narrow aisle, with no leg room at all. At first I thought some passengers were actually standing; then, it turned out, they were just visiting friends up and down the cabin. John Gunther mentioned in Inside Russia the extraordinary informality of Soviet flights; it is still true. Watson and I thought it might be interesting to visit the flight deck. The gray uniformed stewardess simply said, "Pazhaloosta!"—please!—and we were escorted up forward.

In contrast to the passengers who were scrunched up in unbelievable discomfort, the crew had quarters that called to mind the bridge of an ocean liner. The flight deck was built on two levels. At the front, in a plexiglass nose, was the navigator. Above and behind him sat the pilot, co-pilot and flight engineer. In his own compartment the radio operator followed the plane's course by radar and short-wave transmitter. When we asked the captain how much he got paid a month, he replied with a smile, "two hundred rubles—plenty left over for vodka and sausage!" It is, by Soviet standards, an excellent salary, roughly twice that of a factory worker.

The landscape here, as we looked down, resembled an enormous gray-green Chinese tea tray. The great plain rolled on and on as far as the eye could see. There was no middle distance, no softening haze. Two hours later we skirted the Don River and put down at Rostov in bright warm sunshine.

Rostov-on-Don is a neat town. The tree-lined streets are literally as clean as a parlor floor, kept that way by squads of old ladies wielding hefty twig brooms. Moscow was as chilly as New York in November; Rostov had the warmth of New York in June. It looks like an old Culver Brothers photograph of Boston at the turn of the century. Like most river cities, it has a mood of languor with a contradictory note of bustle. Engels Street—the Main Street of Rostov—is crowded with people shopping or just promenading. Kiosks are abundant, selling cut flowers (25c a bunch), gifts (jewelry from East Germany, cut glass from the Ukraine). One notices that few dogs are to be seen. Our hotel, the Moskovskaya, fronts on Engels Street and has a view of the Gorky Park of Culture and Rest. Electricity seemed in short supply when we were there. The hotel foyer, with some forty lights in the ceiling, was almost always in darkness. On the other hand, the hotel had the best restaurant in town, and it is one of the few places in Russia where table service comes with a smile. In fact, I cannot think of another. At Moscow's Hotel National, generally recognized as the Soviet Union's leading hotel, it is by no means uncommon to wait an hour for a menu, and a dinner guest can expect to devote three hours to the meal. The Soviet press has recently been encouraging a courtesy campaign among restaurant workers. Perhaps it is not altogether the fault of the overburdened waiters and waitresses, but even in Russia, who blames the customer?

Only in one respect did our filming procedure differ from the customary method of unruffled chaos. Novosti insisted on overseeing every single foot of film we exposed. On the other hand, we never felt ourselves restricted by the supervision. All of our color film was sent out of the Soviet Union undeveloped, and time and again, Novosti people went out of their way to be helpful. Once we needed some special candles for a birthday-party sequence. "Impossible to find," somebody said. A few hours later, Galya, our bright young Novosti coordinator, presented me with a lumpy newspaper-wrapped parcel. It contained more than 100 coffee-colored candles, the length and thickness of spaghetti.

"Pazhaloosta!" Galya said. "I simply went and asked at the cathedral!"

The first scene we were going to shoot, No. 24, read:

LONG, MEDIUM, CLOSE-UPS: GORKY PARK

General shots of leisure activity, strolling, sitting, gossiping, reading, playing; by and large we should try to film this in a covert, candid manner.

As we moved across Engels Street and into Gorky Park our film unit reminded me of the moment in The Wizard of Oz when Dorothy leads the Tin Woodman, the Lion and the Scarecrow, in search of the Emerald City. The pursuit of reality in a television documentary is conducted by a similar cast. The entrance to the park was plastered with posters advertising the current movies—War and Peace, The Chairman (a satire on Soviet bureaucracy), Ashes and Diamonds. Above these stood a black granite statue of Lenin, pointing histrionically toward the sky.

Dispersing to the side of the footpath, we stalked forward in the direction of what looked like a mass ping-pong tournament. ONWARD TOWARD COMMUNISM! commanded a poster by the side of the path. Ralph Mayher, the cameraman, began to glance sideways at me, anticipating a suggestion that we begin filming.

Galya stepped forward, brown notebook in hand. "You want film here?" she said.

"Certainly. The action's good."

"Pazhaloosta!" Galya said.

A heap of Kodak color film was stacked in the shade. Under a birch tree sat Watson, with Vadim Yakkovleff, the interpreter; Boris and Ilya, two Moscow electricians hired through Novosti; Tanya the Intourist interpreter; Vladimir Angarski, the Novosti executive in charge of our team; Viktor, Watson's Moscow chauffeur, and John Digman, the sound engineer. All of them were vitally important in one way or another for the making of Ivan Ivanovich.

At about 8:30 on another morning, as we were waiting outside the Moskovskaya for our cars to arrive, a small crowd gathered around our two dozen or so cases of camera equipment, all of them marked with the A.B.C. initials. The bystanders gazed upon these and presently were roaring with laughter. Tania walked over to find out what the joke was.

"Very amusing," said Tania.

"Forgive me," I asked, "but what's so funny about a collection of black boxes?"

"Well you see, someone in that group has just spelled out the meaning of A.B.C."

"And . . . ?"

"Armenian Broadcasting Company!"

I learned then of Radio Armenianski, the mythical radio station that broadcasts all kinds of satiric comment on the Soviet way of life. There must be thousands of Radio Armenianski jokes; here is just one. A guest on a Radio Armenianski discussion program says: "I'm confused. In one political textbook I read that when communism arrives we shall have no money. But now in another textbook I read that we shall have money. Which book is right?" The discussion leader: "Both books are right. Under communism, some people will have money and some will not."

The Soviet Union today is, of course, neither "classless" nor Communist. You see that slogan, ONWARD TOWARD COMMUNISM! everywhere, yet nearly fifty years after the revolution, money continues to be the single most powerful incentive for Soviet man. The guaranteed minimum wage is now 60 rubles a month (the present exchange is 1.11 rubles to the dollar). A skilled worker like Vladimir Maltsev, whose life we were in Rostov to film, earns between 110 and 160 rubles a month. A shop assistant probably earns 80 rubles. A professor can make from 200 to 1,000 rubles, if you include royalties on his books. The best paid group in Russia today is composed of the concert artists, singers and instrumentalists, who earn between 500 and 3,000 rubles a month.

We spent several days filming Vladimir and Anya working at Rostselmash. Sprawled over several hundred acres, the factory reminded me of the giant aircraft plants on the West Coast. There was one difference: everywhere inside the building posters and banners urged the "try harder" spirit. Near a group of women who were welding brackets for the combine-harvesters was a huge portrait of Lenin and the slogan GLORY TO LABOR! Not far from Vladimir Maltsev's station was a caricature of Uncle Sam and the words COMRADES! WE ARE EXCEEDING AMERICA IN GROWTH AND OUTPUT!

The Soviet Union with only half the gross national product of its chief rival, is clearly determined to overtake America in industrial production. Slogans that appeal to patriotism and pride are only one weapon in this clawing fight to reach first place. Given the spur of Premier Kosygin's sweeping economic reforms, factories like Rostselmash are introducing a new item in their accounting—profitability. The head of Rostselmash will no longer have "fulfilled the plan" when he has reached an allotted level of gross output; he will also be expected to produce goods that are profitable in the market place. In the long run, this added consideration could turn the entire planning mechanism in new directions—and with it, the whole of Soviet life.

Between 1950 and 1965, according to the Joint Economic Committee of the United States Congress, Soviet per capita consumption jumped an astonishing 82 per cent. Under the Kosygin reforms, the 1966-70 Five Year Plan is expected to increase the consumer's share of the economy even faster. As it looks to the future, the Kosygin team sees a vast increase in consumer goods to provide much of the incentive to "try harder." At Rostselmash, when Vladimir Maltsev increases his output or comes up with a labor-saving idea, he earns a cash bonus. Last year, for example, he bought a television set. This year he and Anya are saving up for a washing machine. Next year they would like very much to buy their first automobile.

What is happening looks to me rather like the German "economic miracle" of the late 1940s—a kind of Communist "dash for freedom." Discussion of this possibility has often been limited in the United States by an unwillingness to accept the view that a new kind of Russia may be emerging; in the Soviet Union it is made difficult by the daily newspaper propaganda that the Russian consumer miracle has been going on for years. It has not; it has yet to begin.

To give some idea of how well Ivan Ivanovich is doing today, we spent a couple of days filming inside Rostov's biggest department store—ZUM.

A five-story, glass-faced structure, ZUM occupies a city block just off Engels Street and on the main bus routes. On the ground floor, which looks like a company store in a Kentucky mine town, you can get anything from underpants (made in the United Arab Republic) to a pungent perfume named "The North" (the bottle is a polar bear, sitting on an ice floe). There are plenty of cash registers on the premises but the wooden abacus is still the chief means of reckoning. The two things that continue to make shopping a tough chore for Russians is the unbelievable surliness of most sales help and the incredible complexity of a single sales purchase. When a housewife finds something she wants, she first waits in line to choose the item, then she waits in another line to pay for it, and finally she returns to the first line to turn in a sales check and pick up her package. Try that, say, for five items.

Considering that the average wage in the Soviet Union is approximately 100 rubles a month, prices seem terribly high. Here are a few ZUM prices I jotted down at random:

	Rubles
TV set	280
Lipstick	1.50
Chocolate bar	.78
Head scarf	5.50
Men's shoes	15-30

A junior clerk in ZUM told me the shoes she was wearing were Italian and had cost her 50 rubles. Since her monthly check was only 80 rubles, they had cost her almost three weeks' pay!

But figures of this sort invite comparison with typical American expenditures for goods and services, and a Russian's budget is quite different. Take the Maltsevs, as an example. Like most Soviet families both Vladimir and Anya work. Their apartment costs them just 11 rubles. Both their children go to free camps in summer. The Maltsevs pay only about 12 per cent of their joint earnings in income tax; their medical and dental care is free. On their combined income of 230 rubles a month, the Maltsevs appear to get along very well indeed.

After four weeks in Rostov-on-Don we had unspooled almost 30,000 feet of color film. The results include everything from the fun and laughter of Natasha Maltsev's 14th birthday party, to the insanity of trying to shop at ZUM; the head-splitting clamor in the hermetic world of the Rostselmash tractor factory; to a furiously competitive motorbike rally in the Don countryside. One of the most expensive shots in the film will last only a few seconds—a helicopter ride down the Don. On this we dropped 1,000 rubles. One of the least expensive sequences will be the workday in the Rostselmash tractor factory.

The total bill for three days of filming there was just 16 rubles—for electricity. Our hosts said nothing at all about the inevitable slowdown of a production line that spits out a giant harvester every three minutes. Generalizations are risky, but let me make just two. First, most Russians that we met were, I think, people of good will, generous, open-hearted, sincere in their protestations of friendship. Second, the Soviet Union is one of the most hierarchical societies I have ever seen. Even the visitor can sense the resentment of privilege, including the privilege of information. But, fortunately, the whole thrust of the volatile and rapidly shifting economy is working against the closed society. Mass air travel is already here. The automobile revolution is on its way, promising the kind of change the Tin Lizzie brought to America in the twenties, and certain to alter the antiquated internal passport system.

These are good days to visit the Soviet Union. Fifty years after the great October Revolution, it is fairly clear that a new revolution is taking place.

Natasha and Sascha Maltsev were lined up in the Moskovskaya's foyer when we came down for the farewell dinner party. Natasha wore two big white bows in her hair and Sascha had on his best gray suit. Vladimir Angarski and Galya, the Novosti officials, were chatting with Mr. and Mrs. Maltsev. Two great big tears were welling in each corner of Natasha's brown eyes. For a few seconds there was a profound silence.

"Don't be sad, Natasha," said someone, "we're going to be friends for always."

"Mir y druzbha—Peace and friendship!" said Ralph Mayher with a smile.

Sascha, as befits a grown-up 11-year-old boy, surveyed his sister's outburst with some distaste.

A few minutes later, farewells over, the children were taken home by Viktor, our Moscow chauffeur. All the same there was a lump in everyone's throat that remained long after the children were asleep that night.

But we had not finished the evening. We went through the Moskovskaya's restaurant where the orchestra was playing Hello Dolly, and walked to a private dining room, where a huge table seemed buried in food. There were bottles of vodka, Armenian brandy, Rostov champagne, Georgian mineral water, platters of cold meat and caviar, fish in aspic, lobster and square-shaped dishes filled with salad. Our Soviet friends quickly agreed that Vladimir Angarski should be the toastmaster. After about an hour of sustained eating and drinking, he banged the table with his fist, and announced that Vladimir Maltsev would make the first speech. I think it was around that time that George Watson and I were each presented with a chromium-plated hammer made in the Rostselmash workshops. Everyone made at least two speeches. At some point the Moskovskaya orchestra paraded around the table playing Ochee chornya. I was just asking the lady next to me what part of Russia she came from when Angarski banged the table once again. He raised his vodka glass and said, "John," turning toward our owl-eyed sound engineer from Los Angeles. John Dignan shot his cuffs and uncertainly got to his feet. "It's been quite an experience . . ." he began.

The Russians gazed at him with what I thought was tremendous sobriety.

John flapped his enormous eyelids. "Baby," he said, gazing at no one in particular, "Mir y druzbha!" There was a buzz of approval. "He's a real good sort, that one," said the lady next to me. The last thing I honestly remember was Watson resolutely attacking a cube of what appeared to be colored plexiglass on his gold-rimmed plate. "That is Zander in Aspic," said Vadim Yakkovleff. "It's a special kind of fish—very good."

"Thanks, Vadim," I said after a long pause. "Have another drink."

The next day we were back in Moscow.

CALIFORNIA REVOLUTION 5

CONSERVATION COMES OF AGE

SCOTT THURBER

Mr. Thurber is on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle.

San Francisco

"To become a conservationist in California," a leader in the field remarked recently with blunt accuracy, "all you have to do is look around you." Since the mid-1940s, California has been disfiguring itself to accommodate the incoming hordes. Today the Californian can still see much of the rare natural beauty that attracted him to the state in the first place, but he also sees the instruments of its destruction hard at work. Chain saws are felling the forests, bulldozers are decapitating hilltops and filling valleys in the path of broad concrete freeways, and the orchards and fields are giving way to endless rows of die-stamped tract houses, the slums of the future. Smog infests the air, and the streams and roadsides are polluted with the rubbish of a no-deposit, no-return civilization.

The conservationist has traditionally been something of an eccentric—shouting alarms, putting out brush fires. But today there is a difference: he is being heard—and attended. His ranks are swelling; he has, indeed, become respected. More important, he has become effective, and nowhere is this change more apparent than in California, a clearly threatened last frontier of outstanding natural environment.

"We Americans have never been at peace with our environment," the noted architect and conservationist, Nathaniel Owings, remarked recently. "We've always believed in an endless wilderness. If we cut one forest and built a town, there was always another forest just over the hill. In planning we've never treated our environment as an equal."

The fact that our wilderness is not endless, that in fact we are coming to the end of it, has in recent years become a matter of mounting concern to a steadily increasing number of Californians. The growth of California's conservation movement has been dramatically evident since about 1947, when a restless postwar population began pushing into the state. Today—with an estimated 1,500 newcomers arriving in the state daily—it is at its peak thus far in numbers, diversity and accomplishments.

Ad hoc organizations are formed in response to specific situations. One of these fought to block an Atomic Energy Commission power line projected to run through the scenic San Francisco Peninsula community of Woodside, and had to settle for a "compromise" that was largely a loss; another kept Pacific Gas and Electric Company from building a nuclear power plant on Bodega Head on the rugged northern coast. At the same time, permanent, single-purpose organizations have proliferated. Some of them are state-wide, like the California Roadside Council; some are regional, like the Committee for Green Foothills or the League to Save Lake Tahoe, and some are small, local and terribly specialized. There are also the big, long-established conservation organizations—the Save-the-Redwoods League and the Sierra Club—both founded and based in California, but both with nation-wide memberships and influence.

The individual and sometimes collective energy of all these organizations—big, small, permanent and one shot—of late has yielded some heartening results. A few examples:

¶ California voters in 1964 approved a bond issue of $150 million for park purchase and development; $85 million was earmarked—and is now being spent—to buy and preserve new parklands, something like 265,000 acres in all.

¶ Conservationists have beaten back an attempt by the highway engineers to bulldoze a freeway through a choice part of northern California's virgin redwood forest.

¶ The state is setting out to create the first portions of what ultimately would be a 4,000-mile system of parkways—low-speed, pleasure-driving roadways through elongated parks. The antithesis of freeways.

¶ An official state commission has been created to stop the filling of San Francisco Bay and to study all aspects of its permanent preservation.

¶ The voters have created a special sort of "green-belt" zoning that will protect a farmland owner from spiraling tax assessments if he agrees to keep the land open and undeveloped for a specified period of years. [See "The Soil Beneath the Blacktop" by Richard G. Lillard, The Nation, February 13.]

¶ Pacific Gas and Electric, which learned some sobering truths about conservation and public opinion in the Bodega Head battle, has started seeking the advice of conservationists before planning new plants.

And there has been still another development which might be said to reflect the growing political maturity of the state's conservation groups: they have banded together to hammer out a wide-ranging legislative program, and hired a lobbyist to work for its enactment in Sacramento.

Nothing better illustrates the growth, scope and vigor of the California conservation movement than the Sierra Club, probably the largest and most effective conservation force in the country, and certainly the best known. The Sierra Club is something of an elder statesman of conservation. It was founded some seventy-five years ago by the naturalist John Muir. From the outset it was an organization to preserve outstanding samples of our environment. One of Muir's (and the club's) signal achievements was the preservation of California's magnificent Yosemite Valley. Yet in Muir's time and into ours the club has been best known for its expeditions which took members—hikers, campers, back packers and the like—into Muir's beloved Sierra and other wilderness regions. In 1947, the club had a large number of hikers, a small staff, about 4,000 members, and an annual budget of about $100,000.

The Sierra Club still has a lot of hikers—including those who trek into the Sierra each year to haul out the incredible array of refuse left behind by despoiling vacationists. But the club's principal concern, its major activity as an organization, has become the conservation of natural beauty. Currently, it has 47,000 members, and an annual budget of almost $2 million. Those figures are on the scale of a respectably large corporation, and the club is in corporation-type trouble with Washington.

The person most responsible for what the Sierra Club is today—for the stands it takes, its public image, the attention it gets and, indeed, its current fight with the Internal Revenue Service—is David Brower, the organization's $18,000-a-year executive director. An expert mountaineer and a veteran of the Army's 10th Mountain Division, Brower is immensely well informed and possessed of an unswerving dedication to the causes in which he believes. He is also something of a rarity: a zealot with a sense of humor. Even his enemies—and these currently must include many dam builders and tree cutters in government as well as industry—regard him with a respect tinged with awe.

Brower, of course, doesn't run the club by himself. He recommends policies with a knowledgeable persuasiveness, but the policies are set by a board of directors that has impressive credentials of its own. It currently includes the celebrated naturalist-photographer Ansel Adams; Dr. William Siri, a University of California biophysicist and expert mountaineer who was deputy chief of the United States team which scaled Mount Everest in 1963; Dr. Edgar Wayburn, prominent internist, Medical Society activist, political conservative and conservation liberal who for years has been in the vanguard of the club's major battles.

The club went into the book-publishing field a few years ago, and its program has been rewarding. The volumes in the "Exhibit Format Series" are beautifully designed and printed, combining breath-taking photography with evocative texts. They are expensive ($17.50; $25) and the profit from their sale has become a major source of finances for the club's conservation program. Above all, the books tell the story of conservation—and tell it well. The moods range from the quiet persuasiveness of This Is the American Earth to the more urgent tone of The Last Redwoods and Time and the River Flowing: Grand Canyon, which show what's at stake in the club's two biggest current battles.

Dave Brower's first major triumph for the Sierra Club was the successful campaign to save Dinosaur National Monument from inundation behind a Bureau of Reclamation power dam in Echo Park. That battle bore a striking similarity to the club's present campaign to save the Grand Canyon—a campaign which is still far from won.

Two dams are proposed—one upstream from Grand Canyon National Park and one downstream from the National Monument, but both within the canyon proper. Again, power is involved—and, of course, the Bureau of Reclamation. The dams would be built as part of the Central Arizona Project—a plan that is politically sensitive because it involves a long-sought water-sharing agreement among the Colorado River Basin states. The Sierra Club contends that the proposed dams—at Marble Gorge and Bridge Canyon—would forever destroy the Colorado as "a living river"—and that they are wholly unnecessary because they wouldn't conserve a drop of water. They would, instead, simply be "cash registers"—producing salable hydroelectric power.

The dams are a threat to more than the ancient majesty of the Grand Canyon. As Brower puts it: "What is at stake is the entire conservation movement, and a brilliant national park system. If Grand Canyon can be destroyed, then no parks, wilderness or wild rivers can be considered safe."

The club said all that, and more, in the now historic full-page advertisements it published in The Washington Post and The New York Times on June 9, 1966. Less than twenty-four hours after their appearance, the club was informed that the Internal Revenue Service had started an investigation to determine whether it should lose its tax-deductible status because it was spending a "substantial part" of its income on "influencing legislation." Nearly six months later—after a period of uncertainty which cost the club an estimated $125,000 in withheld contributions—the IRS decreed, in a tentative ruling, that the club is no longer eligible to receive "deductible charitable contributions." The key words "substantial" and "influence" are nowhere defined.

The club spent $10,000 on the ads that provoked IRS' Instant Wrath (seldom in history has a federal bureaucracy reacted with such cobra-like speed). Many other tax-deductible organizations, which lobby blatantly and on a much grander scale, have been left untouched by the IRS. The Central Arizona Project Association, for instance, spent $74,065.02 in 1965 to advocate the dams the club opposes. The association's tax-deductible status remains in force.

Permanent loss of its tax-deductible status would hurt but not cripple the club's conservation program. It would impede the flow of big cash gifts and bequests—it's fashionable to mention conservation groups in your will these days—but the club has other resources: dues, fees for outings, book sales, to keep it going. Incidentally, the effect of the IRS battle hasn't been all bad: when the investigation was first announced, the club had 38,000 members; today it has more than 47,000.

The Sierra Club is skirmishing on many fronts. It is concerned for the future of the Florida Everglades, Storm King Mountain on the Hudson, and the forests of the Oregon Cascades. In its home state, it vigorously pursues causes, large and small. Its San Francisco Bay chapter is in the forefront of a move to forestall a major commercial development in the middle of the Bolinas Lagoon, a significant wildlife sanctuary on the Marin County coastline north of San Francisco. On a larger scale, the club is working to create a Redwood National Park on Redwood Creek in Humboldt County—"the last opportunity for a real Redwood National Park." (The Administration, in the 89th Congress, backed a hastily prepared proposal for a smaller park on Mill Creek in Del Norte County—an area the club contends has been heavily logged over. Almost all major conservation groups backed the club's proposal at hearings held in 1966.)

Last year, the club's directors took an unprecedented stand: they endorsed the site of a proposed PG&E nuclear power plant on the San Luis Obispo County coastline.

This provoked an internal fight which still continues. The recommended site at Diablo Canyon was backed by the directors — however reluctantly and conditionally — as preferable to the utility's first choice of Nipomo Dunes in the same county, a spectacular and unspoiled area the club has long fought to preserve as a state park. The majority view of the board of directors is that it was either Diablo Canyon or Nipomo Dunes—and that the club can't simply oppose but must offer intelligent cooperation in matters like this. The dissidents argue that it wasn't an either-or situation, that the utility had other alternatives, and that Diablo Canyon is well worth saving on its own merits. Since the directors have refused to back down, their decision will now be subjected to a membership referendum, first of its kind in the club's history.

One of the admitted shortcomings of the California conservation movement in the past has been its disorganized concentration on, to a large degree, defensive warfare: reacting to provocation, rushing here and there in defense of something threatened—be it Bolinas Lagoon, San Francisco Bay or a pristine redwood grove. A major and coordinated attempt at a systematic new approach to the preservation of the environment is now beginning in California, and some conservationists regard it as the most significant development in many years. The groups—large and small—have banded together into a special-purpose organization, the Planning and Conservation League, that also includes such related interests as the state-wide organizations of architects, landscape architects and designers. Its single purpose: effective legislation in the conservation field.

At a recent daylong seminar in Berkeley, the new league hammered out a coordinated program of proposed legislation, ranging from a law to ban smog-producing vehicles from the state's highways by 1980 to a law that would flatly forbid highway engineers from invading parklands without the unlikely advance consent of the State Park Commission. The Planning and Conservation League will press its legislative goals in Sacramento through the office of a full-time professional lobbyist.

Nothing exactly like this has ever been done before in California conservation, and many regard the effort as long overdue. "At last," a leader in the group reflected recently, "we are making the transition from little old lady in tennis shoes to effective political activist."

RAILROAD HYPOCRISY

THE NUISANCE OF PASSENGERS

WILLIAM R. WRIGHT

Mr. Wright has spent fifteen years in the rail passenger field; he works for a "forward-looking" line.

The traveling public is fed a diet of woeful tales about the railroad's "passenger problem." The overt manifestations of this "problem" are late, slow and dirty trains, and constantly shrinking service. But is the problem real, or has it been fabricated?

Take the case of the "Phoebe Snow," recently approved for discontinuance. That "problem" was "solved" only after the Erie-Lackawanna had taken four steps to lose passengers and increase costs. First, the E.-L. added two hours to the running time between the New York area and Buffalo, a key point. This reduced the diesel-powered streamliner to a 1920s' steam-train schedule, and delayed the Buffalo arrival from supertime to 8 P.M. This latter detail would not have been so bad if the management, in its infinitesimal wisdom, had not decreed that the Buffalo section should separate from the main train and the diner in mid-afternoon, making for hungry passengers.

For step two, the line abandoned its convenient station at the foot of Main Street in Buffalo, and replaced it with a tin shanty in the East Buffalo freight yards. Step three was the game called "lying with statistics." Instead of cutting off the Buffalo section at Hornell, N.Y., where the Buffalo branch began, the train was split at Elmira, N.Y. This meant that the two sections chased each other for 58.5 miles each way, adding approximately $351 per day, or $128,115 per year, of unnecessary expense.

When all else failed, the Erie-Lackawanna went to the New York Public Utilities Commission and got permission to remove the Buffalo branch connection altogether. (Technically, these trains were an intrastate operation and the E.-L. could by-pass the Interstate Commerce Commission.) Deprived by this final step of her prime Buffalo-to-New York revenue, "Phoebe Snow" bled to death, a victim of her owner's murderous tactics.

Recently the New York Central, in a double-barreled announcement, unveiled a train capable of a 183-mile-per-hour operation, and at the same time announced the termination of all their through trains, including the famed "Twentieth Century Limited." As exciting as 183-mph trains may be, the clinkers in the plan are all too evident.

The high-speed trains are to operate over 200-mile segments of the line, which means that a passenger from New York to Cleveland will have to change three times. It was hinted that trains would operate only every three hours. The segments would be too long to compete with the airplane and too short to compete with the private car, and a nagging question lingered as to whether these segments would even connect. The New York Central management has yet to extend itself to build passenger business, and the high-speed train appears to many in the passenger end of railroading as a smoke screen to cover the removal of all the Central's through trains.

Elsewhere in the New York City area, the Pennsylvania wonders where the passengers went on their New York-to-Washington run. Of course the fact that the once hourly service and the Philadelphia "Clockers" have disappeared, plus the fact that the fare is more than $2 higher than the bus fare seems not to impress the Pennsy's management. Railroads are the only means of transportation whose costs do not rise in direct proportion to their volume, a factor which could make them very competitive on a high-density run like New York to Washington. Perhaps the Northeast Corridor high-speed service, a Department of Commerce experiment, will bring back some patrons, but if the price is not right, the results will not be astonishing.

In other parts of the U.S., the Southern and the Southern Pacific have embarked on campaigns to drop trains and frustrate passengers. For instance, at Chattanooga, the Southern's Memphis connection leaves ten minutes before the train from New York arrives. The other train to Memphis arrives from the North at 2 A.M., hardly conducive to passenger travel. The remnant of the "Kansas City-Florida Special" now ends at Valdosta, Ga., in the middle of the night.

The Southern Pacific has taken even stronger steps. The line, which derives much of its revenue from tourism, took itself out of the Rail Travel Promotion Agency, the organization which pays commissions to travel agents on rail tickets. An effective way to kill business is to alienate the travel agents. This past summer, Southern Pacific also failed to announce until June that it would run the daily tour train "Shasta Daylight," a move which undoubtedly cut the train loadings.

Perhaps the most "public be damned" move of all is the case of the hidden train. Southern Pacific operates trains 39 and 40 between Los Angeles and Tucumcari, N.M., where they connect with the Rock Island Line. But for several years Southern Pacific has refused to show these trains on their timetables. In spite of this, a good many people have taken the trouble to consult the Rock Island schedule so that they can ride a Southern Pacific train, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has ordered the Southern Pacific to continue the service (which is still not shown in the schedule).

It is rare, though, that the commission is willing or able to see through this type of subterfuge. The ICC maintains an "Alice in Wonderland" accounting system under which it is impossible to show a profit on passenger trains. Everything, including many expenses which would continue if no passenger trains ran, is charged in part to the passenger operation under this "system."

Many railroads use the far more realistic "above the rail" cost (where the expense of running trains and selling tickets is deducted from the revenue) and show a profit on their trains. Ironically, the roads that use the ICC formula for passenger trains insist that "above the rail" costs be the sole guide when they set freight rates. They want the freight business and so are realistic about these figures.

If the railroads made the same honest effort to increase their passenger business that they make to build freight traffic, the so-called "passenger problem" would disappear. The answer needn't be new equipment—just competitive pricing, publicly acceptable schedules, good connections and a managerial policy that produces good employee morale and salesmanship. Passenger train service in America is being destroyed by antagonistic management policy.

LETTERS (continued from page 258)

cooperation of the AFL and the CIO in the wartime programs of the OIAA.

I did not intend, in the context of the article, to hold Mr. Herling responsible for the subsequent activities of the AFL or CIO after the war but merely to indicate that certain labor ties with the government derived in part from the wartime connection.

Henry W. Berger

doctor in Spain

New York City

DEAR SIR: February marks the thirtieth anniversary since Dr. Edward K. Barsky crossed the Pyrenees into Spain to direct the program of medical aid for the men of the International Brigades.

Like the volunteers he went to serve, this great surgeon, through action, leadership and extraordinary courage, has come to symbolize the will and conscience of all who strive for peace and human dignity.

A dinner in tribute to Dr. Barsky will be held Friday evening, Feb. 24, in the Imperial Ballroom of the Americana Hotel, the proceeds to go to the defense of civil rights, civil liberties and military draft cases, and to youth groups involved in those areas.

For additional information and reservations, telephone EN 2-5727.

Stanley Faulkner (for the Sponsors)

tax for peace

DEAR SIR: Your readers should know about a plan which is an alternative to tax refusal. Those who can and will refuse taxes earn our respect and our blessing. But the fact remains that in most cases the government will get the taxes from the taxpayer plus penalties, and the money will go for the nefarious purpose for which it is wanted.

Under this alternative plan, we tax ourselves an equal amount for works of peace (peace organizations, civil rights and other constructive groups), as the American Government is taxing us for works of war. . . .

Sixty per cent of your income tax goes to pay for wars, past, present and future. Under this plan you make a commitment of an equal amount for works of peace which you believe will bring mankind closer to a world in which there can be no Vietnamese War. Whatever your income, this must involve personal sacrifice and this may be the best aspect of the program. Americans owe their prosperity, directly or indirectly, to the war system. When enough Americans are ready to put themselves on the line, body and spirit, the balance may begin to shift. If more information about people now using this plan is desired, I shall be happy to supply it.

Beatrice Miller

833 North Waterloo St., Los Angeles, Calif. 90026

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Masses: Working-Class Dreams

ECHOES OF REVOLT: The Masses 1911-1917. Edited by William L. O'Neill. Introduction by Irving Howe. Afterword by Max Eastman. Quadrangle Books. 303 pp. $12.95.

MICHAEL B. FOLSOM

Mr. Folsom is a graduate student at the University of California, doing research into the cultural history of the American Left.

In its time, The Masses published the bravest—and much of the best—art, literature and politics in America. After Max Eastman took over editorship of Piet Vlag's "yellow" Socialist paper in the autumn of 1912, until Woodrow Wilson killed it in the autumn of 1917, The Masses lived up to the famous manifesto which flew from its masthead:

A REVOLUTIONARY AND NOT A REFORM MAGAZINE: A MAGAZINE WITH NO DIVIDENDS TO PAY: A FREE MAGAZINE: FRANK, ARROGANT, IMPERTINENT, SEARCHING FOR THE TRUE CAUSES: A MAGAZINE DIRECTED AGAINST RIGIDITY AND DOGMA WHEREVER IT IS FOUND: PRINTING WHAT IS TOO NAKED OR TRUE FOR A MONEYMAKING PRESS: A MAGAZINE WHOSE FINAL POLICY IS TO DO AS IT PLEASES AND CONCILIATE NOBODY, NOT EVEN ITS READERS—THERE IS ROOM FOR THIS PUBLICATION IN AMERICA.

Under that banner, Eastman was joined by Floyd Dell, John Reed, Carl Sandburg, John Sloan, Louis Untermeyer, Stuart Davis, Art Young, Sherwood Anderson, Dorothy Day, William English Walling, Mike Gold (then Irwin Granich), Mary Heaton Vorse, George Bellows and many other regular contributors. These were supported on occasion by Amy Lowell, Picasso, Randolph Bourne, William Rose Benét, Joel Spingarn, Joseph Warren Beach, Wilbur Daniel Steele, Ernest Poole, William Carlos Williams. Irving Howe observes that "The Masses became the rallying center—as sometimes a combination of circus, nursery, and boxing ring—for almost everything that was then alive and irreverent in American culture."

The format was Life-size, and often a double-page spread would be lavished on a single drawing. The nation's best cartoonists, Art Young, Robert Minor and Boardman Robinson, came to the magazine. The Masses became the public gallery of the Ash Can School, filling its pages with a graphic record of the urban poor. Its poetry and fiction were less consistently good than the art, though often as brave and gay.

But fundamentally it was politics that made The Masses great. The magazine attacked the institutions of capitalist America at home and of imperialist America abroad, and it defied the values, morals and taste which buttressed those institutions. Its vision of creating a Socialist world was clearly, intelligently and humanely articulated. Its art and high-jinks came mainly from Greenwich Village, its politics from mine and mill and from the several sections of the organized Left. Unlike so many later independent radical publications, The Masses did not cry plague on all houses; rather, it drew strength from the Socialist Party and the I.W.W., from the anarchists and Bohemians alike. It mediated, looking askance at friends as well as enemies. For a few years, The Masses managed to ride herd on all the forces of rebellion in America, not neglecting to break into internecine polemics when differences became desperate. In its last years, with the Left hopelessly divided by the war, The Masses thrived as one of the most vigorous opponents of war and of patriot Socialists, among whom were some of its ex-editors.

Imagine a contemporary magazine combining in some measure Life's visual appeal and popular approach, the urbanity of The New York Review, the acid impolitesse of The Realist; standing somewhere between the Communist and Progressive Labor Parties; its heart with SNCC in the South; its reporters in Watts, Berkeley and Lowndes County, and with the agricultural unions and the National Liberation Front; its readership much like The Nation's, but twice the size; and its contributors among the best artists and writers in the land. Such a wonder The Masses was.

Now, almost fifty years after the federal government destroyed the magazine for its opposition to a stupid war, The Masses lives again in William O'Neill's anthology. However, this new incarnation lacks the old bravado.

Echoes of Revolt is a handsome volume. It is formidable, an eyeful and an education. The content of this ample anthology is in most particulars adequately representative of the magazine's best work. Its lush illustration suggests the magazine's artistic gift. There are enough of the right materials here rightly to know and to judge The Masses' meaning. But the collective efforts of the volume's editor, introducer and afterword monger to interpret that meaning have made this seem a comfortable book, smug and complacent—not by bowdleri-

There is a philosophy which disposes of revolutionists more completely than any other. It disposes of them, not by hating them or by ignoring them, but by accepting them as interesting.

Floyd Dell, in The Masses
February, 1914

zation but by asking us to view one of the finest cultural achievements of American revolutionary socialism as the object of trivial nostalgia.

William O'Neill's introductory notes are factual, colorless, and often very useful. His response to The Masses is warm. He appreciates its bumptious joie de vivre, its unique record of the spirit of the times, its role "as an agency in the first stirrings of the revolution in Morals," and its exemplary union of art and politics. But O'Neill does not consider The Masses' politics relevant to our world, our problems. He credits the editors themselves with high seriousness in their concern for social problems. He justly points out the romantic aspect of their revolutionary ideals, the facile optimism which helped inform their general gaiety. But he concludes that their socialism was merely utopian, owing more to William Morris and H. G. Wells than to Marx. The Masses, he says, "wanted all men to be free of the crushing drabness and insecurities of industrial society." But The Masses was much more explicit. It wrote again and again of its desire to free all men of the crushing exploitation of capitalist industry and the insecurities of olive drab. It died welcoming in the Soviets.

Having argued that The Masses' politics was not the tough Marxian sort which has caused so much nastiness in the world during the subsequent fifty years, O'Neill goes on to explain that "the dynamic elements within the ranks of organized capital" (which The Masses failed to appreciate) have rendered The Masses' Socialist politics irrelevant. Its editors "were betrayed . . . by History which destroyed their frame of reference and made the objects of their concern seem fanciful and unreal."

The subjects of The Masses' concern may be dated, but not the fundamental object: to build a world without wars, owned and run by its people. If there is any Masses "tradition," it has lived in the dogged persistence of that hope in spite of our "affluence" and in spite of the persistent efforts of our government to stamp it out. Recently, Stokely Carmichael reiterated this in explanation of the aims of SNCC: "The society we hope to build among black people . . . is not a capitalist one. It is a society in which the spirit of community and humanistic love prevail." And what have the masses of this world been doing for the past fifty years, while capital dynamically reorganized itself again and again, retrenching to face crisis after crisis, but make history by betraying the dreams of several empires and by destroying the imperialist frame of reference?

The failure to insist upon or to see the persistent relevance of The Masses' critique of American society might be tolerable if it were consistent—if it were simply a matter of letting the magazine speak for itself. But O'Neill does consider one aspect of The Masses' deviltry and rebellion now even more relevant and disturbing: its "hugely irreverent, not to say sacrilegious, treatment of religion." After a discussion of the current "religious revival," he decides that "there is now less room in America for the straightforward anti-clericalism which the magazine served up." This opinion leads to the most obvious omissions from the anthology: Eastman's sermon on the text, "The Church is Judas"; Eugene Wood's chortling Biblical travesties; Charles Erskine Scott Wood's "Heavenly Discourses," which The Masses was first to publish. Missing is almost everything gaily irreverent or possibly blasphemous.

The one work in all The Masses' career to cause the greatest flap was "A Ballad" by one William Williams—some simple, poignant dialect verse on the paternal sorrows of Joseph the Nazarene. It is sophomoric blasphemy and facile verse, but amusing and humane, and Samson ne'er smote the Philistines more squarely. Pulpits thundered against The Masses. Many pious readers, among them G.B. Shaw, wrote in outrage. Eastman worked up a lengthy reply, "On Reverence," defending the magazine's view of religion.

PARTING

"We met in error. If too close,
 Regrets. And I'm away.
 Yesterday was easy come;
 Easy go, today.
 Forget the way we burned, we two,
 That pain on either part.
 Forget we fell convulsed as one."
 Said knifeblade to the heart.

JOHN FREDERICK NIMS

The Masses' "final policy" was "to conciliate nobody, not even its readers." Pious readers of this anthology will not be offended, for it does not include Williams' poem.

Nostalgia and innocence are the key terms in the vocabulary of explanations which attend this collection of antique radicaliana. Irving Howe's introduction first appeared in Book Week last spring as "The Force of Innocence." Howe speaks as a Socialist, in the name of us American radicals. He has, presumably, reason to value The Masses, but he finds it lovable and enviable mainly and merely because of its "innocence," its magniloquent but dreadfully simplistic view of social and intellectual problems. "Lucky devils, happy comrades!" says Howe. They knew not the post-lapsarian taint of communism, or of "problematic thought." Howe's is the voice of patronizing, vicarious self-indulgence—of a tired man who pines for bygone "lilt and bravado" which contrasts so sharply with what he feels to be the "droop" of our age.

The innocence of this approach to the radical past is made embarrassingly clear by O'Neill, who contrasts modern business unionism with the tough labor battles The Masses reported—Paterson, Ludlow and the like—in which men died for union recognition or a nickel more an hour: "The very innocence of these demands inspires a certain nostalgia today. . . ."

Our conditions are not nearly those of The Masses' world, and I do not mean to suggest that the magazine, in taste or politics, could easily be duplicated nor even should be. Neither do I mean to deny the limitations of The Masses' romantic, sometimes ingenuous and apocalyptic, vision of working-class triumph. Or the deep troubles, ambiguities and disasters in the radical movement in the last fifty years of trying. But The Masses still speaks—and speaks best—to those who are attempting to remake our world. In its example it may encourage our bravado and teach us some lilt.

Echoes of Revolt, however, is made for the drooping. It is dedicated to one of the drooped, Max Eastman, who reprints a chapter of his first autobiography as an afterword. He and Howe and O'Neill essentially agree that The Masses was lovable—and is irrelevant. Among them Eastman has the best reasons for nostalgia—he who, more than any other, created The Masses and never did anything so fine again. The reader's digester and national reviewer revises The Masses' meaning to make it seem comfy, wedding the ideals of Marx and William Buckley with mendacious rhetoric:

So far, at any rate, as I shaped its policy, the guiding ideal of the magazine was that every individual should be made free to live and grow in his own chosen way. That was what I hoped might be achieved with all this distasteful palaver about politics and economics. . . . As my notebook of those days declares: "I can bear the prospect that the world may never be free, but I can not bear the prospect of my living in it and not taking my part in the fight for freedom." (Emphasis added.)

Eastman does not reprint another of his comments on his one-time glory:

For ten years, as editor of the old Masses and Liberator, I poured out my soul, and what there was of my intellect, in works of editorial art that are not only dead but dead wrong.

Louis Untermeyer, one of The Masses' editors, from whose second autobiography I quote Eastman, observes with more candor than one will find anywhere in the apparatus of this anthology: "Seldom has a living man written so unhappy an obituary."

The Masses was the graveyard of dreams, as well as the cradle. Few of the magazine's principals survived with their radical principles intact. There are many reasons, not the least of them the failure of the American Left in subsequent decades to make room for such cultural expansiveness and troublesome self-criticism as The Masses dished up. But there was also a failure of nerve. One of O'Neill's omissions is William Rose Benét's "Revolution" which concludes:

It is easy to preach Revolution—
 Revolution in pink reviews,
 Or flourish a Phrygian cap from the top of a steeple;
 But if ever it came to an uprising of the people,
 How many pale poets would stand in the leaders' shoes?

The Masses' poets and artists were never tested by an uprising. Most of them were tested, however—by success, acceptance, and by the unexpected toughness of engineering their dreams. Irving Howe is pleased that The Masses' people "were not, by and large, tempted to settle into comfort." But most of them did settle eventually, and made their peace with the system they once sought to upturn. "They did not fret," says Howe, "the way younger radicals of the sixties do, from fear of selling or copping out." With a few exceptions, they just did it, by and by, without fretting. But The Masses had the best of them.

The pattern seems endemic to the culture of the American Left: For a few years a group of predominantly middle-class intellectuals found their best expression in terms of working-class radical politics. Most of them could not sustain the effort, however grand it was. William O'Neill suggests that The Masses' makers followed H.G. Wells in their politics, but they were more Wellsian in personality. Still a Red, Floyd Dell wrote about his generation in The Liberator in 1924,

[Wells's] heroes reproduced and held up to our esteem a quality which we all possessed . . . which peculiarly unfitted them, as it unfitted us, for service on behalf of the future. . . . They were individualists par excellence—queer, lonely, self-opinionated, impulsive, erratic and ego-worshipping creatures, utterly undisciplined. . . .

At its usual best, The Masses sublimated such creature characteristics. The Revolution was too important, too possible, it seemed. That Revolution failed and its most talented intellectuals deserted. Another "revolutionary" period, the 1930s, came and went; its intellectuals tried and tired. Another time of revolt is upon us. Floyd Dell asked toward the end of that same article in The Liberator:

Is this new Revolution, like the last, going to bring realities different from our dreams? And are we, by reason of our disillusionment and chagrin, condemned to be unable to take part in the life of the new age, but destined rather to turn back and seek refuge in romantic dreams of the past? And, finally, how much blame for that discrepancy may we lay upon that new world-order, and how much upon ourselves?

And Middle-Class Daydreams

THE SMART SET: A History and Anthology. By Carl R. Dolmetsch. With an Introductory Reminiscence by S. N. Behrman. The Dial Press. 262 pp. $17.50.

KENNETH S. LYNN

Mr. Lynn is professor of English at Harvard University.

The parent publication of The Smart Set was an occasionally scurrilous, incorrigibly gossipy gazette called Town Topics, and the latter's rise to popularity in the mid-1880s marked a historic reversal in the editorial attitude of American magazines toward the most important phenomenon of our post-Civil War civilization: the emergent city, as prophetically symbolized by New York.

Until Town Topics came along, Scribner's, the Atlantic Monthly, Harper's, etc., had expressed extremely confused and contradictory ideas about the city. On the one hand, New York was where the action was; on the other, it was a Vanity Fair wherein many a pilgrim's progress came to grief. Henry James and W. D. Howells, the sophisticated magazine contributors of the period, had no doubt that urban culture, for all its faults, was infinitely superior to the provincial narrowness of life in New England villages, but they were far outnumbered by writers like E. P. Roe (the most popular novelist of the day) who saw the city as a threat to family life and Christian faith, as well as by scores of regional writers who, from Harriet Beecher Stowe to Sarah Orne Jewett, exalted the village as the guardian of all the good old values.

Town Topics, however, displayed no uncertainty whatsoever about the attractiveness of city life. In its pace and power and glamour, New York was indeed a threat to traditional values, and the bright and lively young men like Percival Pollard, Vance Thompson and James Gibbons Huneker who soon began writing for the weekly gloried in that fact. In their unsigned commentaries on Gotham goings on they affected the world-weary cynicism of Oscar Wilde and Aubrey Beardsley, but underneath their fin-de-siècle tone was a wide-eyed wonder and enthusiasm. Between Town Topics and The New Yorker's "Talk of the Town" the lines of connection are very clear, indeed.

Despite the brilliance of its editorial staff, the idea for a monthly counterpart that would deal more in fiction than did

"A powerful plea for the United States to come to its senses before it is too late."

—WES LAWRENCE,
Cleveland Plain Dealer

"An invaluable antidote to the official rhetoric of government... This book is a very specific protest against the war in Vietnam... It is an angry cry against all war. It is an articulate statement of the duty to dissent."—MAX FRANKEL, front page, N. Y. Times Book Review

"A hard hitting book... in the best American tradition of dissent... Senator Fulbright concludes with an eight-point program for ending the Vietnam war... Should be studied by all thoughtful Americans."—JOHN BARKHAM, Saturday Review Syndicate

Cloth $4.95; Vintage Book paperback $1.95. Now at your bookstore
RANDOM HOUSE

the quasi-reportorial weekly was the brain child not of the editors of Town Topics but of its publisher, the notorious Col. William D'Alton Mann. One of the great con men of American history, Mann combined the preposterousness of Mark Twain's Beriah Sellers with the cunning of Dos Passos' Doc Bingham. By 1900, the year The Smart Set was established, Colonel Mann was one of the sights of Manhattan, a dandy in a flaming red tie, impeccable frock coat and spectacularly flaring white whiskers. Behind him he had a varied career as a cavalry commandant in the Civil War, profiteering bureaucrat in the War Department, peddler of phony oil stocks, speculator in cottonseed, newspaper proprietor in Mobile, Ala., and carpetbagging Congressman (in which role Mann was thwarted by the refusal of Reconstruction officers to certify his election).

But it was the patent he took out, in 1872, on a "boudoir" sleeping car that made Mann rich. For while the American railroad market was dominated by the Pullman Company, Europe was wide open; and Mann's idea eventually grew into the Compagnie des Wagons-Lits. By that time, however, Mann was up to his whiskers in New York journalism. Town Topics proved to be a bonanza, and on March 10, 1900, he launched The Smart Set in quest of another.

Subtitled "The Magazine of Cleverness," it quickly built a circulation of 165,000—the equivalent of 850,000 by today's standards. According to Carl R. Dolmetsch, a professor of American literature at the College of William and Mary, who has written a delightful if somewhat uneven introduction for a new anthology of Smart Set pieces, this audience represented a leisure-class readership which was narcissistically interested in reading about itself. But Dolmetsch's contention must be doubted on the ground that the circulation was much too large to be accounted for in terms of a single economic class. As The New Yorker would discover in the 1920s, making a great show of the fact that you were not interested in publishing a magazine for old ladies in Dubuque merely brought Iowa's interest in you to a boil. The stories that formed the stock in trade of The Smart Set in its early days were novelettes like "The Idle Rich" by Hobert C. Chatfield-Taylor and Reginald DeKoven which recounted the glittering adventures of debonair, rich, handsome Schuyler Ainslee; such stories were not mirrors, as Professor Dolmetsch would have it, in which the "so-called Four Hundred and the [sic] hoi polloi" could recognize reflections of themselves; they were fantasies which fed middle-class daydreams.

All of which is not to say that the early Smart Set published nothing but pap. Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Bliss Carman, Henry Seidel Canby, Martha Dickinson Bianchi, Ludwig Lewisohn and Agnes Repplier were among the early contributors; and while The Smart Set did not exactly "discover" James Branch Cabell and O. Henry, it nevertheless gave these two very different writers more encouragement, and more money, than did any other publication of the period. When the magazine almost went under in 1906, it was not from any dearth of writing talent but rather because Colonel Mann's habit of using the gossip columns of Town Topics as an instrument for blackmail finally exploded in a sensational trial in which Mann foolishly accused Norman Hapgood, the crusading editor of Collier's Weekly of defaming his character. The jury's verdict of "not guilty" not only freed Hapgood; it convicted Mann—at least in the opinion of the public—and some of the tar on the brush rubbed off on The Smart Set. Advertisers canceled their contracts, and in 1906 alone, the magazine lost 25,000 subscriptions.

In this crisis Mann was forced into one editorial innovation after another, including such gimmicks as frontispiece portraits of Consuelo Vanderbilt, Mrs. Potter Palmer and other grandes dames, a practice which foreshadowed the celebrity hunting of many subsequent magazines. The most memorable innovation, however, was the decision, taken in 1908, to find a literary editor to conduct a monthly book column. After a certain amount of searching, a 28-year-old Baltimore newspaper man was hired for the job. "By the standards of our day," Professor Dolmetsch writes, "he was abysmally untrained and ill-equipped to run the critical department of a national magazine. He knew no more of literature than one could then acquire with a city high school education and a passion (unsystematic and idiosyncratic) for leisure reading. But he compensated, at least in part, for the huge gaps in his knowledge by having the practiced eye of a master reporter (with nine years' service on three Baltimore papers) and a freewheeling style admirably suited to the magazine's still unwavering claims to 'cleverness.' His penchant for paradox and vivid, sometimes caustic, phrases had already brought him a modicum of fame in circles outside Baltimore. . . ."

The neophyte reviewer was of course Henry L. (not yet H. L.) Mencken. Within a year of his coming to The Smart Set he had begun to inveigh against the entire code of the American Way of Life, from religion to democracy to romantic love, thereby preparing the critical climate in this country for the acceptance of Dreiser and of the iconoclastic poets and novelists whose names are associated with the so-called Renaissance of 1912. Mencken's was not the only voice which spoke out for a reevaluation of American values during that first dead decade of the 20th century (after all, the careers of Van Wyck Brooks and Ezra Pound also date from 1908), but his polemical skill made him the most formidable freedom fighter of them all.

A year after Mencken joined The Smart Set the staff was further augmented by the arrival of George Jean Nathan. His first effort for the magazine was an essay entitled "Why We Fall in Love With Actresses" which failed to answer the question. Then in November, 1909, he inaugurated a regular theatre column. Although it took Nathan considerably longer than it did Mencken to find his critical voice, the side-by-side appearance of the critics in the back pages of The Smart Set gave the magazine the wittiest, the most exciting, criticism in the history of American magazines.

Bobbs-Merrill

The Essays of A. J. MUSTE

edited by Nat Hentoff

"In my mind A. J. Muste is the most astute political analyst in America, and an Authentic Great Man."

—PAUL GOODMAN

"Historians of the future who want to know what it meant to live with integrity in the twentieth-century era of wars and revolutions, will very likely begin with the life of A. J. Muste."

—STAUGHTON LYNDE,
Yale University

"A. J. Muste stands out in our time, and I believe he will stand out in history, as a great leader of a pacifism which is anything but passive."

—NORMAN THOMAS

"A. J. Muste has spent the better part of his life in search of a rare goal: personal fulfillment through public commitment. . . . This volume of essays is thus essential therapy for us all."

—IRVING LOUIS HOROWITZ,
Washington University

$10.00 at all bookstores

Bobbs-Merrill

But in spite of the one-two punch of Mencken and Nathan and the appearance in the magazine of such new and talented writers as Deems Taylor, John Erskine, Carl Van Vechten and E. Phillips Oppenheim, the circulation continued to sag. Finally in 1911, Mann was forced to sell his pet publication, his only consolation being that he got an inflated price for it. As he had so often in the past, the old con man found a sucker, this time a gullible millionaire from New England named John Adams Thayer. Once the new owner had awakened to a realization of the magazine's desperate financial plight, he turned helplessly to his brilliant literary editor for advice about how to interest a new generation of readers. Mencken immediately urged the appointment of a new editor, his candidate for the job being Willard Huntington Wright, whose book reviews for the Los Angeles Times had won Mencken's interest and whose admiration for Nietzsche outrivalled his own.

In the very first issue of the magazine that he produced, the 25-year-old Wright proclaimed his iconoclasm by describing himself as one who "for years has waged war against effeminacy and formalism in American letters." In a time of literary revolution, a revolutionist had come to editorial power, and Wright wasted no time in exercising his authority. The Kitsch on which the magazine had always relied was replaced by manuscripts scouted out by Ezra Pound in London. A long satire was purchased from Frank Harris on the hypocrisies of academic piety that helped to establish The Smart Set as the voice of restless collegians. Dreiser was welcomed into the magazine, and so were D. H. Lawrence, Conrad, Strindberg and W. B. Yeats.

Yet by 1914, Wright had been dismissed. He was too erratic, too pro-German and (the worst sin of all, from a Yankee point of view) too lavish in the prices he paid for manuscripts. Having fired Wright, Thayer sold the magazine to Eltinge Warner who, like Scott Fitzgerald, was a native of Minneapolis and a graduate of Princeton, and who had recently turned a moribund publication called Field and Stream from a financial liability into a gold mine. Under Warner's benign leadership, The Smart Set was in effect turned over to Mencken and Nathan, and until they left it in the early twenties to found The American Mercury, the magazine published a dazzling array of talents. It was the first American magazine to publish Joyce's stories; it brought Scott Fitzgerald to national attention; and the theatre and book reviewing were better than ever.

After Mencken and Nathan left, Warner sold the magazine to Hearst in 1924. Within a matter of months the erstwhile "Magazine of Cleverness" was publishing the poetry of Edgar Guest and the inspirational sermons of Dr. Frank Crane, the well-known Baptist sexologist. In 1930, the magazine died. The task of sophisticating the national taste had long since passed to other hands.

Messages in a Bottle

WINTER NEWS. By John Haines. Wesleyan University Press. 71 pp. $4. $1.85 paper.

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig is a poet who teaches at Columbia University.

The news that John Haines brings us is of deep winter indeed. His poems describe a world that is limitless and vastly empty, where all the sounds have been stifled, and where those movements that still resemble life are accomplished with a slowness that is familiar to us, perhaps, only in dreams. It is the massive winter of Alaska, where Mr. Haines has lived for nineteen years, scraping together his living as a homesteader on the frontier, 70 miles from Fairbanks. His poems are the shape he has given to his very real isolation; the words—and there are so few of them—which have survived his decision to renounce our complicated violence and our civilities. Unlike Thoreau, he went more than the symbolic mile from home. The quiet brutalities of winter, which Haines describes, occur at an incalculable distance from the anxieties and the familiar pleasures of our lives: not a mile but a world away. The poems are like messages in a bottle, launched half-distrustfully from the far side of this isolation; the reader is an accident, a piece of unexpected good or ill fortune, yet somehow not part of the plan.

*I came to this place,
a young man green and lonely.*

*Well quit of the world,
I framed a house of moss and timber,*

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW

VOL. XI, NO. 1 WINTER 1967

NORMAN N. HOLLAND
The "Willing Suspension of Disbelief" Revisited

HARRY BERGER, JR.
Archaisms, Vision, and Revision:
Studies in Virgil, Plato, and Milton

HAROLD DICKER
The Bell of John Donne

ROBERT HAZEL
Sunday

RAPHAEL RUDNIK
Nine Poems

KINGSLEY WIDMER
The Prophecies of Passion

V. A. KOLVE
Religious Language in Waiting for Godot

BRUCE A. ROSENBERG
Lord of the Fire-Flies

• • •
Subscription rates:

$1.00 each for single copies
$3.00 a year (4 issues); $5.00 for two years
Available at bookstores or from

110 Morrill Hall,
Michigan State University,
E. Lansing, Mich. 48823

Before we can find a way out, we ought to know how we got in

THE FIRST VIETNAM CRISIS

by Melvin Gurtov

Today's Vietnam dilemma dates back to the crisis of 1953-54 when the United States made a controversial assumption that has resulted in a far greater commitment than had been foreseen. "This is an amply documented book which provides necessary background...Recommended."—Library Journal. "Basic assumptions...need to be completely re-examined, says Mr. Gurtov. His own efforts in this direction certainly seem to be an excellent beginning."—Virginia Kirkus' Service.

$7.00

At better bookstores

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

440 W. 110th St., New York, N.Y. 10025

called it a home,
and sat in the warm evenings singing to myself as a man sings when he knows there is no one to hear.

This simple description points to what is best and worst in Haines's poetry. He speaks as a man "well quit of the world," who has swept aside the cluttered surface of his emotions in order to sing only to himself. Every object he describes to us, every rhythm of speech and landscape in the poems, embodies this retreat—or is it, on the contrary, an adventurous journey?—into what is utterly cold:

Over the sleeping houses a dense fog rises—smoke from banked fires, and the snowy breath of an abyss through which the cold town is perceptibly falling.

As if Death were a voice made visible, with the power of illumination. . . .

Haines reminds us that he made a voyage once; that his removal to this world of winter was in its time difficult and painful, but it has been accomplished. Now he is there, on the other side of life, where the events of winter are a constant illumination: "As if Death were a voice made visible." At their best, his poems are that voice. The violence and the dislocations of the voyage are behind him; what remains is the soft-spoken authority of a style which, when it is most effective, convinces that its quietness is a strength; as if the imposing vastness of this winter had made the loud voice impertinent—shouting is as quickly drowned as a whisper in such endless snow—and gesticulation a sign only of bad nerves.

In the dozen or so poems that are carried through successfully from beginning to end—but also in lines and stanzas of many other poems—Haines explores a world of quiet, brutal reversals: a lamp filled with shadows that burns on a table; another flickering in a "drafty cave . . . walled with visions." The lamp is an image for the poems themselves. It describes an uncertain perimeter of light in which men sit "gazing past the limit of fire into the towering darkness," or where they "awaken and listen in darkness, / guarding a smoky candle / against the silent / and relentless cold." The puddle of clarity—the life and the poem—are small moments in the hugeness of the frozen landscape.

Although the texture of the poems is simple, and their style subdued, they render the winteriness of Haines's vision with a kind of sparse detail which comes surely from the lived experience itself. As the cold descends, "the wells are freezing at Northway"; the quietness of the encroaching ice is underscored by the sound of "oil tins" that "bang as evening comes on." The short stanza:

*Men go out to feed
the stiffening dogs.*

dramatizes the slow stiffening of all life in the grip of such transformation as the cold brings: an irreversible, clarifying change, "delivering / to the homes of those / who have died of the frost / word of the resurrection of Silence."

Several of Haines's strongest poems describe an unexpected dialogue, which is at the same time a kind of metamorphosis. What he cannot say to men the poet says to animals, with the controlled but deadly energy of the hunter who is "haunted by the deaths of animals," for "they listen / as though I had something to tell them." In "Horns," he describes this dangerous exchange:

*I went to the edge of the wood in the color of evening, and rubbed with a piece of horn against a tree,
believing the great, dark moose would come . . .*

*The October moon rose, and down a wide, frozen stream
the moose came roaring, hoarse with rage and desire.*

The poet's message is one of violence, mingled with a strange, lonely sexuality; and he talks it to the proper inhabitants of his winter: the moose, the salmon, the owl, as if by killing them he too could become indigenous, not an exile or an intruder but a changed being, a member of the snowy "abyss." That is the change he imagines in one of the most beautiful poems of the book, where he listens to an owl at nightfall and, when he hears it, dreams that he will glide to meet it over the river:

*We will not speak, but hooded against the frost soar above
the alder flats, searching with tawny eyes.*

*And then we'll sit in the shadowy spruce and pick the bones
of careless mice,
while the long moon drifts toward Asia and the river mutters
in its icy bed.*

Haines has discovered in Alaska a world that corresponds to something at the center of his character: quiet, slow moving, contemplative, ready to display, under the calm surface, a kind of sober murderousness. "Well quit of the world," singing only to himself, he imagines this pure circumference of which he is the center: a vacillating, smoky candle, half in love with the frost that is its only interlocutor and that may, at any moment, put it out.

But isolation has another aspect: not only does it reveal—it also conceals. And this too is apparent in the poems. The question is: what kind of language does a man use when he is talking only to himself? What happens to such circular discourse? Words are sharpened by the situations they create; in order to convince a reader, a lover, a father, one must not only know the truth, one must use good arguments. The words, straining against real incomprehension, must be crisp and effective.

Yeats wrote that poetry is made out of the argument with oneself, rhetoric out of the argument with others. But this argument of poetry is made, none-

Unbelievable—but true!

Internment camps are ready
Shall they be for you?

- Read the eye-witness account—
- Learn the facts—
- Act for the right to dissent
before it is too late!

Order your copy of this eye-opening book immediately — 70c each
Special rates: 10 @ 60c; 25 @ 50c

CITIZENS COMM. FOR CONSTITUTIONAL LIBERTIES
22 E. 17th St., New York, N.Y. 10003 • Room 1525 • WA. 9-6662

Send me _____ copies of "CONCENTRATION CAMPS - USA"
@ _____ each. Enclosed find $ _____.

Enclosed find $ _____ to help campaign for Constitutional liberties.

address _____

theless, in the presence of others. In some sense, the drama of self-discovery must then become another drama which takes shape in the reader's imagination. In Haines's poetry, one feels the lack of this other. His argument with himself is made too often, in the presence of no one. It is surely no accident that many of his strongest poems are those which describe an exchange of messages—"If the Owl Calls Again," "The House of the Injured," "Poem of the Wintery Fisherman,"—I mean those animal poems where owl, moose and salmon provide the drama and articulation which elsewhere may be lacking. There is a danger in being too well quit of the world: the messages that drift back lose their sharp human resonance; they may become undecipherable or just boring.

Haines escapes this danger often enough to have written a number of distinctive poems which are like little that has been written in recent American poetry. The cumulative effect of Winter News is, however, muffled by a number of poems whose vague imagery and blurred emotions cannot but disappoint; as if Haines had taken the shadow for the living object, the surface movement for the singular discovery it only half indicates. This indecisiveness is surely the danger of Haines's vision, and of the very real isolation in which it is rooted. Yet it is clear that Winter News, John Haines's first book, contains, at its best, an achieved style and a degree of insight which make it well worth reading.

bined population of 90,000, and only two of them have risen to the modest rank of a "prefecture." By contrast, four Zähringer towns can boast of great universities; Bern is the capital of Switzerland; Zurich an international power in finance; Freiburg, Villingen and Fribourg important regional centers. Yet this overall success does not result from a uniform political, social or economic development. The Zähringer town-system was planned in an effort to create a dynastic state straddling the Rhine by uniting territories in what is today southwest Germany and Switzerland. But when the family became extinct in 1218, their political dream collapsed. Thereafter, the histories of the towns took different paths. Those in the German group suffered from wars and frequent destruction. The Swiss group developed more evenly but was still quite varied. Murten and Thun were subjects of Bern, which by the 16th century had become the most powerful city-state north of the Alps. Further, the people living in the German and Swiss towns are of different stock, and in two towns close to the language border the inhabitants are French speaking. Yet in all Zähringer towns some common characteristics prevail—there is an affinity of spirit that

ARCHITECTURE / ERVIN GALANTAY

To the chagrin of architects, it has become fashionable among sociologists to deny the importance of the physical environment to the quality of society. This attitude may stem from disenchantment with public housing: in the '30s it was generally hoped that the provision of clean, solid, orderly shelter would quickly change the motivation and morals of the inmates. It didn't work out so.

Yet psychologists insist that stimulus inputs from the physical environment are important to the development of the individual, and animal experiments by J. B. Calhoun and others have proved the correlation between patterns in the environment and social behavior. The relevance of such experiments is often shrugged off with the remark that "people ain't rats," but recently the same findings have been generalized as working concepts in urban psychology. Those who stubbornly held to their faith in the impact of design on social behavior found their articulate leader in Albert E. Parr, former director of the American Museum of Natural History. As a sign of changing winds in sociology, the entire October volume of Social Issues was devoted to "Man's Response to the Physical Environment."

Interest in the relation between the designed environment and urban society lies not merely in interdisciplinary skirmishing but in the crucial importance of this question for the design of New Towns, where—other factors being equal—success or failure hinges on qualities of the plan. To prove this contention would require experiments of enormous scope under controlled conditions. Urban history offers a storehouse of pertinent material, but due to the complexity of forces acting on a town's development it is difficult to single out the "design" component of the "success" factor. In a few cases, however, the similarity of conditions in the origin and growth of a group of towns limits the likelihood of arbitrary interpretation, and the insights gained contribute to the discussion of environment and society.

It is for this reason that a medieval town-system may command general interest. Accordingly, I recommend the exhibition on "The Zähringer New Towns," sponsored by the Swiss Federal Institute of Technology, which opened at Columbia University recently and is currently displayed at MIT. It deals with a regional system of New Towns planned by the Dukes of Zähringen in the 12th century. What makes these towns unusual is the fact that their successful development can be credited to a good extent to qualities inherent in the original plan. Of the twelve towns founded by the Dukes within a few decades, most prosper today and none has disappeared. This could not be taken for granted. Other communities of medieval foundations have atrophied; in some cases their faint outlines can be detected only on aerial photographs. Compared to the better-known group of French bastides founded by the Counts of Toulouse and the Kings of France and England, the Zähringer towns impress both statistically and by "performance." Today their combined population exceeds 500,000 (more than 1 million if we include Zurich, which the Zähringers enlarged considerably), while the more numerous bastides hardly muster a com-

This ground-breaking new book is "illuminating as well as frightening"*

NATIONALISM AND AMERICAN CATHOLICISM

By DOROTHY DOHEN. A Catholic laywoman who is also a trained sociologist examines the public statements of six Catholic Bishops, Archbishops and Cardinals in the United States — and throws sharp light on the "tendency to identify sacred symbols with secular ones, national goals with religious goals." — *from the Introduction by JOSEPH P. FITZPATRICK, S.J.

$6.00 at your bookstore

SHEED & WARD
New York, N.Y. 10003

'The habit grew on me...'

So writes ■ subscriber, explaining why he has been reading The Nation for the past thirty years.

In an age of hyperbole, The Nation makes few claims for itself. It will not make you rich or alluring to the opposite sex.

Some readers buy it because it carries the toughest crossword puzzle now being printed in America. More buy it because the editors have a greedy curiosity about what really happens behind the velvet curtains of public relations and the pious admonitions of government.

The truth is not often given away free—you have to dig for it. The Nation has been digging for 101 years and its readers never seem to tire of watching the editors work.

subscribe to

THE NATION

America's most habit-forming magazine

The NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for ■ new subscription to The Nation.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Mos., $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

2-27-67

impresses even a superficial visitor, a similarity of life patterns formed by the Zähringer plan. Even in the biggest of these towns the old core retains in plan and in spatial concept the essence of the original foundation, and yet it has not become a mere tourist precinct but remains the undisputed center of the modern city and region.

The central idea of the Zähringer plan is the spinal importance of the wide market thoroughfare. Unlike the French bastides, where the fixed size of the central market square limited the future of the town from the beginning, the linear markets of the Zähringer towns were capable of growth. Paul Hofer—the leading authority on Zähringer towns—likes to compare the loosely rectangular grid of their street pattern to a string net that, being elastic, can casually stretch and distort without losing its basic characteristics. This flexibility permitted application of the system to a variety of sites, hills as well as plains.

The area between streets was organized in Hofstätten, superplots of fixed size and proportion. Although these blocks have often been subdivided and again recombined during the centuries, the basic module assures that all buildings still retain the cadence of the original order. This rhythm is experienced as a "patterned stimulation," which avoids monotony by permitting various combinations but which is still disciplined by the underlying module.

Another characteristic of Zähringer towns derives from town charters that permitted private owners to erect stone arcades in front of the lots—"the granting of air rights over public right of way," we would say—in return for the construction and maintenance of a covered public pedestrian way. Where this practice caught on it became astonishingly useful: in Bern, the medieval arcades and associated modern cross connections—covered and partially heated concourses and passages—add up to 5 miles of protected pedestrian walks in the area of the old town. And just as improved highways generate more traffic, the existence of this sophisticated pedestrian system may account for the vitality of old Bern that is so much admired by planners of modern shopping centers.

The plan of Bern (1190 A.D.) is in many respects the final formulation of the Zähringer concept. Located in a loop of the river Aare, the old town occupies an area of about 100 acres. From the tip of the peninsula the Zähringian town stretches some 2,000 feet along the wide linear market—a distance equal to a walk from 42nd Street to St. Patrick's along New York's Fifth Avenue. During the 13th and 14th centuries Bern doubled its area by expanding westward in the spirit of the original pattern. There are some dimensional similarities between Bern's street plan and the familiar grid of Manhattan, but distances between Bern's avenues correspond to the distances separating Manhattan's cross streets and vice versa. The Bern pattern seems more sensible, since there are fewer crossings along the principal arteries. There are only thirty-five intersections in this area and modern traffic is regulated by a single policeman and three traffic lights. Unlike other historic towns, where vehicular traffic had to be restricted, Bern's streets can handle all kinds of traffic, any time.

The old block pattern proved equally adaptable to changes and pressures created by increased commercial and office use—including the vast amounts of space claimed by the city, canton and federal governments whose offices are interwoven with shops, cellar theatres and attic studios in Kafkaesque complexity.

Some planners would dismiss the relevance of historical models by pointing to the great disparity of size between medieval and modern towns. Granted, some of the original Zähringer foundations are hardly as large as a single neighborhood unit of modern planning. But such comparisons are misleading. The minimal initial population needed to guarantee a viable New Town may be a function of the relative complexity of society and the hierarchy and distribution of surrounding communities. Numbers alone do not make a city. The physical pattern is an important factor in development as it furthers or frustrates communication, defines or limits the life patterns of the inhabitants. Unless the minimum number of components—people, production units, institutions—are brought together in sufficient concentration and density, creative interaction cannot take place and the New Town will not thrive. This concept of the "Critical Initial Urban Mass" means simply that the minimal population is a variable dependent on the physical pattern and density. A compact, well-structured New Town will succeed with a smaller population than will a low-density, spread-out agglomeration. This concept is useful in examining the development of New Towns—of any age and in any society. The Zähringer towns offer convincing models of the dense, patterned type, and their influence can be traced to far corners. The plan of the British New Town, Hook, strongly resembles Bern, both in concept and dimensions. Hook —yet unbuilt—has nevertheless become very influential as the first departure from the loose, low-density type of British New Town. Like Bern, it is organized along a market spine paralleled by two distributor roads; like Bern it provides housing in the core area, and the staging plan for Hook strikingly recalls the historic growth pattern of medieval Bern. A similar model was proposed by H. Weber, J. Perez-Canto and myself for the center of the new industrial town of Ciudad Guyana on a peninsula of Venezuela's Caroni River—a site which even topographically is similar to Zähringian Bern.

The exhibition of "The Zähringer New Towns" demonstrates the forming influence of city structure on preferences in the way of living and shows the continuity of thought from medieval to modern urban design.

It is a most important contribution to the present discussion on the psychology of towns and fulfills in a beautiful way what Siegfried Giedion asked of history—"that it should uncover for our own age vital interrelations with the past . . . by searching out aspects which are significant concerns of our own period . . . and thus offer insights into the moving process of life."

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

What do we mean when we speak of expressive content? The ordinary playgoer might translate it as "what we got out of a show." He thinks of it as something that can be summed up in a phrase, a thesis, an insight. It is what stays with him after he has digested the plot of a play, its nourishing residue. There is something ethical or humanistic about the notion.

It is a valuable, though vague, concept. Still we may be misled by a quest for something "deeper" than the surface. Content is not something "underneath" and separate from the play's visible and audible body. Body and soul are one.

These reflections occur to me after seeing Peter Shaffer's Black Comedy (Ethel Barrymore Theatre) and Molière's Les Femmes Savantes in French—now touring the campuses and small auditoriums of the country. Both plays are almost without content as we commonly define it. Yet I enjoyed them thoroughly.

It may seem heresy to speak of Les Femmes Savantes as almost meaningless. In its day—1672—it was a topical satire. The title mocks the pretensions of certain 17th-century ladies just as Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme pokes fun at the middle-class gentlemen who strived to ape court manners.

The merchants were an ascending class. Their wives, lacking the opportunity, though they may have had the means, to indulge themselves in the airs of aristocracy, often took to studying Descartes, or at any rate to citing him; they conducted home experiments in the advancing sciences. The most modest of their occupations was the reading or composition of hoity-toity verses based on antique models. With what awe the ladies introduce a poetaster who knows Greek. They would like to marry their

PINTER'S "THE HOMECOMING"

"A MASTERFUL PLAY. PINTER IS AN ARTIST, ONE OF THE BEST TO HAVE ENTERED THE WORLD'S STAGE IN THE LAST TEN YEARS."

—Harold Clurman, The Nation

THE ROYAL SHAKESPEARE COMPANY IN
THE HOMECOMING

PRICES: Mon. thru Sat. Evgs.: Orch. $7.50; Front Mezz. $6.75, 5.75; Rear Mezz. $4.75, 3.75, 3.00. Wed. & Sat. Mats.: Orch. $5.75; Front Mezz. $5.25, 4.75; Rear Mezz. $4.25, 3.25, 2.50. Please enclose stamped, self-addressed envelope with order. List several alternate dates.

MUSIC BOX THEATRE 230 W. 45 ST., N.Y. 10011

daughters to such epigones. They were "in."

We have our own ladies of learning and culture today but they cannot be lampooned or disposed of with Molière's arguments. Our bluestockings are too formidable to be quelled by the barbs of the old bourgeoisie. Molière today is square.

The company calling itself Le Tréteau de Paris (a "portable" theatre) plays Les Femmes Savantes in modern clothes. The girls are drawing-room disk jockeys, they hang odd and presumably ultra-modern bits of wire sculpture around the premises, they examine sundry objects through microscopes, they do setting-up exercises out of physical culture manuals, they wear mini skirts. These inoffensively childish effects do not damage the play: they are sauce for the gander. They may even be of help.

What can the content of such a play be at present? It lies in a marvelous sense of movement, not the actors' physical movement but a certain dance of the mind which motivates the stage action, a dance inherent in Molière's very language. Reading the text, the verse might strike the foreign ear as a sort of gay doggerel: the vocabulary is simple, the rhythm pleasantly conventional. But it is a language meant to be acted; it implies sudden changes of pace, bursts of energy, sudden switches in mood, all of them essentially joyous, pure play. What keeps Molière fresh is his robust, springy, tonic sense of fun. His "melody" transcends all moralizing. It is in itself the healthiest of maxims. Mental notes on the play's meaning don't matter: our spirit is made to leap and twirl with a kind of open-air vigor so close to some primal source of life that our very intelligence becomes cleansed and fortified.

Black Comedy is altogether void of intellectual significance. Yet, except for being too long by about ten minutes, it is very good sport. Based on the Kabuki convention of staging almost everything under bright illumination—including night scenes—the action of Black Comedy occurs in bright light, though nearly all of it is supposed to be happening in pitch darkness. The result is a series of hilarious sight gags.

What happens in this dark? People blunder ridiculously. Apropos of what? What's the story? I've seen the play twice and I can hardly remember. The content lies in the crazy cavortings, the mishaps, the absurdity of the human body diminished to an inept instrument by the absence of what we take for granted as a natural environmental element.

The cast at the Barrymore is composed of good American and English actors—notably Michael Crawford, Geraldine Page, Lynn Redgrave, though in a certain sense their individual merits matter little in this entertainment. The essential fun is created by the scenic idea and John Dexter's brilliant direction, which in this case is a kind of choreography. The laughter at Black Comedy has a certain purity because we hardly realize why we are laughing. This in a small way is the laughter of the gods.

To precede his farce, Shaffer has written a serious companion piece called White Lies. This play has a message. People must be true, true to their nature, their feeling and thought—and not enact the white lies deemed expedient for successful navigation in the turbid waters of everyday existence. This thought is phrased differently and no doubt more felicitously in the play. It begins with a certain degree of suspense and quasi-exotic color, taking place in a fortuneteller's gloomy digs at an English seaside resort off season, chilly, humid, sunless. The atmosphere makes us hope for some enlivening miracle, but

THE MAID'S STORY

*Between her leaving Cobb
And putting the kettle on Each morning on the stove,
Twenty springs had gone.*

*A slow flutter of nerves
Told her the slow truth:
There was to be no love
In heaven or on earth.*

*She never could put the losses
In words, never could say —
When they asked, "What's the matter?" —
What was the matter. They*

*Were patient and impatient
Like the city she stared at.
She was lint in the clothes closet.
She was dust under the rug.*

*She stayed that way for years,
In between loss and loss;
Each night, she dreamed of a house
That was hers. It never was.*

*Then less and less mattered,
Each day was just each day.
Finally nothing mattered,
She opened her mouth to say.*

HOWARD MOSS

the miracle doesn't happen. The content of the play, to which if we will we may nod assent, is trite in the telling, a blank cartridge.

Except for a pleasant surprise in an early scene, White Lies is noteworthy only for Geraldine Page's acting of the impecunious fortuneteller, a putative Baroness of foreign origin and accent. The characterization is capital in its clarity, assurance and incisiveness. Miss Page's usually strange voice, with its peculiar waverings and abrupt diminutions as if it stifled a sob, becomes in this role acid and taut. Her face, normally wan and misty as if covered by a thin, straw-colored veil, has become a mask of grim Mediterranean intensity. Usually there is something sweetly plaintive in Miss Page's manner; as the Baroness she conveys sybilline power under a disguise of eccentricity. Her eyes penetrate, her thinking holds us. The actress leads us to anticipate a momentous revelation but is betrayed by the collapse of the play in platitude. But never mind: Black Comedy redeems the evening.

BUY YOUR BOOKS through The Nation

When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

APARTMENTS—UNFURNISHED

Live in a Mies van der Rohe Apartment... adjacent to Branch Brook Park... 25 minutes from Manhattan. Community activities: Little Theatre, newspaper, classes, clubs. Rentals from $99. Request brochure "N." COLONNADE, 381 Broad, Newark, N. J.

VACATION

CARIBBEAN HIDEAWAY: Cool, quiet privacy. Near beach. Special deal entire summer. Write: Sassman, Box 757, Carolina, Puerto Rico.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 2-27-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

Crossword Puzzle No. 1190

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 and 22 down One of the things the Germans managed was single-minded effort on modern pseudo-culture. (13, 4)
- 10 A Dodger fan could get enthusiastic, but spread in excess. (7)
- 11 Plate fabric, with everything the wrong way! (7)
- 12 Proving staying around is what the dissidents might be peacefully occupied with. (9)
- 13 He went around a long time for his love. (5)
- 14 The moa is strangely enough never found out. (2, 4)
- 16 Where next month's volume might be knowingly anticipated. (4, 4)
- 19 Do births appear to be responsible for a possible drop in wildfowl? (8)
- 20 What would you say about the North surrounding the South's capital? All together, now! (6)
- 22 Fabricates things of modest value, usually. (5)
- 23 A reasonable offering might be light if one is so perfect. (9)
- 25 An enemy fighter gets to talk extravagantly and one doesn't stay for long. (7)
- 26 The capital of Bulgaria is found in a western state, where one finds an old southern neighbor president. (7)
- 27 Some of them get money for making rubber. (6, 7)

DOWN:

- 2 Responds conformably with supplication to the native rulers, perhaps. (5)

- 3 Nowadays it shouldn't be several months from this to Easter. (9, 6)
- 4 Sister joins a labor organization as a representative. (6)
- 5 More than fifty in the area, as those in it believe. (8)
- 6 Dewey, Nixon, and Truman shouldn't be confused with just anybody! (3, 4, 3, 5)
- 7 False lies, if old, when non-productive could be well-improved. (3, 6)
- 8 It sounds spread under the opening, which is where it belongs. (4, 4)
- 15 One sent before could be made to bring her a better position. (9)
- 17 Another word for what the barefoot boy got at first. (8)
- 18 and 9 down. The silent cliché implies a very early setting, but one is evidently getting the idea. (5, 3, 4)
- 21 What a 25 musician was once said to do. (6)
- 24 Of course a German holds it to be enthusiastic! (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1189

ACROSS: 1 Baking powder; 10 Elision; 11 Calypso; 12 Heath; 13 Formative; 14 Wildebeest; 16 Seth; 18 Heat; 20 Stem-winder; 23 Yo-heave-ho; 25 Abele; 26 Upright; 27 Ice floe; 28 Copyrighting. DOWN: 2 Abigail; 3 Irish Sea; 4 Genuflect; 5 Oscar; 6 Dollar; 7 Reprise; 8 See how they run; 9 Foreshortened; 15 Summoning; 17 Ligation; 19 Amharic; 21 Dwell on; 22 Hang up; 24 Enter.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544—82 St., Brooklyn 9, N.Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

DOES UNCLE SAM WANT YOU? Escape from "Freedom," a new pamphlet explains Canadian immigration procedures. Send 50¢ plus handling to SUPA Anti-draft Program, 655 Spadina Avenue, Toronto 4, Canada.

MARXISM & MODERN LITERATURE

by Gaylord C. LeRoy

A professor of English at Temple University analyzes such basic concepts as Modernism, Realism, and Socialist Realism

Just published • Paper: $1

AMERICAN INSTITUTE FOR MARXIST STUDIES

20 East 30th Street, New York, N.Y. 10016

(checks may be made payable to: AIMS)

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts. $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON N. ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

AUSTRALIA WANTS YOU! Government assisted passage. Unlimited Opportunities. Latest Government Information $1.00. Austco, Box 3623-FF, Long Beach, California 90803.

PERSONALS

SEEKING AN ALTERNATIVE TO WHITE SUBURBIA?

Move to the tree-lined streets of Washington's thoroughly integrated Neighbors Inc. area. Work with us to preserve this integration, improve our schools, know each other better. We welcome your talents, your imagination, your selves.

To use our volunteer Housing Information Service write:

NEIGHBORS, INC.
524 Fern Place N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20012

INCOME TAX RETURNS PREPARED. Washington Heights-Inwood Tax Consulting Service. Specialists in returns for teachers, instructors. 914-735-5113 or SW 5-7315.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

7¢ a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

TECHNOCRACY thinks America is too complicated to be run by politicians

- In 1967 we still have no coordinated Continent-wide transportation system (including transport by waterway, rail, air, roadway and pipeline) . . .
- No large-scale plan for collecting the produce of farms, mines, forests and fisheries . . .
- And no equitable, coordinated distribution system.
- Housing is haphazard, inefficient, high cost . . .
- We have no Continent-wide radio or TV.
- THE PRESSURE OF POPULATION AND THE DEPLETION OF STRATEGIC NATURAL RESOURCES MAKE ESSENTIAL EFFICIENT, TOTAL PLANNING.
- TECHNOLOGICAL AMERICA NEEDS OBJECTIVE, EFFICIENT TECHNOLOGICAL ADMINISTRATION IN ORDER TO PASS ON TO EVERY CITIZEN THE FULL BENEFITS OF OUR NEW "MACHINE AGE."

SUBSCRIPTION ORDER

TO: TECHNOCRACY'S MAGAZINES
5509 University Way N.E.
Seattle, Washington 98105

Enclosed herewith is $_____ to cover subscription(s) to Technocracy's Magazines for _____ year(s). All three magazines, 12 months, 12 issues, $4.00.

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____ Country _____

(Foreign rates, other than Canada, Mexico and U.S. Territories, add 20%)

CRIME & AFFLUENCE MICHAEL FOONEN

THE NATION

MARCH 6, 1967 35 cents

The Rush Enigma

WHO RUNS THE STATE DEPARTMENT?

SMITH SIMPSON

Disney's Fantasy Empire

JOHN BRIGHT

Politics of Copper

PROXY FIGHT IN THE CONGO

PAUL SEMONIN

THE MAP IN COLOR

•
R CRUISE O'BRIEN / NADINE GORDIMER / DORIS LESSING

RECEIVED
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA
72010
FEB 15 1967
PUB LIBRARY

SPARE NEWSP

LETTERS

coercion by AID

Bryn Mawr, Pa.

DEAR SIR: Congratulations to John McDermott for his excellent statement on Vietnam ["Vietnam Is No Mistake," The Nation, Feb. 13]. . . . He provides the latest chapter in a twenty-year history whose chief contours were depicted so brilliantly for us in 1961 by Prof. D. F. Fleming, in his The Cold War and Its Origins 1917-1960, as well as by David Horowitz and Gar Alperovitz in their recent books.

But one matter intrigues me. How does McDermott reconcile all this with his earlier thoughts about "Welfare Imperialism in Vietnam" [The Nation, July 25, 1966] as the honest but mistaken goal of U.S. policy in that martyred land?

Richard B. Du Boff

New York City

DEAR SIR: In describing "welfare imperialism" as he does, Professor Du Boff has evidently allowed the moderate stance of my earlier article to overshadow the radical critique it contained. The central burden of my analysis was to show that U.S. foreign aid programs produced satellites with imbalanced economic development, increased social conflict and growing authoritarianism as system-properties of the AID relationship, not because this or that government official had malevolent intentions. . . . True, I emphasized the amiable intentions of the American public. But I went to even greater pains to describe how, and with what conscious justification, U.S. policy makers were willing to coerce the people of Vietnam, and elsewhere. . . .

John McDermott

enforced banality

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Kudos for your kudos for Mr. Bullitt of King Broadcasting [editorial, The Nation, Jan. 23]. However, it is not, as you imply, only the wish of large financial interests to placate all and sundry that causes the innumerable endorsements of Christmas seals to be pawned off as editorials, but the very real presence of that watchdog for the people, the Federal Communications Commission, with its ability to tie up a station owner's license renewal application every three years. . . . Freedom of speech, it would seem, is not for broadcasters, as the slightest acquaintance with the operations of the Federal Communications Commission will show. Don't blame it all on big money.

Laurence A. Elgin

endorsement

Lawrence, Kan.

DEAR SIR: This is, if you will, a letter from a satisfied client: our advertisement in your Nov. 14 issue produced extremely good results. I would appreciate it if you would run this letter, or a part of it, to let readers know that, while copies of our issue on Truman are still available, as are regular subscriptions, we are completely sold out of the special issue on the American Indian. Orders for that issue, often multiple orders for twenty-five or more copies, are still coming in, and we can't fill them. We are thinking of reprinting the issue, or of negotiating with a publisher to bring it out, revised and expanded, in book form, but for the moment, we are forced to return checks.

Stuart Levine, Editor
Midcontinent American Studies Journal

EDITORIALS

Corruption

After some initial shock at the revelations of Central Intelligence infiltration into a wide assortment of once respectable organizations, a predictable effort is being made to mitigate the disclosures. The argument, basically, is that it was all rather innocent. Totalitarian governments had to be countered some which way; neutralizing their devilish tricks required money; the CIA had the money and, providentially, could provide it through unvouchered disbursements, without awkward accounting to Congress. Of course, there were Congressional committees charged with overseeing the operations of the CIA, but ordinary members of the House and Senate obviously had to be kept in the dark. The inference is that these outsiders should be grateful for having been spared knowledge of covert but essentially virtuous arrangements. The reasoning is tortuous and will appeal only to those who are unalterably committed to the cold war and everything that is perpetrated in its name.

Many of the CIA operations abroad were in violation of basic American principles, but those who believed in the overriding sacredness of the crusade against communism could console themselves with the thought that domestic affairs were an area the CIA was debarred from entering. When the wall of secrecy was breached, it turned out that the CIA was under no such inhibition, that it regarded itself as licensed to deceive the American public with as little scruple as it employed toward its enemy abroad. It felt no obligation to reckon with the consequences: the conflicts of interest that would automatically be generated when it operated on the domestic front, the individuals who would be forced to lie, the damage to these persons, to the organizations they led, and even to the CIA itself. Nothing counted except some sort of victory—whether real or mythical and, if real, however short-lived—over the forces of communism.

The stupidity and shortsightedness of the CIA seducers were matched by complementary qualities on the part of the seduced. So long as the money came from the government with a patriotic label attached to it, they were eager to lay their hands on it. Where there was everything to suspect, they allege that they suspected nothing. The officials of the American Newspaper Guild speak more eloquently than they perhaps suspect. Its Secretary-Treasurer, Charles A. Perlik Jr., says he was "unfamiliar" with the background of the $1 million subsidy the Guild was getting from somewhere. Asked whether he knew if CIA funds were involved, he replied: "It was not a question that I ever asked. It never concerned me. All I know is that I was never asked to do anything." William J. Farson, the executive vice president, deposes to the same effect. These statements are probably technically correct; once people enter into these transactions, they become expert in the use of language to evade the truth. But all sorts of questions arise. Who led the Guild to the particular foundations that were "conduits" to the CIA front organizations, some of which had been exposed by Rep. Wright Patman as early as 1964? Or were the officials guided by pure intuition? If the foundations took the initiative, did the Guild officers have no suspicions as to their motives? What Guild officials failed to share their knowledge of what was afoot with what other officials? How far down in the officer ranks did internal deception or willful blindness extend? Did anyone have compunctions about hiding important sources of income from the membership?

Parallel questions arise on the governmental side. The Washington Post reports on the authority of Robert Kennedy that President Johnson was "totally unaware" of the subsidy to the National Student Association, nor was any member of the White House staff informed until "quite recently." This is hard to square with other revelations. A high official in both the Kennedy and Johnson Administrations says that the White House did in fact know, and that is the only view that makes sense. The students talked to Vice President Humphrey in July, 1966; did Humphrey shield Johnson from these unpleasant facts?

Many of the officers of organizations caught in the exposé hope that it will quickly blow over. Officials of the Executive branch no doubt share this hope. And they have grounds for optimism. If the CIA, which still lives in the McCarthy era, is allowed to continue in the untrammelled possession of its powers, subject only to occasional interrogation by members of Congress similarly unburdened by scruples, no change can be expected. Nor is the CIA the only federal organization which, under the cloak of seeking intelligence, exercises little or no restraint. The whole conspiratorial intelligence apparatus of the government is in need of ventilation and overhaul. If Congress does not apply itself to the job, it will be recreant to its trust.

State Examines Itself

In a rare (and limited) exhibition of candor and courage, the State Department has publicized the results of three management conferences held in 1965 for the purpose of criticism of themselves and the department by senior foreign service officers. The results are set forth in "Some Causes of Organizational Ineffectiveness within the Department of State," by Chris Argyris (U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D.C., 20402, 25c). They reinforce the diagnosis made by Smith Simpson, ■ retired senior foreign service officer, in the article on Dean Rusk, p. 294 of this issue.

Dr. Argyris, professor of organizational behavior at Yale, is described in the preface as "a friend and confidant" of the department. His belief is, broadly, that "the way modern organizations are designed, built and

IN THIS ISSUE

March 6, 1967

EDITORIALS

290

ARTICLES

- 294 The Rusk Enigma:
Who Runs the State Department?
Smith Simpson
- 299 California Revolution 6:
Disney's Fantasy Empire
John Bright
- 303 Politics of Copper:
Proxy Fight in the Congo
Paul Semonin
- 307 Crime & Affluence:
The Case of the Culpable Victim
Michael Fooner

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 309 "Losing Our Cool"—
in Ghana
Conor Cruise O'Brien
- 311 A Talk With Doris Lessing
Florence Howe
- 313 The Color of Want
Nadine Gordimer
- 315 Africans and Afrikaners
Charles R. Larson
- 317 Theatre
Harold Clurman
- 317 The Shy Roofer (poem)
Gary Gildner
- 318 With the Doctor's Bill (poem)
John N. Morris
- 319 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR.	Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS	Associate Editor PHIL KERBY
Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH	Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS
Copy Editor MARION HESS	Poetry Editor MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Theatre HAROLD CLURMAN	Washington ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Art MAX KOZLOFF	Paris ALEXANDER WERTH
Music BENJAMIN BORETZ	London RAYMOND WILLIAMS
Science CARL DREHER	Bonn C. AMERY
Advertising Manager MARY SIMON	Canberra C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1434 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-3547. Second class postage paid at New York, N. Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old ■ well ■ their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Volume 204
No. 10

administered, inevitably creates forces toward ineffectiveness and organizational illness. . . . I believe that the problems described in this report compound the felony committed by the traditional organizational structure and managerial controls used by the State Department."

The content of Dr. Argyris' paper amply supports this conclusion, but the fact that the investigation was authorized, and that officers disclosed thoughts and feelings usually concealed, shows that some, at least, are aware of the need for improvement, both in themselves and in the department's system of norms. It is only fair to recognize, also, as Argyris points out, that all organizations are plagued by problems similar to those of the State Department. However, if a large corporation, or even a revered university, is thus handicapped, it is not as important as when such conditions exist in the agency responsible, at least in theory, for the conduct of our foreign affairs.

The picture that emerges from the conferences is one of partial or complete concealment of views in the interest of career advancement. One would think that standards of probity would be incomparably higher in the State Department than in the despised movie industry, but the similarities turn out to be more striking than the differences. Movie bywords are that a director is only as good as his last picture, that nobody in Hollywood loves a loser, and that yes men abound. In State, likewise, the courage to "level" is rare, and one senior officer declares: ". . . if you get the reputation of having lost several important battles—no one wants a loser. The word gets around and you have been ruled off the promotion lists. Soon you learn. . . ." Another confides: "If I were to be very honest, I think that one reason I have succeeded is that I have learned not to be open, not to be candid." (His italics.)

When they are persuaded thus to unbosom themselves, foreign service officers are seen to be quite human, and in many cases so frustrated that one begins to sympathize with them. But this is irrelevant to the overriding consideration of what these individuals are doing to the country and the world. Dr. Argyris was not concerned with this aspect, but it is more important than efforts to improve organizational effectiveness. It leads to such questions as: Why has State become subordinate to Defense? What normative judgments are to be expected of men who pursue their careers so deviously, and for ends in which U.S. aggression in Vietnam, for instance, is turned upside down and described as aggression against the United States? What chance has an official who disagrees radically with U.S. policy in Southeast Asia to make his views heard, much less taken seriously? What traumatic role does the McCarthy era still play in the affairs of the department?

If foreign service officers would search their souls along these lines, the long-term effects for the United States could only be salutary. But self-criticism is scarcely likely to extend to such lengths.

The Great Wackenhut

Florida and California normally run neck and neck as the jazziest states in the Union, but just now Florida is well ahead. California has Ronald Reagan and up to a few months ago he seemed hard to beat, but Florida's Claude Kirk is not only clearly the more bizarre but promises to outshine the long list of half-screwball, all-demagogue Southern governors who came before him. What decides the contest beyond doubt is that Kirk has George R. Wackenhut heading his privately financed state police force. Wackenhut operates in California too, but his headquarters are in Coral Gables and it is only in Florida that he is the state's official crime-buster.

The Wackenhut success story is of epic proportions. Like most top-flight private detectives, he is an ex-FBI man. He joined Hoover's constabulary in 1951 and resigned in 1954 to set up his own agency, in company with three other ex-agents. For several years the company was strapped for funds. Its break came in 1960 when, with legal assistance from the law firm of Sen. George A. Smathers, it became eligible for government contracts. An inconvenient law which prohibits the government from contracting with companies that furnish detective services was circumvented by the formation of a Wackenhut subsidiary corporation for security work. The federal establishment then became Wackenhut's biggest customer. The Atomic Energy Commission alone pays Wackenhut $3 million a year for guard services at its Nevada test site—quite a distance from Florida—and Wackenhut operatives also guard the space center at Cocoa Beach. About 40 per cent of the company's $23 million income is derived from government sources. Presently, Wackenhut operates with 4,100 employees in twenty-eight offices in the continental United States, Puerto Rico, Venezuela and Colombia. It has plans for further expansion abroad. Last year, the Wackenhut organization "went public" with the sale of 135,000 shares through underwriters at $11.60 a share. However, Mr. and Mrs. Wackenhut still retain more than 70 per cent of the capital stock.

It would be a mistake to regard Mr. Wackenhut as a mere businessman. Patriotism, in a particular form, animates him more than the desire for wealth. His associates in the crusade for God and country include such men as Ralph E. Davis, the Wackenhut Western division manager and a member of the National Council of the John Birch Society; Loyd Wright, the Los Angeles lawyer who praised the Society during his unsuccessful campaign against Sen. Thomas H. Kuchel in 1962; and Capt. Eddie Rickenbacker, perhaps the nation's most eminent right winger. Wackenhut himself is a militant foe of organized labor; as for communism, he regards it as "the most vicious form of organized crime ever perpetrated on the human race."

In his alliance with Governor Kirk he is breaking new ground and possibly establishing precedents for the protection of private property and the free-enterprise system in the future. Soon after Wackenhut's appointment as the $1-a-year guardian of Florida's security became known, the company's stock jumped $2 a share. The cost of the operational campaign against crime, about $1,000 a day, is to be met by private contributions. The Wackenhut organization will, on behalf of the governor, oversee the police departments of municipalities and in general act as a super police force. Those who have expressed alarm at the creation of what might readily be described as a private police force are assured by Mr. Kirk that only racketeers, hoodlums and criminals need be apprehensive. For his part, Wackenhut promises that the private operations of his agency and his work for Kirk and Florida will remain separate. For instance, he will not add to the dossiers he already has on 2,500,000 persons by taking advantage of his access to the police files of Miami and other Florida cities. Still, when a Wackenhut man appears at the door, the householder may be somewhat uncertain as to whom he represents.

Bizneyland

The status of big business on college campuses across the country has been dropping steadily during recent years. One poll shows that in 1964 only 14 per cent of the Harvard senior class entered business, down from 39 per cent in 1960. And a 1966 survey has found that only 12 per cent of all American college students want to enter business.

Accordingly, the University of Michigan has decided it's time to glorify, if not beautify, the corporate image with a "Business Hall of Fame."

Like its baseball counterpart in Cooperstown, N.Y., Bizneyland will honor American businessmen with bas-relief plaques; it will also be a repository of pertinent artifacts, photographs and film biographies. The Michigan officials expect the hall of fame to become an inspiration to students, a mecca for businessmen and one of the leading tourist attractions in the state.

"We hope," says Floyd Bond, dean of the university's business school, "that the hall will cause visitors to pause and reflect upon their heritage; that it will inspire respect for the great entrepreneurs who have done so much to build our nation. Ideally, the hall will make one feel that he is in the presence of greatness."

David Lewis, director of the hall of fame, expects fifty to seventy-five businessmen to be elected during the remainder of this century. (Electors will be other puissant executives.) Lewis indicates that "such factors as their business innovation, their firm's performance, their contribution to the nation's economic progress, and their business ethics and morals," will be weighed in selecting members. He hastens to add that "businessmen's ethics and morals are expected to be judged in the context of their times, rather than by today's standards."

Lewis suggests that attractive contenders for nomination in 1968 are Henry Ford, Andrew Carnegie, J. Pierpont Morgan, John D. Rockefeller, Sr., James B. Duke, James J. Hill and Edward H. Harriman.

One requirement for membership in Bizneyland is that a nominee must be dead for at least three years. The director thinks that, as soon as they have served their term in limbo, J. Paul Getty, Alfred C. Fuller, Conrad Hilton, Norton Simon, Henry Ford II, David Sarnoff and H. L. Hunt stand a good chance of resurrection in bas-relief—"provided they don't stub their toes before their business careers come to an end."

It makes you wonder what Mr. Bond had in mind when he suggested that visitors would "pause and reflect upon their heritage."

A.J.

In 1933, the year I was born, A.J. Muste was just resigning the directorship of the Brookwood Labor College after a decade of service. By then, A.J. was nearly 50 years old and already a veteran of nearly thirty years in the factional melee of labor, Socialist and pacifist politics. He could look back on a life that included fierce beatings on the picket lines of the Lawrence textile strike, the organization of the Amalgamated Textile Workers, the organizing years of the American Civil Liberties Union, and the agonizing struggle to defend the conscientious objectors during World War I. When—thirty years later—I met A.J. for the first time, it was difficult to imagine that there could be any role for me but to keep my ears respectfully open and my opinions deferentially to myself. He had, after all, for more than twice my lifetime been taking his knocks in behalf of every worth-while cause I could name. What did I have to tell someone like that?

But that's not the way it was, because that's not the way A.J. could ever let it be. It was his gift to draw friendship out of people, spontaneously and immediately, rather the way I imagine Socrates must have drawn knowledge from his students: by enveloping them in a field of trust and receptivity. And suddenly I was talking to A.J. about everything that was most important to me. And I knew that he was really listening, that he cared—indeed, that he was trying to learn from me and about me. "Tell me about yourself," I remember his saying as we shared a two-hour lunch. "I'd like to know who you are."

This is not a quality one expects to find among radical activists—this capacity to listen, this willingness to learn. Most activists are out to harangue, to overbear, to score, to whet their ideological commitments on your moral uncertainties, or, worse, to launder their consciences in the tears of your guilt. Perhaps that is why so many activists wind up doing a better job of making themselves obnoxious than of making the world beautiful.

But here was A.J. Muste, in my eyes the authentic voice of a radical Populist tradition that reaches back gloriously through American history to Eugene Debs and the great abolitionists and Thoreau and Jefferson and Roger Williams (as great a soul as any of them), and he was listening to me as if I had something to teach him. But, in fact, I think A.J.'s listening was his way of teaching. It was his way of teaching the value of openness, which, in turn, is the meaning of nonviolence. Looking through the soon-to-be-released collection of A.J.'s essays (edited by Nat Hentoff for Bobbs-Merrill), one is impressed by nothing so much as this quality of openness. It shows itself in the infinite care with which he always reconstructed the arguments of opponents, even those with whom he profoundly disagreed. It shows itself in his repeated use of the unassuming "it seems to me" as he gently introduces his own views. A.J. was a brave soul, but not mainly because he was still scaling fences to trespass on missile bases at the age of 75; rather I think he was brave mainly because he remained willing to the last to face the dangers of dialogue: the honest risk of listening, of learning, of changing. There is, I suspect, no worse ordeal for political radicals.

What does one say of him at last? Perhaps that he knew, better than all but a few in our time, the difference between true revolution and mere power shuffling. "The believers in nonviolence," he said in an essay of a few years ago, "do not see the task of our age as that of seizure of power by a new social element and the setting up of a new power structure. They see the task of our age as that of building the beloved community."

The beloved community. There aren't many of us who can get away with phrases like that. But A.J. could. Because he knew—and he made you know if you gave the dialogue even half a chance—what all his grim Niebuhrian critics within the ministry and all the strenuous ideologues within the movement and all the wrong-headed men of power have never wanted to know: that the purpose of political action is—at last—to save your own soul.

THEODORE ROSZAK

THE RUSK ENIGMA

Who Runs the State Department?

SMITH SIMPSON

Mr. Simpson, a retired Foreign Service officer with twenty years' experience in and around the diplomatic Establishment, is the author of Anatomy of the State Department, to be published by Houghton Mifflin in April.

After six years in office, the Secretary of State is still an enigma to his fellow Americans. Our principal foreign policy adviser and architect of diplomacy has escaped not only notoriety but even clear characterization.

Background in part accounts for this bewildering elusiveness. In the whole stretch of Rusk's fifty-two years from birth in a Georgia parsonage, there is almost nothing that one would normally associate with preparation for his present work, and to which one could turn for clues to his competence. There is no trace of political experience; no large-scale managerial testing; no outstanding involvement in public affairs; no national recognition; not even an association with Presidents. Apart from such unfortunate predecessors as Robert Lansing and Frank L. Polk, whom almost no one remembers, Dean Rusk's record (or rather lack of record) is unique.

Nor does his parsonage extraction appear to be significant. If one could find some missionary zeal in his conduct of foreign affairs, some inclination to international crusades, such as Woodrow Wilson and John Foster Dulles exhibited, one might feel some thread with which to begin an embroidery. The overseas evils of war and colonialism, communism's threat, neutralism in the face of imminent danger, and poverty have all had strong gravitational pulls on American statesmen of evangelical disposition. Is the modest Rusk really as unevangelical as he seems? Would a probing of his attitude on Vietnam reveal any trace of hitherto undetected crusading spirit?

Rusk's former academic connection likewise offers no clear characterization. College professors are not celebrated for being practical men, but Rusk is eminently practical. Some of his critics feel he is too practical, too much of an "incher," who is thus overwhelmed by major problems before he becomes aware that they are stealing upon him and his crisis-ridden department.

Rusk gave a good account of himself as a staff officer during the last World War, both in Southeast Asia and in the Pentagon. If it is true, as is said, that he considered a permanent military career at the end of the war, he was presumably not disillusioned by his army experience. Has it had, then, the effect of inducing him to yield unduly to military leadership? Does the State Department's very weak handling of the Vietnamese problem suggest this diffidence? Has Rusk been able to hold his own with McNamara, or have we been witnessing since 1961 a resumption of the pendulum swing in foreign affairs which began in World War II and was arrested only by the special resources of the Marshall-Acheson combination?

Rusk first went to the State Department in 1946, reverted to the War Department and followed Marshall back to State a year later, rising to the level of Assistant Secretary. One wonders whether he gained at the time adequate insight into the basic operating confusions of the diplomatic Establishment, or whether, swamped by the substantive problems of his particular area of specialization, he acquired only fleeting, fragmentary insights.

After he left the State Department to become president of the Rockefeller Foundation, Rusk's career was shrouded for nine years in the quiet anonymity of affluent good works. He then emerged, startlingly, in his present exalted capacity. Had he used any of these preceding nine years to prepare himself for such a role?

All these questions are intriguing, but Rusk's self-effacing nature does not permit him to help in answering them. Like General Marshall, whom he greatly admired and after whom he is said to have considered at one time patterning his own career, Rusk does not regard himself as important. Only ideas, principles, problems and correct solutions seem significant to him. Like Marshall, therefore, he preserves a jealous reticence.

The less personal question, to which we can address ourselves here, is how well Rusk has performed in his job. This is indeed a part of the enigma he presents and I can suggest some of the answers, having been in the Establishment myself. I can testify, to begin with, that while everyone wondered at the start if he could make a go of it, the Washington foreign affairs community saw him quietly, promptly and competently taking hold of the immediate demands of his job. Unlike his long-tenured predecessor, John Foster Dulles, who monopolized many decisions and no little information, Rusk was a team player. He solicited the full cooperation of his department. Moreover, his exceptional capacity for crisp, incisive analysis and for reaching decisions of militarylike preciseness set a high standard to which that cooperation was clearly expected to ascend. He and President Kennedy worked hard and fruitfully in the early months to modernize and rejuvenate the department, to stimulate it, to bring to focus its straggling resources. They strengthened research, restored planning to something of the vigor it had once possessed, strove to close the gap between echelons that Dulles had permitted to develop.

At the White House Rusk had a special problem. Responsibilities were diffused by Presidential task forces and the brash, if well-intentioned scurrying about and thrusting of White House staffers. Questions and difficulties promptly arose. Was Adolph Berle, Richard Goodwin or Robert Woodward in charge of Latin American affairs? Where did Teodoro Moscoso, head of the Alliance for Progress, fit in? Was Acheson or Rusk in command of planning for the Berlin flare-up? And what was Bowles doing abroad so much of the time when Rusk needed an effective deputy at his right hand? If the White House was not sure of Rusk in that early hurly-burly, Rusk and his associates were not sure of the White House. Through it all, the Secretary kept his temper and his patience, striving doggedly for quality of performance in his own organization as the only effective answer to this broad and mystifying distribution of authority.

When the Abbé Sièyes was asked what he did during the French Revolution, he replied that he survived. His response was one that many people—looking ahead in 1961—might have anticipated from Rusk at the end of six years. But survival has been more of a feat than anyone could have expected. In half a dozen years of repeated crises Rusk has survived not one President but two—two men of very different backgrounds, characters and values, demanding, it would seem, two different kinds of Secretaries of State. This may not have been a bad to live through as the French Revolution, but survival was no mean achievement. And Rusk has done more. He enjoys Johnson's respect—something not easily won and retained.

In the months when Lyndon Johnson was an uneasy appendage to the Executive Mansion, one saw the process in fascinating evolution. Again and again, Rusk took occasion to encourage the Vice President's interest in foreign affairs, considering this essential from a political point of view as well as from that of Johnson's personal need. The Texan had never been much concerned with events abroad and Rusk saw the benefit of overseas exposure. On his expeditions, the Vice President received cheering cables from the Secretary of State, which served two purposes: they encouraged Johnson and they warned embassies not to become disturbed by some of the more grievous demands and idiosyncracies of the Texas politician. Perhaps they also helped to keep the Vice President on the beam. The President may joke now that Mrs. Johnson is so fond of the Rusks she would never let him ditch Dean, but Johnson too has a similar sentimental attachment to a couple who had been friendly and thoughtful when times were rough.

In the hectic early days of the Kennedy administration, the quiet, analytical sorting-out process which goes on constantly in Rusk's mind made him a listener and analyst rather than an advocate, a summarizer at the end rather than a leader of debate. This caused some observers who prefer forceful and dramatic personalities to describe him, as does Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., as a kind of American Buddha. Schlesinger has even stated that Kennedy thought of replacing Rusk, but no Chief Executive in his senses would have jettisoned a Secretary of State who had the degree of Congressional respect Rusk early came to possess.

Congress is not a body that usually warms up to the head of our diplomatic Establishment, but it quickly warmed to Rusk. Not since Cordell Hull has a Secretary of State enjoyed such esteem bordering on affection. This is all the more astonishing because, unlike Hull who had spent almost a quarter century on Capitol Hill, Rusk was wholly unknown. Moreover, his college professorship and participation in the Atlantic seaboard coterie in foreign affairs were hurdles he had to surmount.

Such a man might well have foundered on Capitol Hill. Rusk, however, has a deeply rooted democratic philosophy which steers him patiently and successfully through the endless shifting and treacherous shoals of Congressional dealings. When he tells Congressmen that, far from rocking the diplomatic boat, they can be of great help to him, he believes it as profoundly as they. When he stresses the constructive uses of committee hearings, of Congressmen's travels abroad, of Congressional prying and probing all over the place, he is perfectly sincere. He even goes so far as to tell long-term members of foreign affairs and appropriations committees that having specialized in the department's operations much longer than he or any one of his associates, they know more than anybody in Washington about such things. This is indeed true, by and large, but it is rank heresy among the diplomats to concede it. If Rusk's position mystifies his career associates, it is a cheering concession to hard-working, conscientious Congressmen unaccustomed to bouquets from the Executive branch.

So it happens that a Middle West Senator ungiven to eulogy of Secretaries of State described Rusk to me as follows: "He is a sterling, distinguished public servant. The course he has followed has been honestly and realistically purposed to perpetuate the life of our country. Depending on what has been in our best interest, he has followed the commendable course of yielding when our interest so required, and remaining as firm as the rock of Gibraltar when obduracy was needed."

But the Senator who used this language a few weeks ago has also said some very hard things of the department which Rusk heads. "In every corner of the world," he has vigorously asserted, "we are losing ground to the Communists. Our flag is trampled, our prestige and power are flouted. Our embassies are mobbed, our officials threatened or arrested at gun point." And who is responsible? The Senator continued: "As the agency responsible for our foreign relations, the State Department must stand chiefly accountable for these defeats. The harsh fact is that State is not equipped to cope with explosive conflicts our enemies are stirring." The State Department soft-pedals "grim facts," clings to "old lines," "glosses over critical matters until they turn into disasters," "forgets that we must act our role as the free world's leader, and enforce our rights if we expect to survive." State, he says, has failed to devise "a consistent plan to defeat communism's political-warfare strategy," adheres to "decision-making machinery so inefficient that it moves at caterpillar pace," and is staffed with people "not up to the tasks that confront it."

Such complaints are often heard of the State Department and its overseas Foreign Service, and I know from more than thirty-five years of study and experience in the diplomatic Establishment that they are only too well justified. Moreover, there is a serious problem of morale in the department and service under Rusk, as there was under Dulles.

It is precisely here that some of the ordinary citizen's mystification over Rusk begins. If he is as good as he is pictured by Congressmen and others, how does it happen that his organization is open to such critical indictment? If General Motors or the Department of Commerce were as severely attacked, its head would be regarded as culpable and sacked. If Rusk is not responsible for his department's performance, who—or what—is?

To say that the department is would not be very illuminating—but it is a fact. The department largely runs itself, no matter who is Secretary of State. Over the long years it has evolved its own attitudes of mind, its own premises and prejudices, its own values, its own criteria of performance, and its own procedures which both express and reinforce all these. And no secretary who lacks thorough familiarity with this state of affairs, who has not mastered the managerial techniques for operating large organizations, can possibly cope with the State Department. The indications are that Rusk is not familiar with them. He evidently does not see the vital relationship of managerial problems to foreign policy and diplomacy.

This constitutes a weakness in his performance so serious that if it continues, it may well make the difference between the success and failure of American world leadership.

In this unresolved situation, the military factor in our international relationships becomes increasingly evident. Inevitably, when the contempt of diplomatic officers for training and education assures pedestrian work at the Foreign Service Institute, when their disdain for research and planning infects the department, when their reliance on daily improvisation continues unabated, the military will more and more fill the area of foreign policy and diplomacy. For the military long ago learned the value of education and training in international affairs. There are combat colonels in Vietnam today who hold Ph.D.s in international affairs. The State Department, by contrast, does not require of its officers any knowledge of international law and international organization or any systematic knowledge of the techniques of diplomacy; nor does it offer any courses in these disciplines at the Foreign Service Institute. To get even a correspondence course in international law, diplomatic officers must apply to the Naval War College.

Since the 1930s, as a consequence, the military establishment has increasingly influenced the dynamic and broadening area known as politico-military problems in world affairs. The appointment of a general as Secretary of State, another as Under Secretary, and a number of generals and admirals as ambassadors, as well as the inability of any career diplomatic officer to earn a top position in the Pentagon as a politico-military adviser, are symptoms of this disturbing trend.

This situation has deep implications for the preservation of democracy at home as well as abroad, but the department has only tinkered with it, and Rusk has indulged the tinkering. His relations—personal and official—with McNamara are excellent and some cross-fertilization of personnel has been achieved between their two establishments. But diplomats need thorough education and training in the politico-military area and suggestions to that effect should not always have to come from the military.

This problem of effective inter-agency integration of thinking, techniques, research and other resources affects not only diplomatic and military departments; it relates to State's broad role in the federal government. It took a general to establish a systematic inter-agency mechanism for this integration: when he became President, Mr. Eisenhower quickly saw that the Operations Coordinating Board was essential. It took another general to insist that the vacuum be filled after Kennedy, on very poor advice, abolished the OCB. It is now General Maxwell Taylor who publicly calls attention to the fact that we were politically unprepared for our Southeast Asia commitment in 1954, for our deepening involvement in that area in the 1960s, and for the ultimate victory we are striving for there today. I know this to be true, and one of several reasons for my early retirement from the diplomatic service in 1962 was to gain the freedom to say so. More and more, the military is advising Presidents on how the State Department should be organized to function properly. Sooner than we think, another general may be appointed to run the department.

Dean Rusk has not given sufficient attention to correcting the prevailing attitudes of his Establishment, to revamping its anarchic procedures, updating and extending its educational and training programs, vitalizing its library facilities and demanding the money for these essential renovations. In such areas, the department is starved for funds. While he was Deputy Under Secretary for Administration, William J. Crockett took the revolutionary step—revolutionary for the State Department—of employing first-class psychologists to study the attitudes of diplomatic officers and relate these attitudes to the Department's operating problems. Experimentation revealed what large private firms have known for years: attitudes have a basic impact upon organizational efficiency. Crockett began experimenting with so-called "sensitivity training" to see if the deeply rooted attitudes of officers could be changed, and of course the experiments revealed that they could. But the department has resources to do this on only a very limited scale—some 100 officers a year. Out of several thousand officers this is pitifully limited, and among those treated there is constant attrition through retirement and resignation.

One of the bewildering puzzles concerns the depth of Rusk's concern for the internal well-being of his department. Before one committee of Congress—Senator Jackson's subcommittee of the Committee on Government Operations, which has been exploring for eight years the problems State encounters in formulating and coordinating foreign policy—Rusk says one thing. Before Representative Rooney's subcommittee on appropriations he takes a different tack. He tells the Jackson subcommittee: "We try to keep not just abreast of events but ahead of events"; diplomacy has undergone "a revolutionary transformation"; we live in a time when "any action taken on one important matter in one place sends a chain reaction of effect in every other important problem with which we are dealing," and we must have "officers who understand these chain reactions." All this means "more and more management," and it means the diplomatic Establishment has need of "increased staff." It means "additional ways to broaden the experience of our professional officers," more "generalists who are deeply familiar with a lot of special fields," more "understanding in depth" and "getting policy officers into a planning frame of mind. We are trying to get the word across that every officer of the department, from the junior officer all the way to the top, is responsible for his own initiative, for considering the problems in front of him and coming up with new ideas. If he happens to have an idea which is not strictly in his field of responsibility, he is encouraged to pass it along to his neighbor who does have that responsibility." In answer to a question concerning the department's success in getting its share of the national talent, Rusk replied: "There is a national shortage of talent. . . . So that, when government moves out to recruit top talent, the competition is very keen." He emphasized his belief that "if you can build up the quality of personnel you can cut back in numbers. We try to urge our colleagues not to be timid about coming forward with ideas or suggestions, or in challenging basic assumptions or questioning a conventional interpretation of a factual situation, so we can avoid the failure of not thinking about the problem in the deepest and broadest terms." And for this, "opportunity for quiet thought is important." The department needs "far more chiefs and far fewer Indians," and to get these should "upgrade the desk officer," who is the lowest officer in the department's hierarchy. The problem of getting "accurate and relevant information" is a key one. "The ghost that haunts the policy officer or haunts the man who makes the final decision is the question as to whether, in fact, he has in his mind all of the important elements that ought to bear upon his decision, or whether there is a missing piece that he is not aware of that could have a decisive effect if it became known."

But before the Rooney subcommittee Rusk does not discuss these admirable concepts. They all cost money and his budget reflects the most niggardly thinking imaginable for a department which is on the front line of our national defense. The library is starved, research is starved, the planning staff is starved, training is starved. Far from asking for a staffing pattern which would give officers the leisure to keep "ahead of events," to acquire or preserve "understanding in depth," to seek "additional ways to broaden their experience," to "brood over" the complex problems with which the nation has entrusted them, and come up "with new ideas," the Secretary has boasted that for five years he has not asked for any personnel increases. He must know that by and large, under the conditions of the last fifteen years, officers are too hard worked to have any leisure at all. Here and there an office in the department or a section of a post overseas may be overstaffed, but it is not the pattern. Officers have, in fact, been known to faint from overwork.

If diplomacy has indeed undergone "a revolutionary transformation" it is not reflected in the Secretary's budget requests. There has been no revolutionary change in the criteria for admission of officers to the diplomatic Establishment or in testing techniques for admission, assignment or promotion of such officers. Apart from training in counterinsurgency problems begun in 1963 (which it took the imagination of the attorney general to suggest and the prestige of the President to initiate), one has looked in vain for any recognition of this revolution in the department's training program until the last year. Just recently, the department has actually introduced a science seminar and an intensive course in modern economics. It is also discussing a course in modern political science concepts and techniques, but probably won't succeed in getting it under way for lack of funds. It had to scrape up funds from private sources to start the science seminar.

These slow acknowledgments of "revolutionary transformation" in world affairs affect but a handful of officers. More than this cannot be spared by a department whose personnel has not increased during five years of expanding responsibilities. Moreover, much of the training is offered to senior officers, and these are in such surplus, due to poor planning and wholly inadequate analysis of junior-officer grumbling for promotion, that the department must now force about one-third of them into retirement, the trained and the untrained alike.

Even the introduction of computers to dispel that "ghost that haunts the policy officer" has lagged, partly from lack of funds, partly from incompetence. A department that must use obsolescent typewriters and adding machines which cost more for repairs than they are worth is not likely to invest heavily in computers. And, at least for the time being, such an investment might be dubious in any case. The people responsible for operating the few computers the department has been able to wangle have been trying for some two years to master the intricacies of printing out simple personnel data. Any broad application of computers to foreign affairs, so as to permit the storage and instant retrieval of needed information, is clearly a long way off in the State Department.

Occasionally, an event which shows the need for rapid improvement in departmental communications gets splashed on the front pages of the world's press. I remind readers of the furor in August, 1965, when the Prime Minister of Singapore, Lee Kuan Yew, stated that three years earlier the CIA had offered him a $3.3 million bribe. The State Department first denied the charge; then, when Lee produced a letter from Secretary Rusk apologizing for the incident, admitted that the Prime Minister was right. I happen to know that the department had honestly believed the charge to be false. The officers who knew of the affair had been rotated elsewhere and those responsible for Singapore and Southeast Asian matters at the time of the charge were completely in the dark. A computer would have spared the United States this, and many another humiliation.

This brings up the long-established practice of rotating officers from job to job, country to country, continent to continent. Frequent moves make for a fascinating life, as I well know, but I long ago came to the conclusion that they make for superficial officers. Rusk, who is well aware of the practice, tells the Jackson subcommittee that the diplomatic Establishment urgently requires "more generalists who are deeply familiar with a lot of special fields." How can constantly rotating officers become "deeply familiar with a lot of special fields"? Effective training could help, but training has lagged throughout Rusk's tenure. This sluggishness is the more astonishing in view of the Secretary's own educational background. Either Rusk does not mean what he says and is only idly philosophizing along lines that he knows will please the Jackson subcommittee, or he hasn't the time to do anything about the effective management of his department, or he does not know how to delegate the task.

A choice example of how a badly managed department can leave a secretary—and the nation—in the lurch is provided by the Vietnamese problem inherited by Rusk. Since 1954, when the Geneva Agreements brought a brief respite to Southeast Asia, and the acknowledged unsteadiness of the agreements led Dulles to negotiate the formation of SEATO and to bring Vietnam within its defense perimeter, we have faced a critical need for special knowledge of the area and special skills to deal with its problems. The few resources we did have the department permitted to be dissipated by rotating officers.

For ten years after 1954 the department introduced no training in depth for officers assigned to that area. It never analyzed the new commitment; never asked itself what skills it would demand. When the department finally stirred, the move came too late for it to lead—it could only react. Such indifference is indeed disturbing; it may in large part explain why Rusk refers with such unwonted eloquence to "the ghost that haunts the man who makes the final decision."

By 1957, the department had had three years to perceive the magnitude of Vietnam and adjust to it. From then until 1963, the year in which Vietnam became a matter for Secretary Rusk himself to handle, three different desk officers in the department had been in immediate charge of South Vietnamese affairs—one for considerably less than two years. There, supervisors—directors and deputy directors of the Office of Southeast Asian Affairs—were also changed during this period: four of each came and went. Only two of the desk officers and one of the superiors had served in Vietnam and, as one might expect, these three relatively experienced men had difficulty making their knowledge prevail in the face of their colleagues' ignorance.

This travesty of diplomacy occurred not only in the department's lower ranks but at more exalted levels as well. In the nine-year period, 1957-66, there were seven Assistant Secretaries of State for the Far East and four different Deputy Assistant Secretaries for economic matters. Of these eleven, six had had no experience in Southeast Asia, and all but one had had none in Vietnam. None had been given any special training in Vietnamese affairs before or during his tenure of office.

During this same nine-year period we had three Secretaries of State, six Under Secretaries, and four officials whose titles varied from Under Secretary to Deputy Under Secretary for Political Affairs. Three of these had had experience in Southeast Asia, only one in Vietnam. Rusk introduced one element of sanity into this vortex by arranging that Alexis Johnson, his Deputy Under Secretary for Political Affairs from 1961 to 1964, should have a year's tour of duty in Saigon as Deputy Ambassador before resuming his departmental job in 1965-66.

With the exception of ambassadors, this chaotic situation has prevailed in Saigon as well. Officers have been rotated in and out, barely able to assimilate the complexities of Vietnam before departing to some other, far-off assignment. Too large a proportion of the embassy staff has consisted of junior officers unable, because of age and inexperience, to impress Vietnamese officials. Even after Rusk was nudged into giving a counterinsurgency course, the rotation frenzy canceled out much of the potential value of that project.

This is not diplomacy. Nor does it indicate a satisfactory foreign policy. For policy must take account of means and resources, as well as objectives. Although we have now gained a certain appreciation of the magnitude of the Vietnamese commitment, Rusk continues to permit the department to disperse throughout the world officers who possess some knowledge and experience in Vietnamese and Southeast Asian affairs. This practice may explain why he finds that South Vietnamese officials are not easily persuaded that we really know what we are talking about. It could also be one reason why he finds the North Vietnamese so mysteriously indisposed to negotiate. Keeping tabs on our personnel merry-go-round it just may occur to them that they should wait until we have unmistakably proved ourselves incapable of helping to build order and political stability in the South. Our own generals have been warning for a long time that force alone will not win in Vietnam. The more perceptive of them have been saying from the beginning that in this type of war the political factors are decisive. Does Rusk find himself at the head of a department which he cannot stimulate to realize this point or to act upon it?

In policy making, Rusk has been keen and adept; his analytical ability has been of the first order. In negotiations where he appears himself other governments have been impressed by his willingness to listen, his patience, his lack of evangelical fervor. An American who does not claim to have all the answers, is prepared to hear what others have to offer, and to arrive at agreements by meticulous examination of all the arguments is a welcome addition to the international community. That is why Rusk has been successful in dealing with the Soviets and is now beginning to reap some fruit from his patient efforts to build bridges to Eastern Europe.

These qualities have been Rusk's strong points in dealing with Vietnam. He has been unemotional, rational, uncrusading. He has avoided sweeping claims and generalizations. But he has also avoided the bold and revolutionary steps called for within his department to provide the human and organizational resources needed to respond to the revolution in Vietnam.

Thus, the problems of both Vietnam and departmental management have overtaken Rusk before he became aware of their awesome proportions. Unlike Vietnam, the management problem has not received any concentrated attention. The sooner it does the better, for we cannot tolerate a ramshackle diplomatic Establishment in these days when it is supposed to constitute our first line of national defense.

CALIFORNIA REVOLUTION 6

DISNEY'S FANTASY EMPIRE

JOHN BRIGHT

Mr. Bright, a long-time resident of California, is a screen writer and novelist.

Los Angeles

Walt Disney, grand vizier of fantasy, possessed the world's largest collection of personal honoraria—praise emblazoned on plaques, medals, cups, scrolls, statuettes and testimonials. Shortly before he died, Uncle Walt, as he was known to his professional family, assigned a woman to organize and annotate the laurels. She worked a year at it, full time.

Most of these evidences of approval came from such sources as the Motion Picture Academy (which handed more Oscars to Disney than to any score of film people), distributors, chambers of commerce, fraternal lodges, cities, states, even nations. Some of these may be suspect as motivated by flackery, or impersonal business gratitude. (Disney's public relations machinery was the best in the field. Henceforward it may be a little like Christianity without Christ.) Not so the thumping superlative of Dr. Max Rafferty, boss of California's sophomores, who once said that "Disney is the greatest educator of the century."

If this compliment seems tarnished by the dubious authority of its tosser, a similar garland was pitched by David Low, the respected British cartoonist, who elevated Disney to be "the most significant figure in graphic art since Leonardo." No art critics squirmed in protest, perhaps because they read their own meaning into Low's "significant."

Educators, however, took Rafferty's goose grease at its full value. Librarian Frances Clarke Sayers of UCLA blasted the "absurd appraisal." "In the Disney films," she wrote, "I find genuine feeling ignored, the imagina-

This article was conceived as a critique of a man, his works and organization. The recent death of Walt Disney necessitated not only changes in tense but a look at the Fantasy Empire's future. No other revisions of fact, opinion or judgment are deemed imperative.

—The Author

tion of children bludgeoned with mediocrity, and much of it overcast with vulgarity. Look at the wretched sprite with the wand and the oversized buttocks which announces every Disney program on TV. She is a vulgar little thing who has been too long at the sugar bowls."

Dr. Benjamin Spock deplored the sadism in many of the Disney cartoons, citing the Wicked Witch in Snow White as a terrifying figure for young children, reporting that "Nelson Rockefeller told my wife a long time ago that they had to reupholster the seats in Radio City Music Hall after Snow White because they were wet so often by frightened children." (The present writer witnessed an almost fatal attack of juvenile hysteria in a Mexico City theatre when Pinocchio was swallowed by the whale.)

Disneyland, too, has produced a chorus of outrage. John Ciardi, driven into verbal murk by his distaste, noted in the Saturday Review that he was "ready to see him [Disney] as the incarnate myth of all that is naturally depthless," then added sourly: "I saw instead the shyster in the backroom of the illusion, diluting his witch's brew with tap water, while all his gnomes worked frantically to design a gaudier and gaudier design for the mess."

Julian Halevy (in The Nation, June 7, 1958) suffered a socio-philosophical recoil from the fantasy Mecca, where "the whole world, the universe, and all man's dominion over self and nature has been reduced to a sickening blend of cheap formulas packaged to sell." Equating Disneyland with Las Vegas he intoned ominously: "Their huge profits and mushrooming growth suggest that as conformity and adjustment become more rigidly imposed on the American scene the drift to fantasy will become a flight."

The article drew fire from Ray Bradbury who wrote an ad hominem letter to The Nation, concluding with his "sneaking suspicion . . . that Mr. Halevy loved Disneyland but is not man enough, or child enough, to admit it." Later Bradbury aired his own feelings about the park for Holiday, in rhapsodic prose more imaginative than anything of Uncle Walt's.

I tend to side with Bradbury and the new masses on this issue. Halevy's analogy is snobbery and spurious. Las Vegas is Western civilization at its cynical worst, a reduction of man's dignity to an alienating scramble for a dirty, desperate buck. It is truly narcotic, neurotic, unreal but not fantasy. Disneyland, to adults, who almost outnumber the delighted kids, is a retreat (or escape, if you will) from the anxieties of that scramble and the conformities it imposes. All escape is not neurotic. What's sick about a vacation?

There is here a germane paradox: while the films and the park were both Disney's deeply personal creations—and while in some ways they overlap as reflections of his attitudes—most of the criticisms that can reasonably be leveled at the movies simply do not apply to Disneyland.

Item: It is the only major amusement park in America which does not stimulate and capitalize upon hostile aggression and competitiveness. Nor upon fright. Its thrills (except to overgrownups like Ciardi and Halevy) are derived from and targeted to the child in us. I'm sure Dr. Spock would concur.

Item: Disneyland is relatively free of appeals to chauvinism and racism. The qualification is necessitated by an "Aunt Jemima" restaurant, a suspicious paucity of Negro help, even in the unskilled functions, and several concessions to stereotype: e. g., panicky blacks from a safari pursued by wild animals and climbing a totem pole having a white man symbolically at the top; and an exhibit of birds from different countries that speak English in stereotypical accents—mañana Mexicans, oo-la-la Frenchmen, pidgin Chinese, etc. The patronizing is not blatant, but it has a cumulative effect. Nevertheless, "It's a Small World" is more representative of the park's overall tone. Here the singing and dancing doll-children of the earth—white and black, brown and yellow—are equally attractive and charming. It is the one-world concept applied to a child's dream of a toy store come wondrously to life. The "adventure," originally presented in New York at the fair, scarcely reflected Uncle Walt's political views, so there may have been a liberal Moses in the bulrushes. (The commercial sponsor of the exhibit is the Bank of America, thinking globally these days since going international, with branches and agents everywhere this side of the dollar curtain.)

Item: Through the most intelligently managed system of controls—from parking to adventuring and dining—an entirely new kind of crowd behavior is stimulated. The same people who grow raucously assertive at ball games and prize fights, and in other amusement parks, here comport themselves with a conspicuous good nature and freedom from irritation that has been remarked by observers less than by biased press agents. Squalling infants, even at fatigue peak in the evening hours, are rare. The park's ban on alcohol, determined by its family orientation, reduces hooliganism to a minimum. In 1965 there was only one "rumble" in Disneyland, and it was swiftly suppressed, without counter violence. Last year was altogether untroubled. The almost Dutch cleanliness of the pavement and exhibits, under ceaseless janitoring, is contagious. People respond, consciously or otherwise, to their surroundings. Do you see cigarette butts and beer cans in a cemetery? Perhaps Khrushchev's eagerness to visit the park betrayed more than the roly-poly child in Nikita, and was to verify spy rumors that this was capitalist crowd handling at its smoothest—a technique applicable to his own centers of culture and rest. In a nation of endless queues, so corrupting to tempers and morale, Disneyland has devised a pattern of narrow-railed aisles, humorously suggesting a rat maze, and creating the illusion of a short line.

Item: There is a fixed policy of no-pitch, no-hustle. Instead of the pock-nosed carnies of boardwalk familiarity, fresh-faced youngsters, recruited mainly from the neighboring colleges, are given a six-week course in manners at the "University of Disneyland," and emerge as courteous as librarians.

Item: No gangsters, frontier or modern, are glorified. The park's only historical hero is Abe Lincoln, an astonishingly (even disturbingly) lifelike robot animated in speech and movement with electronic sorcery. The sponsor of the Great Emancipator spectacle, not surprisingly, is Lincoln Savings.

Offsetting these virtues, many critics remark the middle-class, somewhat shallow and anti-intellectual, character of the Disney entertainment product. One of the qualities of its babbittry is a stubborn, uncritical optimism: things are getting better and better; what's faulty will inevitably be corrected. An amusing illustration of this is in "Rocket to the Moon," a simulated space ride in that section of the Disney pie called Tomorrowland. It is circa 1970, and the taped voice of the alleged captain of the vessel proclaims as we approach home: "That cloudy mass you see on the earth is not smog—it is a bank of clouds. Smog was eliminated in North America some time ago." The audience (passengers) laughed. To their inflamed eyes this was wishful thinking. To Disney it was prophecy.

Disney's films have come in for a similar but heavier bombardment from the educated. Again to quote Dr. Sayers, whose misgivings are typical:

I think Disney falsifies life by pretending that everything is so sweet, so saccharine, without any conflict except the obvious conflict of violence. I think that even in the lines of Mother Goose you find an element that is in all great literature, and that is the realization that in life is a tragic tension between good and evil, between disaster and triumph, and it isn't all a matter of sweetness and light. The first people to know this intuitively are the children themselves. . . . This, I think, is the tragic break in Disney. He misplaces the sweetness and misplaces the violence, and the result is like soap opera, not really related to the great truths of life.

The Sayers anger might be extended to the bedrock Hollywood rationalization: "We have to give them what they want if we are to stay in business!" It overlooks the point that having retarded the child, our alternative is to cater to his deficiency. He wants what he has been taught to want.

To all such diatribes Disney responded with mild hurt and dismay; and a kind of bewilderment, since his belief in movies and television as solely entertainment was sincere. And because he was the only producer whose name on the marquee sold tickets (except possibly De Mille, another treacle salesman), his policy was fortified by the primary American judgment: what makes money must be good. As Al Capone once put it to the present writer: "How can a million dollars be wrong?"

Until his last illness Uncle Walt was reputed to be a happy uncle. He may have had dark moments in his private projection room, but he was smilingly insistent that happiness pervade his films, like a permanent Edgar Guest in the house. Motion pictures accounted for 46 per cent of his happily diversified empire; TV contributed 8 per cent more. Some indication of the cash value of happiness is the box-office intake of Mary Poppins, a gross approaching $50 million, with more ahead from reissue and eventual television rights. That Darn Cat is expected to do almost as well.

Until two decades ago, Disney catered very little to the national sweet tooth. He concentrated, rather, upon breaking ground and ground rules. Some of his innovations were recklessly avant-garde, earning him pages in the journals of serious students of the cinema. Robert Feild, a Harvard professor of art, wrote a carefully researched encomium, The Art of Walt Disney, in 1942.

Ironically, the decline of the Disney fortunes was touched off by his first big hit, Snow White, which the industry looked forward to, with secret glee, as a foolish departure from convention. When the picture became a noisy success, here and abroad, Walt and his normally cautious brother, Roy, went on an inflationary spree of feature-length animated cartoons, all enormously costly. The company had gone deep into debt to build the Burbank studio, and was in a precarious position unless each of these pictures would do better than pay its way. When Fantasia flopped, the Disneys were in Zeckendorf-type trouble, overexpanded and with dismal credit. The bankers had, somewhat reluctantly, loaned construction money to Disney when their community studies indicated that the site he had chosen for a studio could perhaps be better used for a hospital: that explains the oversize elevators and the reception desks at both ends of all halls. There is small likelihood today of the studio's being converted into a hospital, even with Disney gone, but the bankers' researches were right: the Catholic Church has since built a hospital across the street.

In desperation the Disneys were compelled to "go public," sharing ownership and control with an army of alien stockholders. For Walt this could have meant the sacrifice of artistic freedom to avoid bankruptcy. Shareholders disapprove of experimentation with their money. More immediately, the situation called for severe reduction of studio overhead. Disney's behavior in this period scarcely sustains the benevolent paternalism of his sedulously nurtured image. It is missing from the swollen library of Disneyana, like George Washington's false teeth. Even John McDonald, in an otherwise excellent Fortune piece, ignores the salient facts and substitutes sentimentality.

Disney first confronted the crisis of 1941 in a plea to his employees—a compound of passion and anguish and charm—that they take a wage cut or face wholesale firings. Everyone chose the cut to save the job. Within a fortnight Disney violated the gentlemen's agreement by dismissing thirteen men, of whom twelve were militants in the Screen Cartoonists Guild, then seeking recognition under the Wagner Act as the bargaining agent for the animated cartoon industry. In the prolonged strike that followed, to make Disney's studio a closed shop, the rehiring of the thirteen men was a major union demand.

In Fortune's account it was a "jurisdictional strike," and it added that "the event so dismayed Walt Disney that he wept." There are of course jurisdictional strikes, conflicts of power between labor blocs, but the phrase is also often used to arouse public prejudice against a legitimate walkout. As for the Disney tears, they were more likely symptoms of rage than of dismay. Filmed views of his confrontation of the picket line show him in apoplectic fury.

One of Disney's defensive measures was to exploit illusion, his specialty, as a strikebreaking weapon. The studio was 50 per cent struck. To convey the impression that only a few mavericks had gone out, photographs were taken from the air by the Los Angeles Times, a stern Uncle Walt having ordered that all the automobiles of the on-the-job workers and the studio cars and trucks be taken from sheds and garages and posed for the skyborne cameras.

The current obese solvency of the Disney complex (total income in 1965 was $110 million) is due only in part to the marshmallow cream puffs of intellectual disdain. The ship of fantasy is now a flotilla, all vessels controlled from a single port but each with a separate identity and cargo.

Until Disney, horizontal diversification was unknown in show business, unless popcorn can be so construed. Production and exhibition—recently divorced by a Supreme Court that has not prevented clandestine remarriage—is not diversification; it is neutral control.

Roy Disney has made a brilliant application of insurance-company structuring to the entertainment field. In fact, it has a tighter logic—that of fingers on a hand. Disneyland advertises Disney movies and animal personalities, Disney TV plugs the park, where commercial exhibits by TV advertisers reduce overhead and raise profits. And the same golden symbiosis applies to publications, comic strips, toys and 2,000 other products.

And yet—may not the empire crack and crumble with the death of Caesar? Stockholders and top staffers have long been worried about that, and even the atheists among them prayed for his immortality. Roy Disney may have joined them in supplication, but this did not preclude an insurance policy, with the company as beneficiary, larger than Mrs. Graham's coverage of Billy.

In my view, the apprehension is groundless. Disney Enterprises has long and widely been considered a one-man overlordship, a multiple genius surrounded by echoes. This is a dogma to make a legendary figure out of Uncle Walt. (Part of the ritual was an arrangement whereby Disney picked up all the studio Oscars, a usurpation resented by the creators.) The need for this aggrandizement stemmed in part from the studio's casting policy. Hollywood pundits say that "Disney gets them on the way up or on the way down," spurning the star system with its bloated salaries. To compete in the glamour game, Disney himself became the box-office attraction—as producer of a predictable family style and the father of a family of lovable animals.

Behind the façade has always been a legion of diverse, anonymous talents. Except for the loss of its generalissimo, this army is today intact, and with a general staff. Of the established components of the mother-lode, Disneyland now needs Disney no more than The Saturday Evening Post needs Ben Franklin. As for the live-action films and TV, they are also on their own, requiring to maintain altitude only an inventive mediocrity—the basic coin of Hollywood.

What may be affected (if the myth of Walt's indispensability has penetrated the banking heart) are the two gigantic projects of potential super profits, long on the expansionary drawing board—Mineral King and the invasion of Florida.

Closer to fruition, with ample pledged financing, Mineral King is planned as an Alpine village in the Sequoia National Forest, a year-round ski resort to accommodate 20,000 on the slopes at one time—and house and feed them. Tentative budget: $38 million. There are no insurmountable engineering difficulties; the only snag is political. An extended highway through mountain terrain is vital, and its cost would place too great an amortization burden on the resort. So the Disneys have been insisting that the state pay the bill, with an argument not altogether selfish: tourism is big business in California. Now Uncle Walt's extraordinary gifts of persuasion are missing—but so is Pat Brown. Governor Reagan will probably be happy to dedicate the road as a macadam memorial to his old friend.

More uncertain is the destiny of the Florida promotion, a jumbo Disneyland and "model city of the future," to be located near Orlando. Disney's biggest dream, the construction estimate is $500 million, it promises to ignite the biggest boom since William Jennings Bryan sold real estate in Florida.

It promises another reward for the Disneys—an atonement for the sickening mistake they made when they founded Disneyland. Building the park on cheap desert land (rather than in Burbank, the original idea) was sharp operation. But creating a powerful crowd magnet for outsiders to profit from was a galling oversight. In the last decade, a prosperous growth of hotels, motels, restaurants, gas stations and stores, even a wax museum (fantasy cribbing), have mushroomed around Disneyland. The neighboring town of Anaheim, formerly a sleepy village, is today a bustling big town, with a thriving John Birch Society chapter. It is a kind of cheating, like watching drive-in movies from outside the fence.

No such error is to tarnish the Florida triumph. Land has been bought, or optioned, in large concentric circles, including a buffer region. This time no pip-squeak parasites were to get rich off Uncle Walt. Now it is not certain that this sweet revenge will come to pass, but there is a straw in the wind: when news of Walt's demise came over the news ticker, the Disney stock dipped a melancholy dollar. However, it quickly rallied on the rumor of a merger with Litton Industries, a saber-toothed holding company. Such a union could signal the conquest of Florida.

Just how does one assay the Disney phenomenon? To call him a genius, as his sycophants do, is not only absurd; it is unenlightening. I think the man's unique success can be understood only by reference to his personal non-uniqueness. Of all the activists of public diversion, Uncle Walt was the one most precisely in the American midstream—in taste and morality, attitudes and opinions, prides and prejudices. The revealing clue is his familiar (and utterly sincere) statement that he never made a picture he didn't want his family to see. His competitors made pictures they thought, or guessed, the public wanted to see. Disney operated through maximal identification with John Doe; the others seek to discover what John Doe is like in order to cater to him.

The celebrated Disney inventiveness is the x-factor in the success story. A key to this might be found in his immaturity, or not realized maturity—not used here in the pejorative sense. Walt, growing from infant to child to youngster, to adult, to uncle and granduncle, never abandoned the delights and preoccupations of each stage of development, as most of us have done, at least in part. This was his "genius." Disneyland could have been created only by a man-child who never tired of toys or shed the belief that animals and insects have human attributes.

Not long ago he described his role with a characteristic metaphor:

"You know, I was stumped one day when a little boy asked, 'Do you draw Mickey Mouse?' I had to admit I didn't draw any more. 'Then you think up all the jokes and ideas?' 'No,' I said, 'I don't do that.' Finally he looked at me and said: 'Mr. Disney, just what do you do?' . . . 'Well,' I said, 'sometimes I think of myself as a little bee. I go from one area of the studio to another and gather pollen and sort of stimulate everybody. I guess that's the job I do.'"

It isn't every man who is privileged to write his own epitaph.

POLITICS OF COPPER

PROXY FIGHT IN THE CONGO

PAUL SEMONIN

Mr. Semonin received his M.A. at the University of Ghana and spent an additional year in French-speaking West Africa under a Ford Foundation fellowship.

Rarely since the inauguration of the "Open Door" policy at the Berlin Conference of 1884 has Washington missed an opportunity to send an emissary to referee a Congo contest. Therefore, Theodore Sorensen's recent trip to Kinshasa set off wide speculation again about Washington's role in the controversy over the new state's expropriation of the huge Belgian mining complex of Union Minière. The Congolese Government hired the former aide to the late President Kennedy along with a French lawyer named René Floriot to argue the Congo's case against the Belgian company.

The Nation caught the scent of these developments several weeks ago [editorial, February 13] by drawing attention to the mild U.S. reaction to the nationalization, while noting the involvement of American interests in a consortium rumored to be moving toward a purchase of the 40 per cent of shares in the new Congolese company being offered to foreign investors. Although these companies flatly denied the reports, the sight of NATO lawyers flocking to the scene brings back memories of the disarray in the West at Suez and raises many questions about their motives today.

Few observers puzzling over this display are likely to give the Congolese credit for putting the NATO powers on opposite sides of the negotiating table. To most veteran Congo hands the line-up resembles a kangaroo court, with the Western powers calling all the shots. But the remarkable fact seems to be the unprecedented flexibility of the young President in the face of these pressures. I suggest that the time has come to regard more carefully the coalescence of forces brought onto the scene by Mobutu's coup. The shaky political system inherited from the Belgians has clearly been streamlined to give a new generation of Congolese leaders increased maneuverability against the continued sway of Western powers.

Three guidelines are useful for analyzing the exceedingly complex developments surrounding the Union Minière affair and the corresponding strategy adopted by the Congolese to achieve "economic independence." The first point to recognize is the unique conditions posed by the role of the Congo state as a principal shareholder in Union Minière. Legal participation by the Congolese Government in an important sector of the Belgian economy has greatly complicated the latter's relations with its former colony and has spurred efforts toward disengagement. The Union Minière conflict has characteristics of a proxy fight between major shareholders for control over a corporation rather than pure nationalization.

Second, the expropriation, with all its legal ironies, should be set squarely in the context of the sharpened rivalries in the Atlantic community. Sorensen and Floriot's bizarre appearance across the table from the Belgians corresponds to the international conjuncture facing the developing Congolese nation.

Third, the ulterior motives or "side effects" of American policy beyond the designated cold-war priorities should be kept in mind. European powers are beginning to question the avowed anti-Communist aims of Washington's containment policy in the light of a growing American penetration of their markets.

President Mobutu's statement last summer, following the dissolution of the diamond mining company Forminière, keynotes the legal roots of his government's policy toward Union Minière. "Why nationalize?" he asked a Belgian television audience, "I don't need to nationalize." He described the dissolution of Forminière, in which the Congolese state held a 55 per cent share, as a move "to redress the balance of corporate control."

The most troublesome aspect of the Union Minière case for the juridically minded Belgian businessmen stemmed from similarly sizable holdings in the company which the new state inherited from the old colonial administration. Belgian business circles were naturally alarmed before independence by the prospect of the Congolese controlling 35.7 per cent of the voting rights in Union Minière by virtue of the colonial state's two-third share in a charter company called the Comité Spécial du Katanga (CSK).

Recognizing the danger of such legalized "mixed enterprise," Belgian officials arranged with the Compagnie du Katanga, a private company holding the other one-third share of CSK, to dissolve the charter company on June 27, 1960, only three days before independence. This act reduced the voting rights controlled by the Congolese state in Union Minière by one-third to 24.5 per cent which while still the largest shareholding was smaller than the voting bloc formed by the other major shareholders, Société Générale, Tanganyika Concessions and Compagnie du Katanga.

Reactions varied in Belgium when the act dissolving the CSK was never formally ratified by the Congolese parliament, although the Belgian Government refused to cede to the Congolese titles they possessed in private companies on the ground that these were "held in trust" to guarantee payment of the external debt inherited by the Congolese from the colonial administration. Belgium was not forced to negotiate the transfer of the Congo's portfolio of investments, including the Union Minière shares, until the arch foe of the present government, Moïse Tshombe, issued a decree on November 29, 1964, rescinding the concessionary rights of three Belgian-run companies, including the CSK. Tshombe's provocative gesture melted into the cigar smoke at Val Duchesse castle in Belgium three months later when he met privately with delegates from the Compagnie du Katanga to sign an agreement highly favorable to the Belgians. The private agreement confirmed the diminution of the Congo's voting rights in Union Minière to 24.5 per cent, and opened the way to the signing of a separate bilateral treaty on February 6, 1965, dealing with the whole gamut of financial questions between the two countries.

The new Congolese cabinet appointed by Mobutu called into question portions of this treaty on May 6 last year when it announced that by January 1, 1967, all companies legally constituted in the Congo would have to move their headquarters to the Congo. Union Minière demonstrated its inscrutable paternalism then by answering the Congolese with a conciliatory statement setting down firmly the limits of the company's generosity. The company's president, Louis Wallef, told the annual general meeting on May 26 that the board of directors had decided to set up an "administrative headquarters" in Kinshasa. Wallef made a clear distinction, however, between the opening of administrative headquarters and "the plan for a company established under Congolese law," which was "fraught with difficulties" owing to its "fiscal implications."

Last fall Wallef led the company's delegation to Kinshasa for formal negotiations with Congolese officials about the transfer. He proposed a geographic division of Union Minière into two companies, Union Minière du Congo, a mining company consisting of the company's assets in the Congo, and Union Minière et Métallurgie, a Brussels-based company managing the sales end of the new company's activities, its monetary reserves and portfolio of investments. Shares in the first company were to be split fifty-fifty, while the Congo's share in the second company was to be the same 18 per cent held in the old company.*

President Mobutu's complaint later about the high-handed manner in which Wallef conducted the talks might normally be attributed to hurt Congolese pride. But other published reports confirm Mobutu's claim that the Union Minière president at first flatly refused to negotiate with the appointed Congolese delegation headed by Albert Ndele, governor of the National Bank. He reportedly asked the Congolese: "Where are your advisers? How can we start talking in their absence?"

Wallef's composure would not have been ruffled if he had faced, as in the past, a subaltern clerk in the guise of cabinet minister carrying brief cases of Belgian advice

*The shares held by each party should not be confused with their voting rights: the Congo controlled 25.4 per cent of the shares and 35.7 per cent of the country's voting rights before the dissolution of CSK; afterward the Congo held 18 per cent shares and 24.5 per cent of the voting rights.

under each arm. But President Mobutu's closest advisers on economic policy are neither subaltern clerks nor Belgians but young university graduates schooled in "free enterprise" economics and Belgian law. Wallef entered the room to find himself alone with a "Lumumbist" lawyer, a Congolese banker and a post-Keynesian economist bargaining for control over a corporation instead of looking for the perennial matabiche or handout.

The talks ultimately foundered on more substantive issues than Wallef's crusty contempt for Congolese negotiators. After nearing a signed agreement in early December, negotiations suddenly hung fire on several issues pertaining to the marketing of the new Congolese company's products. On a last-minute trip to Brussels shortly before Christmas, Congolese Foreign Minister Bomboko recounted how the Congolese had discovered on rereading the Union Minière proposal that the Congo would lose control over all copper leaving the country, including the $200 million worth then moving through the shipment "pipe line." The agreement required them to accept on faith Union Minière's accounting of sales without any legal right to be informed of marketing procedures. Marketing of Union Minière's products had previously been entrusted to a separate company, which kept vital sales information cloaked in secrecy.

The Financial Times reported that among the "points of friction" leading to the breakdown of negotiations were the old company's request for control of marketing, a 6 per cent tax on the sales of copper and key posts on the board of the new company, including the chairmanship. The journal claimed that the underlying purpose of the Congolese efforts to secure the transfer of the company's head offices was the desire to have proceeds from export sales channeled through sources other than the Belgian National Bank in Brussels. Union Minière's strict control over marketing, and the cloistered management of external assets, represented in Congolese eyes similar financial controls dating from colonial days which, to borrow a phrase from the Belgians, did not provide them with "adequate security for their investments" and constituted major obstacles to any effective planning of the "national economy."

Union Minière's tersely worded statement on December 23, only a week before the Congolese deadline for the transfer of company headquarters, announced that "as a matter of law and fact, the domicile and central headquarters of the company could not be transferred to Kinshasa." Besides requiring the unanimous consent of all shareholders, a transfer placing "all the assets of the company situated outside the Congo" under Congolese jurisdiction would, according to the board, deny shareholders adequate security for their investments.

The company's statement made no reference to the real Congolese grievances. Kinshasa's representatives were not bargaining merely to get their hands on Union Minière's external assets but rather to mitigate various forms of financial hegemony associated with previous marketing practices, the handling of customs duties and balance of payments accounts.

Prospects for any compromise solution went by the board with the Congolese decision to enforce the deadline on the company's transfer. The formation of a new company by the Congolese Government on December 31, Congolaise Générale des Minerais, was a point of no return. Even though concessions may still be made and new agreements reached, each party altered significantly the terms of the dispute after this rupture, leaving behind them numerous burned bridges.

Union Minière's statement on January 3 shows the firmness with which the company met the Congolese action. Its most significant step was the nullification of the Congo state's shareholding in Union Minière. By entrusting the company's mining concession to a new company, the board of directors argued, the Congolese Government had "rendered null and void the Congolese participation in Union Minière, as well as the connected rights." The company declared with a curiously "business as usual" blandness that Union Minière would be able to continue "satisfactory activities" whether or not the company gains any indemnification for its losses.

How does a company claiming to have lost the bulk of assets worth an estimated $800 million expect to continue "business as usual" with assets outside the Congo which the company itself values at only a "sizeable fraction" of the property lost? For the time being the company can be reasonably confident of some compensation from continued control over the marketing of Congolese copper since the agreement of "technical cooperation" signed on February 17 between the Congolese company and Société Générale des Minerais, a subsidiary of Union Minière, designates the latter as the "contracting administrative and technical agent" of the Congolese company. Belgian investors have additional assurance in that the Congolese have also agreed to submit the question of compensation to international arbitration.

The board of director's response to the Congolese action was undoubtedly based on other long-run benefits deriving from carefully thought out plans for disposing of the new liabilities associated with the Congo operations since independence. Rumors in Brussels last May, for example, intimated that company officials were discussing even then a plan for "nationalization" with indemnification as a suitable way out. The increasing liabilities created by the Congolese demands for integration into the "national economy" and the poor economic health of the country in general had long ruffled the sober business sense of Belgian investors. Union Minière's statement December 23 claimed that had the new fiscal charges applied in 1966 been enforced in 1965, the net profit of 843 million Belgian francs would have been transformed into a loss of 778 million. Loss of income on the dual rate of currency exchange had also cut deeply into the company's rate of profit since 1963. Despite a period of rising production and high prices, the net profit per share for the last four years averaged only 49 francs compared to 274 francs in 1959.

Viewed over the long run, a serious adjustment not only seemed inevitable but very likely was desirable in Belgian opinion. While a "geographic division" of the companies' assets was probably the preferable solution, expropriation achieved many of the same goals. The Congolese would have to shoulder the tax load and the losses on currency exchange while the "sizable fraction" of the old company's external assets would be freed from the dangerous flywheel effect of Congolese shareholding that had disturbed the equilibrium of Belgian finance for years.

31

The presence of Sorensen and Floriot on the scene testifies to the international pressures influencing Union Minière's decision to renovate its ties with the Congo. French purchases of Congolese copper had mounted spectacularly in the first six months of 1966 until France was buying an estimated 40 per cent of the Congo's copper. Jean Nicault, head of the French mining mission in the Congo, stated flatly after the formation of the new Congolese company that "France is firmly decided to support the Congo in the present difficulties it is going through in the mining domain." After overtures from Foreign Minister Bomboko, representatives of the consortium organized by Banque Lambert, including the French metal fabricators Penarroya and an Anglo-American company, Rhodesian Selection Trust, flew to Kinshasa in mid-February as "observers" to report on the evolution of negotiations. While these companies denied any intent to force Union Minière out, their presence probably served to keep the Belgians "honest" in their talks with Congolese officials.

Belgium's competitors are not likely to risk the capital or the political repercussions to make a really clean sweep and take over Union Minière's operations. The real stakes generating these veiled bids are the country's vast unexploited mineral deposits which the Congolese, along with various Western interests, refuse to leave on private preserves forbidden to everyone except the Belgians. Belgian finance appears in this respect to be yielding to pressure for an international capitalization of the Congo's resources—comparable to the precedent set by France in encouraging consortium financing of the huge manganese deposits in Gabon, or the iron ore in Guinea and Mauritania. In adopting this policy France, too, was adjusting to the strain on its resources by sharing the cost of developing the most vital ore bodies.

President Mobutu's desire to create a viable "national economy" obviously runs counter to this trend toward the opening of the country's resources to unfettered capitalist powers. It would be a mistake, however, to interpret his present Open Door policy simply as a capitulation to Western powers or a sellout to American interests. As least temporarily, the effect has been to loosen the grip of Société Générale's financial empire on the country's economy. Rivalries among other Western powers vying for increased influence on or entry into the Congo market provide the Congolese with a breathing space within the interstices of the vast financial empires of the West. Viewing with a certain realism their limited resources for combating the nefarious behavior of these interests, the Congolese seem to be evolving a variation on the tactic of "nonalignment," using one mammoth power to offset another.

The United States tends to be the primary target of Belgian resentment at the Congo's manipulation of the old American Open Door policy. United States Ambassador to Belgium, Ridgeway Knight, had to allay Belgian fears at the growth of American influence in a speech last year to the Cercle Royal Africain, whose members rank among the most influential Belgian interests in the Congo. "You can rest assured," he said, "that the United States has no secret designs or projects for seizing the Congo."

Actually, there does seem to be a swing of the pendulum away from the peak period of 1964-65 when U.S. military aid to the Congo was four times that of Belgium. And after momentarily replacing Belgium as the chief supplier of goods to the Congo in 1963, the United States has slipped lately in the face of surging competition from other European countries.

Bachir Ben Yachmid, the editor of the popular African magazine, Jeune Afrique, observed not so long ago that American intervention in the Congo was originally based on the theory that Lumumba's repudiation of Belgian hegemony had created a "vacuum," eyed enviously by the Soviet Union. Looked at through the kaleidoscope of 1960, the threat of Soviet intervention in the Congo, or later the artfully manipulated China scare, may indeed have appeared more substantial than the antagonisms among Western nations in guiding the formulation of American policy. Yet now when the dust has settled, the former seem too illusory to explain fully the motives behind this policy. After all, the architect of our containment policy, John Foster Dulles, once remarked: "The colonial system is obsolete and should be done away with as soon as possible." His militant anti-communism clearly went hand in hand with a "limited economic war" on the private spheres of influence formerly belonging to European powers.

American Congo policy will undoubtedly be overhauled along with the rest of our African policy once the State Department digests the Korry report on African affairs submitted to President Johnson last fall. Apparently the report describes the Congo situation as "dangerously fluid." Ambassador Godley's recall from Kinshasa in October reflected the growing apprehension with President Mobutu's policies long before the Union Minière crisis. Theodore Sorensen's voyage to the Congo, therefore, became the hinge on which American interests swung during the recent crisis.

The amelioration of the Congo's relations with neighboring African countries as the rebellion declined modestly enhances President Mobutu's position in these delicate maneuvers. Since the Nairobi conference of East African heads of state last April, his prestige in the crucial states adjoining the Congo has risen enormously. The threat of Tshombe's return has lessened considerably, especially in the light of complaints by a Belgian senator that the Belgian Government had denied three requests by Tshombe for a visa during the height of the Union Minière controversy. Mobutu's real test remains his handling of the strange bedfellows arguing his case against Union Minière. Should Washington and Brussels develop any concerted opposition to his policies, the tiny breathing space afforded by their rivalry could close on him like a vise.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

'Losing Our Cool' — in Ghana

THE RISE AND FALL OF KWAME NKRUMAH: A Study of Personal Rule in Africa. By Henry L. Bretton. Frederick A. Praeger. 232 pp. $5.95.

CONOR CRUISE O'BRIEN

Mr. O'Brien, former Vice Chancellor of the University of Ghana, is now the Albert Schweitzer Professor of Humanities at New York University. He is the author of To Katanga and Back (Simon & Schuster) and Writers and Politics (Pantheon).

"When Nkrumah"—says Professor Bretton in his preface—"admonished me to be 'intellectually honest' in my writings about Ghana, I decided there and then to oblige by writing a book addressed to the core problem of Ghana—namely Kwame Nkrumah and his political machine."

Henry Bretton is well qualified to undertake the task so rashly assigned to him by Ghana's Osagyefo. A professor of political science at the University of Michigan, he has devoted his main interest to Africa, especially West Africa, over the past ten years. His book, Power and Stability in Nigeria, published during the heyday of the Federation, at the time when the "successful progress" of that "great democratic experiment" was being most loudly heralded, went behind the façade of the Nigerian system and laid bare essential weaknesses in the structure itself. Subsequent events have demonstrated the validity of his analysis. Those—and there will be many—who will be angered by his harsh criticisms of Nkrumah's Ghana ought, before pronouncing any judgment on it, to read also his Nigerian book.

Bretton gathered materials for the present work in 1956—that is, before independence—and again in 1959 and 1962: his most extended stay was, however, in 1964-65, during the last period of Nkrumah's reign. I suspect he would have written a somewhat different book—not greatly different in substance but significantly so in tone and emphasis—had he not had the experience of living there at that particular time. I was in Ghana then—it was the last period of my three-year tenure at the University of Ghana—and as Bretton and I were both interested in the same phenomena, and undergoing their impact in similar ways, we often compared notes. When he visited the country briefly early in 1964, during a disturbed period for the university, I was struck by the air of almost clinical detachment with which he contemplated the busy scene (it was a time of mass demonstrations, arrests and deportations).

We were in some danger of losing our cool, but he as a political scientist seemed to look at the matter as a biologist might look at some particularly rich specimen of pond life. I remember him examining with eager curiosity some hitherto unclassified sub-variety of "Messianic Dedication" (a column devoted to extolling Nkrumah's leadership in Eric Heymann's Evening News), and myself being moved, rather absurdly, to protest: "Henry, that's our evening paper!" When, not long after, he joined as it were the denizens of the pond, his perspective necessarily altered somewhat; not that his method of investigation changed but that it was impossible, living in Ghana, reading its press, and listening to its radio, not to feel more strongly about the Messianic Dedication than those who read or heard about him from afar, through media with more varied interests, would be likely to do. At least one of Nkrumah's more sensitive non-African admirers resolved his dilemma by refusing either to read the local press or listen to the local radio. By this strategy, one got one's news when the air-mail edition of The Times reached Accra from London and one was therefore in a position to protest, in unsullied innocence, if that newspaper made allegations about any "cult of personality" in Ghana.

For Henry Bretton, as a political scientist, this resource of voluntary ignorance was not available. His book is, in my view, the better for his sojourn in Ghana, but the reader should be aware that in The Rise and Fall of Kwame Nkrumah the accent is necessarily on the fall, because it was during the last and worst period of Nkrumah's rule that the author actually lived in Ghana—the period of most hysterical adulation, of most panicky and spendthrift administration, and of most general and heartfelt desire for an end of the regime. Similar considerations apply to my own comments; I find almost invariably that people who lived in Ghana at earlier phases than I did are more gentle in their judgments on Nkrumah and his regime than I can be. The gentlest in their judgment, and the most enthusiastic are those who never lived in Ghana at all.

Bretton's book is in five main sections. In the first, "Background to Personal Rule," he gives proper weight to a factor often overlooked by most British and some other critics of Nkrumah's authoritarian regime. This is the fact that the colonial regime, whose levers of power Nkrumah inherited, was itself essentially authoritarian:

The colonial regime, beneath a thin veneer of democratic formalism, rested essentially on a highly centralized, hierarchical, authoritarian administration that was deliberately somewhat militaristic. As a matter of policy, the democratic content of the political system at home was not passed on to the subject peoples. It appears that a more or less determined effort was made, behind a smokescreen of constitutionality, to extend to the African successor regime not the heritage of the Westminster model of parliamentary democracy but the authoritarian features of the colonial administration.

This factor applied throughout colonial Africa, and it is hard to see how anyone can have seriously expected institutions of genuine parliamentary democracy to spring up overnight after independence, among people whose only experience of centralized, modern government was of an authoritarian system—and whose experience of traditional systems hinged on chiefs appointed by the authoritarian central government and subservient to it.

In section two, "Kwame Nkrumah: the Political Man," Bretton gives a general verdict which seems fair on Nkrumah's character and aspirations:

Kwame Nkrumah was a moderately capable, highly volatile and energetic, somewhat professional, somewhat amateurish leader. On public record, he was affable, readily forgiving, decidedly humane. Guiding his conduct, there was undoubtedly a strong desire to correct the injustices wrought by the colonial powers in Africa—and in particular upon his people—and a vision, albeit somewhat darkly seen, that he could, by creating a new society in Ghana, correct the social evils he believed to have been developed over a thousand years of feudalism and capitalism. He undoubtedly had other virtues and probably no fewer than the normal share of weaknesses found in political leaders.

Some of the remarks in the same chapter on Nkrumah's political advisers seem to me less firmly grounded. In particular I think that the influence of Geoffrey Bing was more limited both in time and otherwise than the reader might infer from Bretton's references. In the final and worst period of Nkrumah's rule I have reason to believe that Mr. Bing wielded little or no influence. I believe also that his influence latterly tended to be on the side of restraint—and that is why it waned. Dr. Alan Nunn May (also mentioned as an adviser) had little or no influence, at least in the last period—being compromised in Nkrumah's eyes by his refusal to abet the "take-over" plans for the university.

In the same section Bretton mentions the attempts on Nkrumah's life and notes that these "did not emanate only from domestic sources." He mentions "neighbouring countries"—whose governments did indeed have reason to dislike Nkrumah—and he says that Nkrumah was "positively obsessed by fear of the Central Intelligence Agency." Now I am not one of those who believe that the CIA was responsible for Nkrumah's fall—I agree with Bretton that the domestic reasons for that were so ample as to make an external hypothesis superfluous—but I cannot feel that the word "obsessed" is the mot juste here. It suggests that preoccupation with the activities of this agency was irrational, an idée fixe. I cannot see that it was irrational. He knew that the CIA was active in Ghana, and also that it had played a significant part in the downfall, and perhaps in the deaths, of other leaders in Africa and Asia; he did not know what it was doing in Ghana or what it intended, or whether anyone else knew what it was doing or what it intended; he did know that from time to time people threw grenades or fired shots in his direction. In the circumstances it seems to me that his preoccupation with the workings of this agency was one of the less whimsical elements in his make-up.

The third and fourth sections are entitled "Building the Political Machine." The choice of the word "machine" instead of "party" is not fortuitous; one of the author's main points is that there really was no party—no entity with a collective will of its own—but only a machine which, under the outward appearance of a party, served to proclaim and help carry out whatever the leader might wish. Here and in his footnotes, Bretton has some scathing comments on certain academic writers who took the "mass-mobilization" Convention People's Party at its face value. His remarks are certainly justified, for the final years of the Nkrumah regime, and possibly for the earlier years also; there are, however, those who claim that the concept of "the party" as something of a force in itself had validity in earlier years, especially before independence, and that the condition which Bretton accurately describes was reached only late, and by a long process of degeneration, in which the purging of Nkrumah's most able collaborator, Gbedemah, played a decisive part. If this is so—and I think a reasonable case for it can be made—then the academic writers at whom Bretton snipes—David Apter is one of them—are not so wide of the mark as he suggests; they were, after all, writing from the perspective of an earlier point of time, with the confident morning of the movement more clearly in sight, and without prevision of its shady close.

In the fourth section Bretton cites some of the revelations about the corruption of Nkrumah and his regime, and in particular the charge that Nkrumah, in addition to amounts deposited for him in Ghana and abroad, owned extensive real estate holdings and commercial property worth "several million pounds." It may well be so; certainly Ayeh-Kumi's role, as "financial adviser to the President," his intense activity in that capacity and obvious closeness to the seat of power, his enthusiasm for raising large sums of money at high interest rates and short repayment periods from independent foreign capitalists (a characteristic of which I had direct experience in connection with the ill-fated Ghana Medical School) were among the incongruous phenomena of scientific socialism in its Nkrumahist development.

It is impossible to say whether the "Socialist" regime in Ghana was more or less corrupt than the "democratic" one in Nigeria; here—as in other, more rhetorical domains—there was earnest competition between the two systems. As regards the extent of Nkrumah's personal enrichment, however, I think the post-coup revelations of Ayeh-Kumi and others should be treated with some reserve. They were, after all, in the hands of Nkrumah's enemies; they were open to grave charges themselves, as Nkrumah's close, and in some cases most detested, associates; they had every incentive to maximize Nkrumah's ill-gotten gains, if they were to have any hope of eventually enjoying any part of their own. I doubt whether Nkrumah is now a very wealthy man. Vast sums undoubtedly passed through his hands, but he was a generous man—"princely" in many ways, including the old-fashioned sense of bestowing lavish gifts on friends, mistresses, courtiers, servants, philosophers and soothsayers. Tshombe, a more modern figure, makes a wealthier exile, as the contrast between Madrid and Conakry would suggest.

In the same section Bretton has a number of sound and acid judgments on a body of men who, in the opinion of some outside commentators—and sometimes in their own heated imaginations—manipulated Nkrumah from behind the scenes:

It is hard to imagine a weaker group, a group more dependent on one leader for its very survival than the vaunted Ghanaian Left.

What members of the Left had been able to do, and with reasonable success, was to provide Nkrumah with sets of rationales—literally so in Consciencism—that he could use to cloak the old-fashioned, garden-variety political machine in ideologically respectable garments. . . .

If the Leader commanded "turn left," one followed. If he commanded the opposite, one followed also. For whatever Nkrumah wanted was, by definition, correct ideology. It was Nkrumahism.

In section five, "The Final Year," Bretton is dealing with phenomena to which he was able to give close and continuous on-the-spot scrutiny; this section is the strongest in the book, containing a number of grim, succinct and well-founded verdicts on the last phase of Nkrumahism. On economic planning:

Thus, long-range considerations of personnel, manpower recruitment, and resource planning were regularly thrown to the winds, increasingly so toward the end as a result of mounting economic pressure. Such subtle essentials of planning as phasing—the inner logic governing each plan segment and dictating specific courses of action and prescribing appropriate administration machinery—were regularly overridden by ad hoc, spur-of-the-moment decisions. These decisions, as likely as not emerging from a . . . conference between Nkrumah and his Minister of Finance or a high-pressure salesman from one of the more highly industrialized countries, would change budget estimates, reallocate expenditures, transfer functions from one Ministry to another, change intra- and inter-agency allocations at will. Major policy changes were made in this fashion regardless of provisions in the annual or long-range plans, frequently based on no research or systematic consultation whatsoever and disregarding the wholly subordinate, decorative planning, state control, and audit agencies and commissions. Nebulous projects, such as "continent planning" in the case of the 1965 budget, were allowed to influence changes in the estimates, including allocation of actual working capital to "basic-industry construction" although none of the existing plans had made provision for that at this stage.

And this on the Parliament and investigations into corruption, etc.:

On the very few occasions when some kind of action was taken in response to major criticism first voiced on the floor of the Assembly, it was certain that a number of conditions had first been met: (1) an abuse had been uncovered that benefited a person or persons other than the President or anyone favored by the President; (2) a need had been established for a public scape-goat in order to divert public attention from a major flaw in administration; and (3) the co-operation of the President had been secured to stage the appropriate debate, to allow a motion of censure to be introduced, and to allow the press to publish the names of the hapless culprits.

Section six, "Evaluation: The Effects of Personal Rule," and with it the Epilogue seem to me looser and more miscellaneous, incorporating some more sweeping and, to my mind, more doubtful judgments. I see little reason to believe that Nkrumah "was actually delivering Ghana into the economic, political and military grip of either one or both of the Communist powers." The only solid reality here seems to me to be the Russian-trained Presidential guard, representing perhaps a rather faintly potential "military grip." Politically, Ghana remained, as Bretton's book amply shows, in the personal grip of Kwame Nkrumah, who most certainly had no intention of relinquishing this grip for anyone. Economically, Ghana was not in the grip of anyone at all, not even its own government, and certainly not in that of the exporters of Bull's Blood and canned lychees. And how could any government, with the most sinister will in the world, deliver a country into the grip of both Russia and China in 1965, 1966 or the foreseeable future?

In this part of the book Bretton also gives the regime credit—belatedly but not ungenerously—for its constructive economic achievements:

By general consensus, the principal monument to Nkrumah's drive, energy, and vision is the Volta River project at Akosombo, with its diverse and far-reaching benefits—its production of hydro-electric power and its potential for creating further industrialization, new sources of internal commerce, and new means of internal transportation. The project could eventually free millions of Ghanaians from the bonds of poverty and ignorance.

He goes on to praise it also for its remarkable achievement in the expansion of education at every level. He hardly gives Nkrumah due credit however for what may prove his most lasting achievement: his contribution to nation building. His personality and style of leadership were such that the responses to him, both favorable and unfavorable, cut right across tribal lines. These responses developed in such a way that it can be said with truth that in the beginning he united most of Ghana behind him and in the end he united most of Ghana against him. He left Ghana with very great problems but he also left it with a greater sense of national unity and purpose than has been achieved anywhere else in tropical Africa. This was not all Nkrumah's doing, and not all of Nkrumah's contribution to it was voluntary, but he nonetheless played a significant part in the process of converting a unit with arbitrary boundaries into a nation.

Those who want to know "what went wrong in Ghana" could not do better than read The Rise and Fall of Kwame Nkrumah. Subject to certain queries, most of which I have tried to indicate, it is an acute and valid piece of political pathology. Yet reading it I found myself saying not "it wasn't as bad as all that"—because it was—but "it wasn't as bad as this would make you think it was if you read this and hadn't been there."

There was and there remains in the Ghanaian character an elastic, astute power of adjustment, good-humored in appearance, and also (but in a somewhat different way) good-humored in substance. Influenced by this characteristic, the actual workings of the dictatorship were never as horrendous as the zeal of its own press sought to suggest. Bretton himself notes that the record is unstained by any political execution; this notable achievement is symptomatic of much else, distinguishing this regime from the savage dictatorships of Europe. Under Kwame Nkrumah this gifted, cautious, courteous people underwent the first—expensive but effective—phase of its political education. The second phase is now in progress. I look forward to reading, in due course, an interim report on it by Professor Bretton.

A Talk With Doris Lessing

FLORENCE HOWE

On leave from Goucher College, where she teaches English, Miss Howe conducted an interview with Miss Lessing in October, 1966. What follows are excerpted portions of the interview. Doris Lessing, born in Rhodesia, is the author of novels, short stories and personal accounts of life in Africa and England, where she has lived for the last sixteen years. Among her many works are the 4-volume novel series, Children of Violence and The Golden Notebook (both Simon & Schuster).

My father, by white terms, was poor. . . . But he had 3,000 acres of land. He paid 10 bob an acre for it, and this was land off which Africans had been thrown—into reserves. . . . After the Second World War, they did this all again. And for all I know, they're doing it now, this very minute. They "opened up an area to white occupation," as they call it, and the whites coming back from the war got it, and I think it cost 5 bob an acre. Maybe it was 10. The white farmer is given a whopping big loan from the land bank, and he's in business. My father employed, depending on the season, anywhere between forty to sixty Africans, and an adult male was paid 12/6 a month, which is what, $1.50? The African is given a day to build himself a hut in the compound. He'll dig a trench, cut some logs, put in the logs, throw some mud on the logs, put some thatch on top of that, and in that he will live. There's no sanitation. A great many farms are like this, as I speak. I'm not talking about vanished conditions.

Since I came to England—I've been here for sixteen years—the whole attitude has changed about color—in two ways. When I came, South Africa hardly existed except for a tiny group of left wingers who went on about it. Now it's in everybody's consciousness. Nobody ever heard of Rhodesia—it didn't exist. Now there's a kind of political consciousness that is new. And the other thing, very strong, is a color prejudice in this country—in England—that hasn't begun to really show. I think we're going to be appalled when it shows. . . .

Prejudice is very deep in this country, anti-Semitism and anti-color. But you'll find middle-class people with exactly the same prejudices, using careful language but showing it, whereas working-class people are likely to come out with it. And I prefer that. I prefer it "out" to a kind of hidden language, because people these days who will use language to conceal what they really feel are likely to be concealing it from themselves as well, and that is frightening. It's much more frightening than someone in the open, someone who says, "I'd like to bash those niggers if they take my job," something straightforward about that.

What about Vietnam?

I can't say anything about Vietnam except a sense of despair, really. Can one really see this ending? Nobody wants to end it fast, except the Vietnamese. I don't know what's the matter with us. What struck me recently is that somewhere buried in me is a foolish idealist that believes that people must be ashamed of behaving badly. Then I read about white people beating up black children, and not being ashamed of it. Almost as if there's a permanent boil in the human soul.

Do you find it difficult to write?

Actually I'm too prolific. But I agree with Virginia Woolf that everybody should have a private income—what was it, £500 a year? Five hundred a year would have made all the difference to my life. Even now.

Why do you consider The Golden Notebook a failure?

The Golden Notebook was an extremely carefully constructed book. And the way it's constructed says what the book is about—which very few people have understood. . . . What The Golden Notebook is taken to be by practically everyone is a latter-day feminism. What I was doing is this: I was thinking about the kind of ideas we take for granted . . . a complex of ideas which could be described as Left—and which were born with the French Revolution. And they're all to do with freedom. They are revolutionary ideas that are no longer revolutionary and have been absorbed into the fabric of how we live. And they're ideas that fit together in a system, broadly speaking, nonreligious in the old sense, and have to do with the individual in relation to his society and the rights of the individual. Which is a new idea and we don't realize how new it is. We take it absolutely for granted. Three hundred years ago it wouldn't have been taken for granted. And in parts of the world now it wouldn't be—they'd just look at you and not know what you were talking about. But we take it for granted. . . .

There was a time in my life when I was a member of a Communist group which was pure—they had no contact with any kind of reality. It must have been blessed by Lenin from his grave, it was so pure. The thing was, if we had been in any other part of the world, where in fact there was a Communist party, the beautiful purity of the ideas that we were trying to operate couldn't have worked. I found this when I came to England and had a short association with the British Communist Party.

Was this in Rhodesia?

Well, the point was there was no Communist party in Rhodesia. And for a period of about three years, a group of enormously idealistic and mostly extremely intellectual people created a Communist party in a vacuum which no existing Communist party anywhere in the world would have recognized as such. But you see, this experience is not so way out as one might think, because if you talk to other Communists—communism isn't one thing; it varies from country to country—you find that's what left-wing movements have in common, I think, and this is true not only of the Communist Party, but certainly true of left-wing labor: one is always living in a state of embattled ideas. In fact, nothing is taken for granted. . . .

I thought that if I wrote a book about the kind of experiences that people I knew had had, I would in fact be writing a book about the kind of ideas people were having—almost as a record. I wrote from inside a woman's viewpoint, naturally, since I am one. Ideas about equality of women and so on. Inside any left-wing group I've been a member of—these ideas are always there, being debated in one way or another and fought out in private relationships. But they are the ideas you would find in the Sunday Times Supplement in a cruder form—they're the same ideas. What I'm trying to say is that the left-wing idea is not left wing at all. Because it always has to do with the individual, the rights of. Rights. Fair play. Justice. When The Golden Notebook came out, I was astonished that people got so emotional about that book, one way or another. They didn't bother to see, even to look at, how it was shaped. I could mention a dozen books by male authors in which the attitudes to women are the obverse, mirror attitudes, of the attitudes to men in The Golden Notebook. But no one would say that these men are anti-women. They would say—I don't know—this man has a problem or he's screwed up, or something. Because after all, deep problems very often are expressed through sex. But I articulated the same things from a female point of view, and this is what was interesting. It was taken as a kind of banner.

In the last generation women have become what is known as free. And I don't want to get into an argument about how free they are—that's not the point. The point is they're still fighting battles to get free—and rightly. And men are still—some men, you know—some men resist it. But what is interesting, what interests me—what interests me in that book—was, in fact, the ideas. And they still interest me because you have to be apart, a little bit, from an idea before you can see it, even in association with another one. What I'm trying to say is that it was a detached book. It was a failure, of course, for if it had been a success, then people wouldn't get so damned emotional when I didn't want them to be. . . .

Women will say to one another in conversation, or to their own private man, something they'd never dream of saying publicly for fear of being called anti-feminine or anti-male. The relationship between the sexes everywhere, not just in Western society, is so much of a melting pot. It's like the color bar—all kinds of emotions that don't belong get sucked in. You know, I'm convinced that all sorts of emotions that have nothing to do with color get associated around the color bar. Similarly with men and women, any sort of loaded point sucks in anger or fear. . . . I don't think we understand nearly as much as we think we understand about what goes on.

You know, the Free Women section in The Golden Notebook—the envelope—I was really trying to express my sense of despair about writing a conventional novel in that. Actually that is an absolutely whole conventional novel, and the rest of the book is the material that went into making it. One of the things I was saying was: Well, look, this is a conventional novel. God knows, I write them myself and doubtless will again. One has this feeling after writing a novel. There it is: 120,000 words; it's got a nice shape and the reviewers will say this and that. And the bloody complexity that went into it. And it's always a lie. And the terrible despair. So you've written a good novel or a moderate novel, but what does it actually say about what you've actually experienced? The truth is—absolutely nothing. Because you can't. I don't know what one does about novels. I shall write volume 5 [of Children of Violence] with my usual enthusiasm. I know perfectly well that when I've finished it I shall think, Christ, what a lie. Because you can't get life into it—that's all there is to it—no matter how hard you try.

And you think you have in The Golden Notebook, in the non-novel sections?

Well, at least I think it's more truthful because it's more complex. People are like other people. I mean, I don't think we are as extraordinary as we like to think we are. We are more like other people than we would wish to believe. The same people occur again and again in our lives. Situations do. And any moment of time is so complicated. I like The Golden Notebook even though I believe it to be a failure, because it at least hints at complexity.

The Color of Want

THE RACE WAR: The World-Wide Clash of White and Non-White. By Ronald Segal. The Viking Press. 416 pp. $6.50.

NADINE GORDIMER

Miss Gordimer is a South African novelist. Her most recent book is The Late Bourgeois World (Viking).

There have been good books about the problems of Africa and good books about the Troubles in the United States and good books about China's one revolution and South and Central America's many, and there have been writers who have followed some of the lines of blood relationship between these problems and peoples. But no one has used, quite as Ronald Segal does, the wide-angle lens of intellectual courage to bring them all under our scrutiny at once, in a bold thesis of their essential oneness. Mr. Segal has brought together historical and psychological facts that any honest intelligence must have long accepted when they were suitably fragmented—presented as pertaining to this country or that period—but whose falling into place across continents and centuries with such awful inevitability one may have failed or, more likely, refused to recognize.

Even those of us who live in centers of racial conflict like to think that, unlike ourselves, not everyone has his nose in the dirt; over the horizon there are other preoccupations, other threats. We like to believe that the ugliness of our own situation shrinks in importance, from the perspective of a world's-eye view. This book strips away that unhealthy comfort. Mr. Segal shows that race conflict, criss-crossing national boundaries, is the preoccupation of mankind and that a race war, already engaged in many parts of the world, both openly and under the guise of other principles, is mankind's greatest danger. From a brilliantly sustained analysis, scrupulously documented, which follows the confrontation of colored and white through chapters on "The Black World of Africa," "The Coloured World of Southern America," "The White World of the United States," "The White World of London and Moscow" and "The Yellow World of China," he produces a deadly convincing argument.

Ronald Segal's book is addressed to the white world. He writes as a radical and, demonstrably, as such he is the only kind of writer equal to this subject. For it is plain from the long history of white rejection of colored and the new, growing history of colored rejection of white, that the shuffle of hard-won concessions toward humanity has simply brought colored and white full circle, face to face with hate. We cannot hope to free ourselves unless the white world is prepared to cut loose, to the bone, from the rotting tangle of failed good intentions as well as the leg irons of oppression.

How likely is a race war? A war where color reaches out to make common cause with color across national loyalties and boundaries?

Segal gives the grim facts of the world-wide correspondence of color and poverty. Street by street and country by country, the haves are white (Japan is the single exception) and the have-nots are black, brown or yellow, and in the massive majority—70 per cent of the world's population live in want, almost all of them colored. The disaffections of the color bar and the disaffections of poverty run together, so that in actuality the people of Malawi, in Central Africa, with its per capita annual income of £12/10 (about $3), have more in common with the hungry peasants of distant South America or Mao's peasants than with the people of a fellow member of the British Commonwealth, Canada, with a per capita annual income of £570 (about $1,600). If the British Commonwealth is a "family," the poor relations are black, just as in

So you think you have a private life!

Wait till you read

THE INTRUDERS

The Invasion of Privacy by Government and Industry

by Edward V. Long

U. S. Senator from Missouri

■ Many large hotels across the country are believed to have permanently bugged rooms

■ One business executive had a microphone installed in the toilet-tissue container in the ladies room

■ A hospital administrator was caught monitoring confidential talks between doctor and patient

These are THE INTRUDERS. Just a few of them! You will be shocked to meet many others in this authoritative book by the head of the Senate subcommittee investigating wiretapping, bugging, and other forms of "snooping" by government and industry.

Senator Long reveals just how Americans lost their "right to be let alone"—and how they can recover it. Timely, factual, often hair-raising, THE INTRUDERS makes painful but essential reading.

Foreword by Vice President
Hubert H. Humphrey

2nd PRINTING • Illustrated • $5.95

Now at your bookstore

FREDERICK A. PRAEGER, Publishers
New York, N. Y. 10003

the United States the "affluent society" stops short of the Negro ghettos—or, indeed, moves out, taking its benefits with it, where Negroes move in. Hunger of the stomach . . . hunger for liberty, hunger for work and hunger for a little culture (Enrique Obregón Valverde, as quoted in J. Halcro Ferguson's Latin America)—these hungers of the dispossessed are shared by Jamaicans, Botswanas, Indians, Congolese, Vietnamese, Ghanaians, Argentinians, Chinese, and millions more. So is color. Segal shows how awareness of common cause against the white world has grown and is growing, born of despair and pride.

The white man took the black man from Africa and spread him across half the world, but there he remained an underling and interloper; the white man penetrated the black man's environment in Africa, used its resources overwhelmingly to white advantage, and made himself master of the black man in the black man's home. Segal's "Black World of Africa" chapter follows the white man through his successive guises there as slave trader, colonist, governor and settler and, finally, disburser of post-independence loans or stay-put defender of white supremacy; and the African as slave, voteless laborer, politician and/or revolutionary and, finally, citizen of one of the independent black states or noncitizen under white minority rule in Rhodesia, South Africa and the Portuguese territories. "The Coloured World of Southern America" (a term the author uses to encompass English-speaking countries like Jamaica, along with the Latin American countries, including those of Central America, and Mexico) follows the habituation of the African slave, through admixtures of blood reflecting the overlordship of various masters, Spanish, Portuguese and French, to the status of peon, at best exchanging through numerous revolutions which achieved little else, one caudillo (boss)—a shade or two whiter than the peon himself—for the other. "The White World of the United States" follows the black slave every step of the way from the cotton fields to the civil rights march on Washington, the Los Angeles riots, and the door of Elijah Muhammad. "The White World of London and Moscow" records the reception of the poor relations of the Commonwealth when, from the West Indies, India and Pakistan, they came home to mother, and the experience of colored people who reached out hopefully for a white hand that had had no association with the colonial past.

The blacks in the Diaspora lost, in white dominance, their native tongues, their history, their religions and traditional social structures. The Negro at home in Africa saw all these reviled, laughed at and debased. Now and then, in response to visionaries among them like Marcus Garvey, Negroes abroad turned their heads to Africa; but what, for centuries, was there to identify with but the shame of running to answer when the white man called "Nigger"?

The American Negro's identification with Africa as the continent that has thrown off the white man's rule has grown in proportion to the Negro's disillusion with white America. The emergence of Ghana in 1957 as an African state with its destiny in its own hands was an occasion for pride that crossed seas, as the slaves had done before it, and was claimed by others who shared a common ancestry of color with the Ghanaians. At the same time, Segal points out how Castro's Cuba, seen as the successful overthrow of white economic domination by a mixed population with an emphasis on racial integration, has become an inspiration not only to the colored peoples of South America from Brazil to Jamaica but also among the Negroes of the United States. Neither is this identification without reciprocation; he reminds us that Castro stayed at the Hotel Theresa in Harlem when he came to the United Nations in 1960.

As with new-found pride, so with the anger generated by despair. The Africans shot by white South African police at Sharpeville, like the American Negro victims of the Birmingham Sunday bombing, have become the martyrs of a world whose frontiers are not those of South Africa or the Deep South but of color. Lumumba's murder meant the same to colored men in Johannesburg, Harlem or Accra: the murder of black aspiration for white greed. And if the O.A.U. passes resolutions condemning the apartheid regime in South Africa and Smith's rebel Rhodesia without having the power to intervene in either, the fact remains that the existence of the South African and Rhodesian regimes is felt by the whole colored world as a humiliation for which, by the same token, the whole white world has become answerable.

It will be argued that the years that have seen the magnetic coherence of the fragmented Negro identity have also seen the first real emancipation of his condition since the abolition of slavery. Most of Africa is black independent; civil rights legislation at last has been validated in the United States; by extension of the brotherhood of color, the Arab victory over the French in Algeria is a common one—indeed, does not the life of Fanon, Negro descendant of a Martinique slave who went to Algeria to become a participant in and prophet of the F.L.N. struggle, symbolize this? On the face of it, the black man would seem to be coming into his own.

Much of this remarkable book is concerned with demonstrating that this is not so, and why. With encyclopedic knowledge, rare intelligence, and a controlled urgency before which the most closed of minds surely cannot help but unclench, Segal shows that the battle for Negro human rights in the United States has not been won by the granting of constitutional liberty and the legislation to enforce it, and accuses the United States Government of failing to bring about that enforcement where "wide wastelands of intransigence re-

PINTER'S "THE HOMECOMING"

"A MASTERFUL PLAY. PINTER IS AN ARTIST, ONE OF THE BEST TO HAVE ENTERED THE WORLD'S STAGE IN THE LAST TEN YEARS."

—Harold Clurman, The Nation

THE ROYAL SHAKESPEARE COMPANY ■
THE HOMECOMING

PRICES: Mon. thru Sat. Evgs.: Orch. $7.50; Front Mezz. $6.75, 5.75; Rear Mezz. $4.75, 3.75, 3.00. Wed. & Sat. Mats.: Orch. $5.75; Front Mezz. $5.25, 4.75; Rear Mezz. $4.25, 3.25, 2.50. Please enclose stamped, self-addressed envelope with order. List several alternate dates.

MUSIC BOX THEATRE ■ 235 W. 44th St., N.Y. 36-6044

main." As for the new multitude of Negro voters themselves, "... their poverty is so profound ... that an enormous investment of resources ... is required to rescue them."

But the most serious charge laid at America's door in her now prolonged confrontation with the colored world in general, and South America and Asia in particular, is America's refusal to countenance revolution because she equates it with communism. Segal calls this "obsession" with communism "dangerously irrelevant": "In the end this refusal to countenance revolution simply advances the prospects of racial struggle, for it perpetuates the economic inequalities, the national poverty and the resentment at white domination in the present and the past that produce the colored consensus of rebellion. And should the West and the Soviet Union really reach an agreement to police the world together, as an alliance of white communism and white capitalism to control unrest, it will increase, not diminish, the possibilities of race war." In Africa, America, along with Britain and the other former colonial powers, has shown itself less concerned with the freedom of peoples than with the stability of regimes where white investment lies.

Segal examines in detail how the Soviet Union, whose "very existence" was once an "implied, occasionally explicit, restraint on Western actions" has also declined in prestige among Africa's peoples. Africans visiting the West during the days of colonial insurrection were disappointed with the policies of Western Communists—for example, the "political acrobatics" of the American C.P. on the color question. Then, in the full flush of independence, African students met with racial discrimination in the Soviet Union. And to colored people the conduct of the Communist bloc at the United Nations "has increasingly reflected a closer concern with great-power interests than with fortifying an independent authority which the coloured states ... might gradually direct to their benefit." But since the Bandung Conference of 1955, when the Soviet Union was excluded despite its claim to be an Asian as well as a European state, and China won acceptance "as a coloured state rather than a communist one," the Soviet Union has had a competitor for Communist and revolutionary influence—which, Segal again and again stresses, are not necessarily the same thing. China has the inescapable advantage of color. And now, of course, in the Sino-Soviet split, the world's forces are being realigned along the lines of color, across those of ideology. More and more, the colored peoples see the Soviet Union, despite her 20 per cent nonwhite population, as part of the white world, the Other Side. The idea of white communism and white capitalism "policing the world together" is not inconceivable.

China and the Chinese Revolution loom large in this book (clinically critical as it is of both Communist and capitalist societies), not as the Yellow Peril of the West and the Soviet Union—but as perhaps the only example of achieved full-scale social change with which the colored world can identify itself. The peoples of that world may not want a Communist revolution; what Segal pleads for is the West's recognition that revolutionary change is inevitable to transform these societies "now aligned only with poverty and despair." Segal's book is indispensable to a consideration of the implications of color in human society.

Africans and Afrikaners

RUN FOR THE TREES. By James S. Rand. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 398 pp. $5.95.

ROGUE OF THE AFRICAN NIGHT. By Harold Beaver. Dodd, Mead & Co. 218 pp. $4.

CHARLES R. LARSON

Mr. Larson teaches African studies at American University in Washington, D. C.

Though many African writers have entered the world literary scene in the last dozen or fifteen years, here in the United States publishers are still more apt to publish a gutsy novel about Africa by a non-African, whose knowledge of the continent may be hardly more than vicarious, than take the risk of publishing a novel by an African. Two recent novels about Africa—James S. Rand's Run for the Trees and Harold Beaver's Rogue of the African Night—will easily deepen the stereotyped view most American readers already have about Africa and Africans. Both were written by Englishmen who have had some firsthand experience living in Africa.

James S. Rand's Run for the Trees is a particularly bad novel in any terms

Now in paperback

TWO RECENT BOOKS BY

ALFRED KAZIN

Starting Out in the Thirties

"A stunning book, perhaps the most evocative reminiscence of a vital corner of the nineteen thirties that we are likely to get ... beautifully written."—N.Y. Times
LB 76 $1.95

Contemporaries

"Only Edmund Wilson or Malcolm Cowley at their best have written with as much clarity and originality — or on a wider range of literary subjects."—Saturday Review
LB 44 $2.65

At all bookstores

ATLANTIC-LITTLE, BROWN

"The first Russian revolution" ... seen in historical perspective by an eye-witness

THE RUSSIAN REVOLUTION OF 1905

The Workers' Movement and The Formation of Bolshevism and Menshevism

by Solomon M. Schwarz

A Hoover Institution Publication

Written by a scholar of international repute who participated in the 1905 revolution and was a member of the Kerensky government, this fascinating study is the most authoritative and exhaustive treatment of Menshevik and Bolshevik responses to the vast labor unrest of 1905, as well as the best general history of the events that year. The first volume in "The History of Menshevism" — an important new series. $8.95

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS
Chicago and London

FREE BOOK BONUS

with each NEW subscription to

NATION

Ralph Nader's UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED

Unsafe At Any Speed is the blistering attack on the auto industry that rocked Detroit, Washington and hundreds of thousands of readers from coast to coast. The American Trial Lawyers Assn. Journal called Mr. Nader's book "Pulitzer prize material."

"A ringing indictment of the industry. . . . Strongly recommended. . . . He has done prodigious research in a field mired in anonymity, and has come up with a book that, hopefully, will change Detroit's ways. . . ."

Eliot Fremont-Smith, New York Times

"A powerful and persuasive case that Detroit has indeed slighted safety considerations in a headlong pursuit of pleasurable styling. . . ."

Wall Street Journal

Ralph Nader's articles on auto safety first appeared several years ago in The NATION. This is but one example of how The NATION raises important issues—before, not after, they become fashionable ones.

THE NATION
333 SIXTH AVENUE
NEW YORK, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of Unsafe At Any Speed.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian Postage, $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

3-6-67

—not just a particularly bad novel about Africa. What little plot there is has been summarized by the publisher who calls Run for the Trees "the story of a man who wrested his part of Africa from the savages—both men and beasts—and believed that it belonged to him." The setting is Voortrekker land in the Union of South Africa about 1918. George Miller, a Scotsman, saves the life of Piet Van Zyl—an Afrikaner—and for the next 350 pages these two insatiable Paul Bunyans fight, drink, fornicate, kidnap native women, observe the mating habits of rhinoceros, attend native fertility rites, hunt crocodiles, and kill hundreds and hundreds of lions and leopards.

For good measure Rand has mixed in a few of the more widely accepted African stereotypes. He tells us—over and over again—that Van Zyl is humanitarian toward his African workers and especially the women in his harem—about thirty mulattoes, one Norwegian, one Oriental, and two eunuchs. If the reader thinks Van Zyl is treating his Africans badly, Rand reminds him of the American white man and how he treated his slaves before the Civil War. But the reader knows the Africans love Van Zyl. They call him Bwana. And Rand, in his foreword to Run for the Trees, reassures us that his novel is based on "historic truth."

Harold Beaver's Rogue of the African Night is a much better novel than Rand's. Beaver's theme—as well as his rogue—is the contemporary alienated African. Unfortunately, there have been too many novels about alienated Africans—including good novels—from Joyce Cary's masterpiece, Mister Johnson, to Peter Abraham's Mine Boy. Indeed, with Rogue of the African Night it appears as if Beaver had read all the African novels available and then created his own composite African character.

Jotham Simiyu, Beaver's alienated hero, is placed in a series of picaresque situations which have been used by half a dozen other writers of African fiction. (Jotham's father is dead; his mother has run off to Nairobi; Jotham goes from schoolboy, to clerk in an Indian shop, to house boy, to tutor, to safari guide, to agriculture officer, to preacher and politician.) It is an old story but worth one more retelling. At the beginning of the book, "editor" Beaver tells in an introduction how he discovered twelve school exercise books in which Jotham recorded the story of his life. (This attempt at verisimilitude has also been used before—more ef-

THE SHY ROOFER

*This roofer works at night on the sly —
he's only a shy man.
Nails, tar, squares covered and uncovered: these he proffers quickly,
automatically,
by hand.
It's the moon that's on his mind, gentlemen —
the stars, the ladies turning over one more time
to show their lips, their honest
hips, to whisper
in their sleep
you're doing fine, roofer.*

GARY GILDNER

fectively—in Une Vie de boy by Camerounian writer Ferdinand Oyono.) This is followed by a letter from Reuben Gold, an education officer who supposedly once taught Jotham in school. The alienation theme is articulated by Gold who writes of his former pupil: "Above all, he is preoccupied with his own identity—family identity (lost), clan identity (half-assimilated), tribal identity (confused), eventually trying to find in politics a mass identity (of African Nationalism). . . ." That's quite a bit for one book.

Yet Beaver's novel has merit. He has done a first-rate job of catching and recording African idiom—proverbs, aphorisms, myths, etc. And Beaver has created—and here again this is reminiscent of Cary's Mister Johnson—some highly comic and quaintly touching scenes.

But to really learn about Africa, we must return to the genuine—the works written by Africans. I am not making the claim that a novel by an African is automatically better than one by a non-African. (Cary's Mister Johnson is still the best novel about Africa written by anyone.) African writers can be equally guilty of stereotyping and overworking an idea. But something new has been happening to African fiction in the past two or three years. African writers are exploring new themes, attempting new forms, and writing some of the most exciting fiction during the brief fifteen- or twenty-year span of the contemporary African novel. Let me end by briefly commenting on three novels which were published in England last year:

Efuru, by Flora Nwapa, was the first novel written by a woman from a tropical African country, and the first completely developed portrayal of a woman in African fiction. Flora Nwapa, an Ibo from Eastern Nigeria, tells the story of Efuru whose conflicts are contained within her own womanliness and her traditional culture. The story is simple, yet idyllic and beautiful, worth its weight in gold for what it tells us of the rapidly changing place of women in Ibo society. A particularly impressive novel is Lenrie Peters' The Second Round, a story about a young African doctor in Freetown. And On Trial for My Country (all published by Heinemann) by Rhodesian writer Stanlake Samkange, a historical novel in its conception, illustrates the conflict between Cecil Rhodes and Lobengula, the Matabele King, and the white man's scramble for East and Central Africa. [See also Robert Green in The Nation (October 11, 1965): "The Clashing Old and New," an essay discussing the works of Chinua Achebe, Mongo Beti, Wole Soyinka, Amos Tutuola and Camera Laye; and The Nation (April 18, 1966): Robert Green's review of Chinua Achebe's fourth novel, A Man of the People.]

These are all closer to the African truth and its universality than the books by Rand and Beaver.

THEATRE HAROLD CLURMAN

I recommend Shakespeare! It is true that in many performances he is rendered almost as foolish as the less imposing dramatists encountered in a season of Broadway playgoing. But there is never a time that we can't get something out of the mighty and much abused Bard. If nothing else, seeing and hearing Shakespeare (when we do hear him) recalls the height and scope that writing for the theatre may achieve.

The latest Shakespeare comes to us from the Bristol Old Vic, whose productions of Measure for Measure, Hamlet, Romeo and Juliet, now at the City Center, will tour the country and continent, ending at Montreal in June. The Bristol Old Vic, of which the fixed habitat is the beautiful old Theatre Royal in that city, is one of Britain's six nationally subsidized theatres. It should be noted in passing that the population of Bristol is less than half a million.

The company also runs a theatre for "experimental" productions and conducts a school. "The most important part of the company's policy," the playbill states, "is to build up a permanent ensemble of actors who form a group which stays together long enough to develop a distinctive style. . . . Plays by Brecht, Anouilh, Dürrenmatt and Frisch rub shoulders with Shakespeare."

I shall not attempt to pass judgment on the company on the basis of the first two productions alone (I have not yet seen Juliet). The daily press has received them cordially, and perhaps this is deserved, since the less versatile and vigorous A.P.A. is reputed to be "The Best Repertory Company We Possess."

Measure for Measure and Hamlet were well staged in what is usually called the traditional style (the first by Tyrone Guthrie, the second by Val May, the company's general director). The actors speak well and make sense. The voices are generally good, so trained as to make nearly all of them sound alike. They bear a standard intonation that holds the right of way from Stratford in central England to Bristol in its southwest. The impression made is that of a first-rate stock company.

I was glad of the opportunity to see

SOVIET UNION and EASTERN EUROPE

Enjoy a wonder tour planned by one of America's foremost specialists. Here's a wide range of itineraries fitting every budget. Write for booklets desired:

- Russian Language Seminar Tours (from $595)
- Motorcoach and Budget Tours to Balkans, East Europe, Israel (from $706)
- Special Tours to Armenia, Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania (from $740)
- Medical Tours in USSR (from $160 for 24 days)
- Scandinavia and East Europe Tours
- Russia-Siberia-Mongolia; Israel and East Europe

Group and Individual Tours
We Obtain Visas

AFTON TOURS, Inc.

1776 Broadway, N. Y., N. Y. 10019

PLaza 7-9595

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS

101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

Measure for Measure again: that "unpleasant" and somewhat ambiguous comedy in which the "hero" is the Duke (whom I regard as the villain), and in which the severely righteous Angelo distraught with lust is the villain (whom I regard as the Duke's chief victim). The "heroine," Isabella, would rather see her brother beheaded than sacrifice her chaste treasure to save him; her brother would rather she made the sacrifice than die, and everyone is willy-nilly forced to marry whomever the Duke orders into nuptial bliss.

This is the sour Shakespeare on his way to majestic pessimism. Very interesting, except that one would like to see the play interpreted, that is, given a point of view, instead of being presented blandly at its confusing face value. As for Hamlet—well, it's Hamlet, done better than many I've seen but without the impress of a special, a revealing insight.

What these productions made me think of most is the constant discussion of why we in America don't have our own important Shakespeare productions, the kind that might be taken as seriously as the Hopkins-Jones-Barrymore Hamlet way back in the twenties, productions of which our reviewers might be as respectful as they seem to be of the present Bristol Old Vic season.

The critical consensus is that our actors do not know how to speak Shakespeare, that they do not command the "manner." After long and patient reflection I have come to the conclusion that this is sheer rot. Any moderately educated young man or woman, given three years of insistent training with a proper guide (of which there are several among us), can learn to speak Shakespeare and acquire the "manner." The problem is to act Shakespeare.

It is because we think of playing Shakespeare chiefly as a matter of voice and speech, and because we harbor an altogether external idea of what constitutes style, that most Shakespeare production for years has been so crucially uninteresting. It is also because of this that the Shakespeare I have found most arresting as theatre, rather than as an exercise in conventional elocution, has been in foreign languages. Lest this be thought a personal whim or extravagance, I report that Gordon Craig assured me that King Lear at the Jewish Chamber Theatre in Moscow (1935) was the best production of Shakespeare he had even seen.

Certainly Shakespeare must be magnificently spoken. (Does this mean that contemporary dramatists should be badly spoken?) But good, elegant or virile speech alone does not produce a satisfactory Shakespeare. That is mere reading. Nor will an interpretation that is little more than what an informed college instructor might impart to his students suffice.

Shakespeare requires, apart from proper diction and an understanding of Elizabethan prosody, original imagination, loftiness of thought, boldness of conception, extremes of sensibility and passion from utmost lyric delicacy to that impetuosity, that wildness, grandeur and volcanic intensity which are the marks of Shakespeare's writing.

This is acknowledged today in England itself. The early 19th-century romanticism that had deteriorated into a form of genteel declamation—spiced by occasional bursts of temperament or vocal crescendos which many still think of as the "tradition"—is no longer acceptable. Recent productions of the Royal Shakespeare Company at Stratford and in London follow a new line. Very often this results in a deflation and a reduction of Shakespeare in an astringent reaction to the grandiose, as in the Brook-Scofield Lear, which, though mistaken, certainly possessed its own particular truth.

There is at the very least a freshness in these new productions. They make us watch and listen anew, query and debate, instead of making the greatest dramatist in English sound like a classic-by-rote, a museum piece or a monument we are sufficiently civilized to appreciate without effort and without the excitement, the throb of individual reaction which attends contact with a vital experience.

WITH THE DOCTOR'S BILL

*Mother, when I was eight, I lied,
Stole money from your purse and the maid.
I poured my haemoglobin down the sink and had Horrible headaches. You know all that.
Grandfather lay snoring like a bear
In remote, nineteenth-century underwear,
As I tip-toed on the gallery.
I dreamed him dead a whole month.*

*When I grow up I do not want to be Thirty-four, bored and ashamed, bad at my work.
Diligent of heart, steady, I shall amuse
And rule my love and children where nothing happens.
But now I am my behavior, I am what
I do not understand and have funny thoughts a lot.
These afternoons I repeat the expensive,
Valuable past and I do not forget:
Both of us pay; but it is not a debt.*

JOHN N. MORRIS

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

AUSTRALIA WANTS YOU! Government assisted passage. Unlimited Opportunities. Latest Government Information $1.00, Austco, Box 3623-FF, Long Beach, California 90803.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 3-6-67
331 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

Coming APRIL 24

The Nation's
SPRING BOOK NUMBER

Crossword Puzzle No. 1191

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 See 20 across
- 9 Antonio was such a merchant, in event a disguise is to be penetrated. (8)
- 10 Are such people identified by enunciation or diction? (6)
- 11 Uncertain aims can make people mad. (7)
- 12 and 14 See 20 across
- 15 What one sometimes does if the charger is given free rein? (8)
- 17 See 20 across
- 20, 24, 1, 26, 14, 12, 8, 28, 17 and 4 What in the world is the basic composition! (6, 5, 2, 5, 6, 6, 2, 4, 4, 3, 6, 5, 3, 8, 4)
- 22 Where the sharpshooter sees his target with discernment. (7)
- 24 and 26 See 20 across
- 27 Those who scrape sometimes have their bows. (8)
- 28 See 20 across

DOWN:

- 2 This could tell something about the country. (9)
- 3 Proving, in the end, vice degenerated. (7)
- 4 See 20 across
- 5 Four bottoms are sometimes measured. (7)
- 6 Not a small attribute of Horatio's make-up, possibly. (5)

- 7 One of the backfield might, in part. (6)
- 8 See 20 across
- 13 Gets into mail and rises in the saddle. (5)
- 16 Construction materials are to this, and suffer. (3, 2, 4)
- 18 They go into helmets and ships. (6)
- 19 Neither orators nor their audiences should suffer from it. (7)
- 20 Acted as a roller. (7)
- 21 Things are no longer fast when you do. (6)
- 23 Hippy? (5)
- 25 In favor of a small vessel? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1190

ACROSS: 1 and 22 down Concentration camp; 10 Overrun; 11 Lamella; 12 Resist; 13 Ixion; 14 At home; 16 Book Club; 19 Birdshot; 20 Unison; 22 Coins; 23 Matchless; 25 Migrant; 26 Obregon; 27 Bridge players. DOWN: 2 Obeys; 3 Christmas Island; 4 Nuncio; 5 Religion; 6 Tom, Dick and Harry; 7 Oil fields; 8 Door jamb; 15 Harbinger; 17 Benisons; 18 and 9 Comes the dawn; 21 Stroll; 24 Eager.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address your request to Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

PERSONALS

LAKEHEAD UNIVERSITY PORT ARTHUR, ONTARIO CANADA

APPLICATIONS to teach the following subjects in Economics at the General and Honours level, and possibly also at the Master's level, are invited: Principles of Economics, Economic History, History of Economic Thought, Labour Economics, Mathematical Economics, Money and Banking.

Applications, accompanied by a curriculum vitae and the addresses of three referees should be sent to Dr. G. O. Rothney, Dean of Arts.

Lectures commence September 1967. Rank depends on training and experience.

Minimum annual salaries:

Assistant Professor	$ 9,800
Lecturer	7,500
Professor	15,300
Associate Professor	11,800

Teaching responsibility approximately 9 hours a week.

Qualified U.S. citizens seeking a challenging position in an atmosphere of academic freedom are especially welcome.

INCOME TAX RETURNS PREPARED. Washington Heights-Inwood Tax Consulting Service. Specialists in returns for teachers, instructors. 914-735-5113 or SW 5-7315.

PUBLICATIONS

MARXISM & MODERN LITERATURE

by Gaylord C. LeRoy

A professor of English at Temple University analyzes such basic concepts as Modernism, Realism, and Socialist Realism

Just published ■ Paper: $1

AMERICAN INSTITUTE FOR MARXIST STUDIES

20 East 30th Street, New York, N.Y. 10016
(checks may be made payable to: AIMS)

WORLD DEMOCRACY by Bin Dir Woor; Self-Designed Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publisher, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor says that every time you repeat the creative phrase "World Democracy," in prayer or otherwise, you benefit total humanity—living, dead and unborn.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

FREE: Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

AMERICAN HAIKU magazine. Subscription—$3.00 yearly. Box 73, Platteville, Wisconsin 53818.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

Which 3 of these 30 major works of history & world affairs would you like

FOR 99¢ FOR ALL THREE

WITH YOUR FIRST HISTORY BOOK CLUB MEMBERSHIP CHOICE

369. THE SPANISH CIVIL WAR By Hugh Thomas. A spellbinder—the complete history of the grim “dress rehearsal for World War Two.” $8.95/$6.50

563. LATIN AMERICA By German Arciniegas. From Columbus to Castro—the ideas, customs, religions, literature and arts. $10.00/$6.95

543. ANCIENT EUROPE By Stuart Piggott. From 6000 B.C. to the Roman era, this fascinating survey traces the prehistory of barbarian Europe. 194 illustrations. $7.50/$6.15

502. BARBAROSSA By Alan Clark. From German archives, an extraordinary military-political history of the war in Russia, 1941-5. $10.00/$7.50

508. WASHING OF THE SPEARS By D. R. Morris. Proud and tragic history of the Zulu nation, its brief glory and its downfall in the Zulu War, 1879. $12.00/$7.95

THE FALL OF PARIS By Alistair Horne. From the Franco-Prussian War to the Paris Commune's collapse. $6.95/$5.75

537. THE BILL OF RIGHTS By Irving Brant. The struggle for civil liberties from Edward III to the Warren Court. $7.50/$5.95

542. KHRUSHCHEV: A CAREER By Edward Crankshaw. Lucid and informative account of his origins, his rise, his ignominious downfall. $7.50/$5.95

545. VIET-NAM WITNESS By Bernard B. Fall. The evolution of our Viet-Nam crisis. “More useful than any other [book] to an understanding of the intricate issues.” Walter Millis. $6.95/$5.80

566. PRESIDENTIAL GREATNESS By Thomas A. Bailey. “Rating the American Presidents” game—played with wit, insight, and a sound grounding in American history. $6.95/$5.95

445. RISE OF THE WEST By William H. McNeill. National Book Award history of the human community since 6000 B.C. $12.50/$9.50

444. MEDIEVAL HISTORY By Norman F. Cantor. Life and death of a grim yet colorful civilization. $8.95/$7.40

439. FALL OF THE HOUSE OF HABSBURG By Edw. Crankshaw. The decay and fall of the Austro-Hungarian Empire. $7.50/$5.95

441. WORLD OF HERODOTUS By Aubrey de Selincourt. Daily life in ancient Greece and the neighboring world. $6.50/$5.50

492. INSIDE HITLER'S HEAD-QUARTERS By Walter Warlimont. The myth of Hitler's military “genius” exposed by a top aide. $9.95/$7.95

371. CIVIL WAR DICTIONARY By M. M. Boatner III. Encyclopedic inventory of battles, leaders, units, weapons, etc. $15.00/$8.95

470. 20th CENTURY CHINA By O. Edmund Clubb. From Manchu to Mao—history by a veteran “China hand.” $7.95/$5.95

476. THE LIFE OF LENIN By Louis Fischer. The authoritative story—winner of the National Book Award. $10.00/$7.50

522. MACHIAVELLI By Giuseppe Prezzolini. The life, times, works, and significance of the first modern political philosopher, in an erudite new review. $8.50/$6.75

558. THE SOUTH SINCE APPOMATTOX By Thomas D. Clark and Albert D. Kirwan. A realistic study of a century of changes in Southern politics, economics and living. $7.50/$5.95

560. 1940 By Laurence Thompson. The year of the “phony war” as Hitler's armies conquer and America pledges to become the Arsenal of Democracy. $5.95/$5.50

546. DE GAULLE: A POLITICAL BIOGRAPHY By Alexander Werth. A look at the General as Resistance leader, right-wing demagogue, “eternal rebel.” $7.50/$5.95

176. BYZANTIUM By Charles Diehl. Study of the glittering Byzantine Empire and its 1000-year rule. $8.50/$6.95

101. HISTORY OF THE GERMAN GENERAL STAFF By Walter Goerlitz. Story of the world's most feared war machine, 1657-1945. $7.50/$5.95

481. THE LONG DEATH By Ralph K. Andrist. The last days of the Plains Indians and their tragic struggle for survival against the Whites. $8.95/$6.95

559. HOSTILE COEXISTENCE: A History of Sino-Indian Relations By John Rowland. The origins, nature, and significance of Sino-Indian tension. “One of the most intricate, fascinating, and least understood themes of current history.” Walter Millis. $6.75/$5.75

460. HITLER: A STUDY IN TYRANNY By Alan Bullock. Newly enlarged, fascinating, and least understood themes of current history.” Walter Millis. $6.75/$5.75

110. JOURNALS OF LEWIS & CLARK ed. by Bernard DeVoto. The first expedition to penetrate the virgin Northwest. $7.50/$5.95

554. THE TRIAL OF THE GERMANS: NUREMBERG 1945-46 By Eugene Davidson. Twenty-four brilliant biographies of the Nuremberg war criminals which build a total picture of Nazi Germany. $12.50/$8.95

464. THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION By G. O. Trevelyan. Now in one volume, edited by Richard B. Morris—the great work by one of the foremost British historians. $10.00/$6.95

UP TO $40.00 WORTH OF FINE BOOKS FOR ONLY 99¢ with Trial Membership

THE HISTORY BOOK CLUB Stamford, Conn. 06904

Please open a Trial Membership for me and send the introductory package of books indicated below. Bill me 99¢ for the three. At the same time, send the membership book I have also indicated and bill me for it at the low Member's Price.

I understand that I may return the books within 2 weeks if I am not delighted with them and that their return will automatically cancel my membership. Otherwise I shall complete my Trial Membership by purchasing 4 more selections during the coming year from among more than 100 offered at money-saving Member's Prices in the monthly REVIEW. (A reply card is always enclosed with the REVIEW.)

Completion of my Trial Membership will entitle me to choose a Bonus Book for every 4 books I purchase thereafter. (NOTE: Bonus Books are shipped at the Club's expense; on all other shipments a small postage and packing charge is added.)

Fill in numbers of your three introductory books, 99¢ for all three

Fill in number of your choice at member's price

Name (please print) _____

Address _____

City _____ State _____ Zip Code _____

In Canada, same savings. Shipment of books and all services will be handled within Canada. Bonus plan differs slightly.

NA 01 S

BLUNDER INC. MORDECAI BOSHWALD

THE NATION

MARCH 13, 1967 35 cents

BURLINGAME
MAR 13 1967
LIBRARY

THE RIGHT HAS 9 LIVES FRED J. COOK

The Crime Fuzzie

Old Man in a Hurry

C. F. FITZGERALD

California's Instant Cities

THEODORE BOSTAN

THE LETTERS OF JAMES JOYCE

KEVIN SULLIVAN

GERTRUDE STEIN: AGING BEAUTIFULLY

STEPHEN KOCH

MACHIEDI

HAROLD CLURMAN

MARAT/SADE FILM

ROBERT HATCH

S-22-67 PL5-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

angry artist

New York City

DEAR SIR: I am not very concerned about Curtis Harnack's misspelling of my name ["Week of the Angry Artist," The Nation, Feb. 20]; I mention it only because it seems characteristic of the general inaccuracy of his observations.

I don't believe Mr. Harnack witnessed one of our performances, or he would have made himself known to us, so that he could speak with some of the actual participants (I'm told this method often lends weight to a journalistic piece). . . .

He would have observed that with the use of a microphone plus two speakers you don't get "poetry shouted from street corners," but rather poems read from a platform. There is a difference: your voice never gets "lost in the general hubbub."

If Mr. Harnack had been present at any one of the fifteen places we stopped at, he would have read one of the little mimeographed booklets we were handing out, containing 2 pages of our poems, the ones we were reading on the truck, and been able to quote at length from at least one of the poems, to back up his contention that the muse was, for these occasions, "in service to politics" (i.e., none of what we read were good poems).

He could not have failed to notice those people who applauded us, or those (some 5,000 all week) who took the booklets. . . . He does not say who were the witnesses he relied on. They were not particularly observant: most of the poets and players did not have beards. Tony Weinberger has a mustache—well, that's nearly a beard. And Paul Blackburn: he's got a beard; is he an "East Village type"? He's a poet widely known and widely respected. How about Robert Bly? Perhaps he is the exception. He looked to me pretty much like the rest of us. I myself don't have a beard, nor do I have skinny legs; but maybe Mr. Harnack means that I'm an East Village type because I live in the East Village.

Where were Mr. Harnack's eyewitnesses when the Harlem crowd at 125th St. and Lenox Ave. were cheering us? Where were they when 500 booklets were handed out and 200 people watched our program in front of the Metropolitan Museum of Art?

Of course some people were against us; does Mr. Harnack think they would have been for us if we had changed our clothes? Winter being what it is, we were all wearing heavy shoes, warm coats. When he talks about the "defiance implicit in their garb" maybe he means we were defying the weather? Is he telling us that the hecklers in the crowd were objecting to our appearance rather than our ideas? I only wish it were true.

. . . If he had chosen to tell how we were belted with eggs and garbage and physically attacked by Cuban exiles on upper Broadway, he would have inferred from that isolated incident that we were similarly treated all over the city. The logic is the same: you pick one performance out of the fifteen and maintain that it is typical. . . . Where were you, Mr. Harnack? Clearly you were nowhere in our vicinity at any time, or you would have had to write a different sort of article. What you have written about the Poets' Caravan is irresponsible, inaccurate and misleading.

Dick Lourie

New York City

DEAR SIR: I regret that Curtis Harnack spent so much space on the panel discussion which was not an event typical of the week's activities and none at all on the program called Vietnamese Life which brought together many artists, known and unknown, from different fields, in an attempt to realize imaginatively not their own feelings about the

(Continued on page 350)

EDITORIALS

War and Peace

At a recent press conference, President Johnson drew a yellowish parchment from a desk drawer and read out to the reporters the well-known passage in which Abraham Lincoln, after promising to do the very best he could, remarks: "If the end brings me out all right, what is said about me won't amount to anything. If the end brings me out wrong, ten angels swearing I was right would make no difference. . . ." Ted Lewis was not being unduly harsh in the New York Daily News when he said that Franklin D. Roosevelt, Harry Truman, Dwight D. Eisenhower and John F. Kennedy never resorted to the public displays of self-pity and appeals for understanding that suffused this press conference. The implied comparison with Lincoln verges on the grotesque.

In the decisions that preceded the press conference, Mr. Johnson and his aides followed a familiar pattern. It was succinctly expressed in a newspaper headline: LBJ STEPPING UP WAR TO PROMOTE PEACE. It could have come straight out of George Orwell. Whenever the possibility of peace appears on the horizon, Johnson, Rusk and McNamara respond with new escalations: in the present instance no less than three—naval shelling of the North Vietnamese seacoast, artillery fire across the demilitarized zone and mining of northern rivers. When the reporters asked whether these actions did not amount to a widening of the war, so that the United States was faced with a more ominous situation, Mr. Johnson conceded that what he had done was "more far-reaching," but it was necessary "to protect the safety, the lives of our men there, and to try to bring about a halt to the war and the aggression." When, a few days later, Robert Kennedy presented to the Senate a three-point proposal that would do no more than add a flavor of "credibility" to our oft-repeated proffers of negotiation, Secretary Rusk issued within hours a bleak rejection of the Senator's cautious peace signal.

The Johnson Administration is determined to achieve a military and diplomatic victory in Vietnam and will not negotiate until such an outcome is assured. For their part, the National Liberation Front and the North Vietnamese, beset by heavy losses and the Sino-Soviet split, would like to end the war, but it is impossible for them to acknowledge defeat and lose at the conference table all that they won in the war with the French. A plausible picture of their objectives emerges in a report from Saigon by Richard Critchfield in the February 23 Washington Evening Star. Critchfield has been in touch with Vietnamese Communists, who told him that the Vietcong were willing to lay down their arms and collaborate with a non-Communist regime in Saigon, providing it was "reasonably liberal" and not led by generals like Premier Ky and his junta, composed almost entirely of North Vietnamese who fought on the side of the French. The Front, Critchfield reports further, would not demand cabinet posts or a U.S. guarantee of safety.

The National Liberation Front is even willing to consider a deal with the existing military junta, but in that case it wants 50 per cent of all cabinet posts, legalization of an overt Communist Party and a guarantee of safety from the United States. Apparently the Front would accede to an American presence in South Vietnam to prevent a renewal of hostilities. By all indications, the Johnson Administration will not negotiate on any such basis. Its objective is revealed in Vice President Humphrey's news conference of February 27, in connection with the AFL-CIO convention. He was not speaking for the Administration, he said, but he saw the coming elections in South Vietnam as a step toward a peaceful settlement—perhaps next summer. He echoed the Johnson assurances of “constantly probing” for peace negotiations while “maintaining military pressure.” The maintenance—and stepping up—of military pressure is the reality in this dualism, the probing for peace is the cover story. The agony this entails for the Vietnamese people, North and South, and the risk of an uncontrollable spread of the war are of minor importance in the Johnson-Rusk-McNamara strategy.

The Wronged Far Right

Under the leadership of square-jawed, bluff Barry Goldwater, the far Right enjoys a reputation for forthrightness, for hitting issues head-on, for the direct confrontation. In the image it has created for itself, it puts principle above expediency, it scorns special pleading, it restores to our squalid politics the purity of the early American character.

But in its reaction to the revelations of CIA subordination of American institutions, the far Right displays precious little of these pretensions. On Face the Nation, Goldwater expressed his outrage that the CIA had given money to “left-wing” organizations—he made a special point of an organization with which Norman Thomas had been identified—and then his indignation turned into a sense of being ill-used. “Why didn’t they spread this money around?” he asked. It is a strange question to come from one so opposed to governmental influence over private persons and organizations. It is doubly strange because at least one Right-led group did receive CIA funds to the extent of $1 million or more; it is the Cuban Freedom Committee, a front for Christianform (see The Nation, May 9, 1966). One might have thought that Goldwater would spurn subsidies for his side, leaving such loose political morals to degenerate liberals.

A somewhat different objection is voiced by Rep. James B. Utt, another luminary of the far Right. He cannot understand why the CIA should have made a cat's-paw of the National Student League, a group that

IN THIS ISSUE

March 13, 1967

EDITORIALS

322

ARTICLES

- 326 The China Puzzle:
Old Man in a Hurry C. P. Fitzgerald
- 330 The Right Has Nine Lives Fred J. Cook
- 335 The Cybernetics of Blunder Mordecai Roshwald
- 336 California Revolution 7:
Life in the Instant Cities Theodore Roszak

BOOKS & THE ARTS

- 341 The Simplicity
Behind the Disguises Kevin Sullivan
- 343 Aging Beautifully Stephen Koch
- 345 Stormy Revelations Joseph Solman
- 346 The Haystack (poem) Richard Eberhart
- 347 Films Robert Hatch
- 348 Theatre Harold Clurman
- 349 Records Benjamin Boretz
- 351 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.
Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS
Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH
Copy Editor
MARION HESS
Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN
Art
MAX KOZLOFF
Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science
CARL DREHER
Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS
Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY
Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS
Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH
London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS
Bonn
C. AMERY
Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1434 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-3547. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Vol. 204
No. 11

was not (and still isn't) "strongly anti-Communist." This position is held by other bodies of the Goldwater-Utt persuasion. Thus, Young Americans for Freedom proclaim: "... we are absolutely astounded to discover that federal funds in huge amounts have been placed in the hands of irresponsible leftists who do not represent American students." It may be that they would not have been satisfied to have the money "spread around"; probably they would have been happier if it had all gone to them.

The trouble with that tactic is that it would never work. The CIA knew perfectly well what it was doing. An ostensibly liberal organization, once corrupted, could serve CIA purposes as a rightist group never could. The far Right philosophy is not very salable in most parts of the world or, for that matter, in the United States. While representing only one sector of student opinion, the NSA is far more influential than Young Americans for Freedom and similar groups.

There is surely a place for a liberal student organization like the NSA—provided it is honestly and independently run and its officers do not sell out the membership. But, with blind animus, the far Right is now trying to seize on the NSA's discomfiture to ruin it. Perhaps these pseudo-conservatives think they can thus demonstrate their dedication to principle and, simultaneously, pick up the pieces. It is more likely that they can do neither. Probably most Americans, and surely the great majority in academic life, would like to see the NSA profit by the errors (to use a kindly word) of its past leaders, and demonstrate its fitness to survive by its future works.

Candid Camera on TV

On New York City radio station WOR last month, Allen Funt put his finger on what is basically wrong with the recent Carnegie Commission report on educational television. The creator of Candid Camera did not do so intentionally; he was merely being candid about some of the money aspects of commercial television—perhaps in bitterness that his show is being dropped by C.B.S. at the end of this season.

"It's sickening to anyone to get the kind of money TV performers are paid," Funt said. "I make more than six

The Nation Institute regrets that it could not honor several hundred requests for reservations for its oversubscribed California Conference on Redirecting American Power, held in Los Angeles on February 25.

Radio Station KPFK-FM is broadcasting selected portions of the conference proceedings on some Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings at 7:00. KPFK taped the entire conference and plans to air it complete in a series of broadcasts. The schedule for this later project will be announced in the station's published program.

times what the President of the United States gets." Even more sickening was Funt's disclosure that his co-producer, Bob Banner, received 50 per cent ownership of the show—worth $7,000 weekly—merely for getting it on the air; and that Funt's agent, Ted Ashley, collects "$7,500 weekly for having sold the program seven years ago."

Despite this excessive milking, the company that telecast the grossly padded program made a record profit last year of $64,115,649 on record sales of $814,533,621.

What has all this to do with the Carnegie Commission report? By narrowing its vision to only the poor-relative side, the educational side, of American television, the Carnegie Commission could with spurious innocence overlook the obvious. Examining only the extreme poverty of educational television, and ignoring the bloated stomachs of commercial television, it proposed an excise tax on TV sets to establish a noncommercial public television service.

There is no doubt in anyone's mind that any such manufacturer's tax would be passed on to the public, which already has invested $20 billion in television sets and is currently buying them at the rate of $2 billion a year. But the obvious point is this: Commercial interests use the public air waves, and they are not providing the public service they had promised (else why is public television now necessary?). They are siphoning off into private pockets a boodle of money acquired by the private use of public property.

Commercial television operates at a level in excess of $2 billion a year, educational television at about 3 per cent of that amount. Commercial television has enjoyed ever higher annual profits for more than a dozen years. Educational television has shamelessly begged and borrowed inadequate funds permitting it merely to survive.

The American public not only has allowed such a dual system to be established; it still acts as if one system had nothing to do with the other, although both use the same air waves and are licensed to operate in "the public interest, convenience and necessity."

We could use a Candid Camera on the total picture of American television.

More in Sorrow than Anger

At three o'clock in the morning, after seven hours of fatiguing debate, the representative from the University of Pennsylvania turned to the representative from Yale: "If there are real differences between us, let's not paper them over with sophistry."

The differences among the delegates to the Student Conference on Vietnam, held at Cornell, February 15 to 18, could be acknowledged in such generous spirit because they were so minor when compared to the range of agreement. Surprisingly, in a conference made up only of representatives from official student governments, no unmoving middle sat athwart the proceedings. In fact, the two rival resolutions which had preoccupied the long night were but variations of the same theme; they were both ringing denunciations of U.S. policy in Vietnam. The conference, whose heavily Eastern complement of forty-two delegations was sprinkled with representation from such regional outposts as Berkeley, Duke and Carleton, divided mainly on the mechanics of United States withdrawal. The final vote was 51 to 42 (one man, one vote) for the tougher resolution, calling for a halt to all bombing, immediate withdrawal of American troops under international supervision, and recognition of the National Liberation Front as a "largely independent political force" worthy of separate negotiation. The defeated resolution would have stayed the withdrawal until the establishment of an interim government through talks between the NLF and Saigon.

The tone of the resolution, offered more in sorrow than anger, was that of loyal but troubled youth, respectfully rejecting the prejudices of their elders. "We believe ourselves to be representative Americans who love our country and the ideals which it has given to the world," the students affirmed; but they concluded that "because of the crusading rhetoric in the cold war, the misapprehension of the changing nature of world communism, and the failure to perceive clearly the character of social change in the underdeveloped world, the United States is now pursuing a reactionary foreign policy." Prevention of future wars, a less debatable topic than therapeutics for Vietnam, drew a quick 50-to-25 vote for the proposition that the "insurgency in Thailand is primarily an economic problem" calling for nonmilitary solutions.

That buttressing argument of economics was characteristic of the didactic temper of the conference. The trouble with policy makers, the students seemed to imply, is probably not their intentions but their perception, which might yield to the weight of contrary evidence. Every resolution thus came to the floor a miniature white paper stuffed with historical prologue and adorned with assertions of is and ought. The delegates put themselves through a daily intellectual regimen of lectures and discussions in which a speaker could often be seen rising to argue a point, book in hand, reverently turning the pages as if looking for an appropriate psalm.

Least impressed by the arguments of the final resolution were the nine angry men who stalked out of the session to protest its "biased disposition" after their pro-war resolution had failed miserably. The delegates from Fordham, St. John's (Brooklyn and Jamaica), MIT and Rutgers refused to believe that a conference which delivered only twelve votes for king and country represented opinion on the nation's campus. The dissenters argued that the conference was unrepresentative since only about one-fourth of the delegation had been selected by a campus election specifically on the Vietnamese question. Admittedly, the dissenters were not so elected either; they said they simply knew in their hearts that they embodied the red-blooded majority of college students.

Bernard Fall

His short, turbulent and splendid life was not marked by the usual chasm between the scholar and the man of action. At 16 he was a member of the French Resistance; when he wrote of war, he did not get his information from the books. He spent almost as much time in the combat areas of Vietnam as at home. What Senator McGovern said of him could be said by The Nation's editors as well: "I personally came to regard him as the most valuable single source of information and interpretation on the background of the Vietnamese conflict." One of his early pieces for The Nation has a significant title: "Solution in Indo-China: Cease-Fire, Negotiate." The date was March 6, 1954. He was always generous with advice and counsel, and his guidance was always valuable. Would that it had been heeded in high places!

Needling the Press

Some years ago, the editorial page editor of the lamented New York Herald Tribune pointed out that ideas rarely originate in the big media; rather, one is apt to find them in more or less obscure places, where writers have nothing to stop them from thinking. It would be wrong to conclude that such writers are smarter than those on the big media. A wealthy, powerful publication wants above all to remain wealthy and powerful. This imperative puts a premium on not thinking the wrong thoughts; it also influences decisions on what is, and what is not, news. But here also the small publication plays an intrusive role—it may force a big newspaper to print something that the editors wished would go away and not bother them. A small publication, Grassroots Editor, has reconstructed how this happened in Denver during the housewives' boycott of supermarkets, a movement which spread across the country and is still reverberating in the national economy.

As early as August, 1966, groups of Denver women were complaining about prices to the food chains. In mid-September they had their first meeting with supermarket officials. The women understood the importance of publicity and appealed to the Denver dailies to let the city know of their activities; they were told this sort of thing wasn't newsworthy. University Park News, a local weekly, was less inhibited. On September 22, it carried a story about one of the meetings between the embattled housewives and their supermarket opponents. On the same day, Cervi's Rocky Mountain Journal, a weekly, carried a story, "Housewives Arming for Price Fight," on page 31. On October 5, Cervi's ran a lead story, "Housewives War on Supermarkets to Open October 17." The paper judged that the story fell into the public-service class and refrained from copyrighting it. The next morning three radio stations hit the story heavily, followed in the afternoon by television channels 2, 4, 7 and 9.

Now the dailies were on the spot. The Denver Post had to print something and did—on page 37. As the story kept growing, it forced its way forward; on October 9 it reached page 2 in the Post. In the Rocky Mountain News it got as far as page 5. The Associated Press received an inquiry from New York, looked into the situation, and put the story on the national wires.

In Baltimore, a food industry representative accused Cervi's Rocky Mountain Journal of having instigated the boycott. Cervi's was not contrite. As for the two dailies, one can, if one chooses, conclude that they ignored the story for several weeks in the honest conviction that it wasn't news. But any newspaper man will regard this as a worse reflection on the editors than saying that they were influenced by their large revenues from supermarket advertising. Journalists may forgive excessive caution but lack of curiosity, never.

THE CHINA PUZZLE

OLD MAN IN A HURRY

C. P. FITZGERALD

Mr. FitzGerald teaches Far Eastern history at Australian National University. He is the author, most recently, of The Third China (F.W. Cheshire, Ltd.).

Canberra

Whatever else the Great Cultural Revolution and the Red Guard movement may or may not have achieved, they have taught the China experts humility. The self-confidence, the assurance of informed interpretation are gone, to be replaced by a rueful awareness that all is speculation, that every theory is rapidly discredited, that each hypothesis is demolished by the next day's news. Yet these new facts must be fitted into some interpretation, must make sense, even if no observer will now be prepared to assert that the interpretation will not prove nonsense next week. Accordingly, with every reservation concerning the development and outcome of the crisis in China today, certain broad questions can be discussed and some observations made.

Three major questions present themselves: Why did the Cultural Revolution apparently suddenly and unexpectedly arise and develop with such astonishing rapidity in the summer of 1966? What are the real ends which this movement seeks to attain? What is the true character and political meaning of the crisis? It cannot be suggested that the answer to any of these questions is clear or definite, but it can be claimed that the official Chinese explanation accounts for all the known facts no better than do the numerous theories put forward by the "China watchers." It may be as well to glance first at the shortcomings of this official explanation.

The Cultural Revolution, we are told, was a spontaneous uprising on the part of the young, dedicated followers of the leader of the Chinese Revolution, Chairman Mao Tse-tung. It arose because leading members of the Communist Party itself were deviating from the true doctrine as expounded in the Thought of Mao Tse-tung, were using their position for selfish aims, and were permitting a revival of bourgeois manners and ideology. The aims of the movement are to clean out this element, to eliminate its pernicious influence, and to uproot the noxious growth of bourgeois manners and ideas. The character of the movement is democratic, an upsurge of the mass of the people awakened to the failings of some men in high places, a movement inspired by the Thought of Mao Tse-tung, determined to insure that these doctrines shall prevail and guide the future path of the revolution. It has nothing to do with such political matters as the succession to supreme power or the ambitions of personalities, other than to remove from office men who have failed to mold their conduct on Mao Tse-tung's precepts.

This explanation is truly a lucus a non lucendo—one which by omitting all inconvenient facts illuminates nothing. A spontaneous movement of the young, that is of people who have neither influence, power nor resources, was able within a few months or even weeks to mobilize from all parts of China thousands, and even, we are told, millions of students and teen-age schoolboys; organize them into Red Guards, transport them across hundreds of miles, feed them, lodge them, and rally them at Peking and other large cities. There they are able to carry on a bitter campaign against certain classes and individuals, and are permitted to molest these people, to publish denunciations of high party members and ministers—all in the name of the Thought of Mao Tse-tung as set out in a handy red-covered booklet, printed by the millions of copies and to be found in the hand of every Red Guard. This is a very considerable logistic achievement for boys and girls to carry out.

The persons attacked and dismissed from office, and those still under attack, but not yet out of office, include men who were well known as ardent supporters of Marxism-Leninism, fierce opponents of Russian revisionism, sharp critics of the West and its policies. On the other hand, some who were less conspicuous in these attitudes have been immune from Red Guard criticism and retain positions of great power. Among the intellectuals denounced as infected with bourgeois tendencies are several who are celebrated for their wholehearted support of the Communist revolution and all its previous policies. The progress of the movement has been associated with the rise to great influence of people not formerly rated as major leaders, and in some cases almost unknown in the political field.

Western observers of China and other Communist countries have long been accustomed to assume, on the best information, that all changes of line, all shifts of policy, whether internal or in foreign relations, were decided by the top leadership, carried out by the obedient party, and proclaimed to the nation and the world with complete public unanimity, no discordant voice being heard, no dissent acknowledged. Today the activity of the Red Guards is manifestly, even admittedly, opposed by persons of influence and power; the denunciations of leading men are not now followed automatically by their disgrace and removal from office; some remain, still under attack; against others, attacks are discontinued, then renewed, then once more abandoned. What has become of that monolithic unity which was the accepted characteristic of totalitarian regimes? Following the poster war of denunciation carried on by the Red Guards, the outside observer might be excused for thinking that he was witnessing something like a Western election campaign, carried on, to be sure, with unseemly violence of language, but essentially revealing open political disagreement, openly expressed. If this is what is meant by describing the Cultural Revolution as "democratic," it almost qualifies, in a wry way, for that description.

It can, therefore, be held as certain that whatever the nature of the Red Guard movement, or its final aims, it has involved China in a political crisis of a kind hitherto unprecedented in the Communist world. Previously, there have been disagreements, there may have been plots, but those who did not carry the day in the inner and highest circles of leadership were purged, removed from office silently and often without any disclosure of the fact or of their fate for many months. The outward unity was always sedulously preserved. One certainty is that this is not so today. Still more significantly, certain very prominent figures whose characters and actions might be thought to mark them as obvious targets for Red Guard denunciation not only escape all censure, but have, almost alone, uttered warnings against excessive zeal and the resort to disorderly conduct. On all the evidence the claim that the movement is directed only to the removal of persons who have failed to eliminate bourgeois tendencies, and faltered in their adherence to the doctrines of Mao Tse-tung, cannot be made to fit the facts.

The suggestion that personalities are in no way involved and that the movement is free from any taint of ambitious self-seeking is equally inconsistent with observed facts. Accompanying the development of the Red Guards has been the spectacular rise of the Defense Minister, Lin Piao. Lin is now the designated second in command; the almost openly acknowledged heir apparent of Mao. He was known for many years past as one of the most able military commanders of the People's Liberation Army; an old comrade of the Long March, and before that too, of the Nanchang Uprising in 1928 which created the original Communist Red Army. It is not uncommon to find that distinguished soldiers, when they turn to political life in their later years, are somewhat at sea in the new and unfamiliar atmosphere; they too often tend to become the instruments of men more versed in these matters than themselves. The Napoleons of revolutions take up the task of supreme government at an age much younger than 58, when they are still in active command of the armies. Lin Piao, no longer young, has also suffered for many years from serious ill health due, it is said, to a severe war wound. Late middle age, bad health and a military reputation earned in wars fought twenty years ago would not seem the best qualifications for the supreme leadership of the Chinese nation, even assuming that this post will very soon be vacant. Until events prove otherwise, we must recognize the possibility that Lin Piao, invaluable as the man who could put the resources and authority of the army behind the immense task of organizing the Red Guard movement and its logistics, is nonetheless not the prime mover.

The interpretations which foreign observers can put upon these facts are limited by the difficulty in collecting adequate information from all parts of so huge a country. The official media of publicity in Peking, and many other centers also, are clearly controlled by the supporters of Mao Tse-tung. Information from Canton via Hong Kong, and from Shanghai by way of travelers, seems often to be reflecting the views of his opponents: from most of the other great cities of China, and virtually from all rural areas, there is no reliable information and frequently no information at all. Strangely enough, the official news releases, editorials and radio broadcasts are the source for most of the allegations of widespread and active resistance to the Great Cultural Revolution. It has at times seemed that the followers of Mao were eager to emphasize the extent and strength of the opposition to his policy. This in turn leads to the suspicion that much of this opposition does not in fact exist except in these propaganda statements, and that they are designed to inspire and stimulate the ardor of the Red Guards and make attacks upon the holders of high party office explicable to the general public.

Such an interpretation is strengthened by the lack of any evidence of a coherent opposition movement, operating under recognized leadership and putting forth an alternative policy. Liu Shao-ch'i, head of the state, and formerly the second ranking member of the party, has been denounced and finally, it would seem, ousted from office. Teng Hsiao-p'ing, secretary of the Communist Party, has suffered the same fate, as have Peng Chen, former mayor of Peking and Lo Jui-ching, former chief of staff of the army. A number of lesser figures, but all men holding high rank in the party, seem to have been driven out of office and probably arrested. Some of those who were brought in and promoted to high positions in the early period of the Cultural Revolution, such as Tao Chu, have subsequently been attacked and degraded. How far these men acted in common, if they did at all, or how far they have been selected for victimization merely because they were high-ranking party men who may not have always agreed with Mao Tse-tung on varying questions of policy, remains obscure. What does seem certain is that the attacks and denunciations were for only a brief period, for about two weeks in August last, directed against so-called "bourgeois" scholars and intellectuals. Thereafter, the campaign switched its attention to the higher ranks of the Communist Party itself.

Mao Tse-tung

This leads to the view that the main purpose of the movement is not wholly inconsistent with its professed aim, and is derived from Mao Tse-tung's distrust and dislike of bureaucracy and above all of party machinery. He is said to believe that the consolidation of power in the hands of the party hierarchy has dampened revolutionary zeal, was responsible for the economic setbacks of the Great Leap Forward, and for the unrewarding foreign policy of recent years. Above all, the party was growing more and more like the detested "revisionist" Russian Communist Party; slowly, or indeed swiftly, becoming an elite cut off from contact with the revolutionary youth of China and apt to adopt bourgeois standards of life and conduct.

It might be thought that granted the justice of this condemnation, the normal method of correcting it in an authoritarian state would be the quiet dismissal of prominent offenders and a purge of the lesser men. But this would be contrary to Mao's conception of the all-important role of "revolutionary zeal." Removing some men and substituting others, also party bureaucrats, would be a mere political maneuver, incomprehensible to the masses and also unquestioned by them. What Mao needed was a new revolution to arouse the frenzy and enthusiasm of the young; he would give the rising generation a revolution in which they could play a major part, instead of listening to the tales of the heroic deeds of their fathers on the Long March and in the War of Resistance against Japan.

The party must therefore be publicly and openly attacked, disrupted and purged; moreover, the new regime must be based upon a new system, less susceptible to similar influences of decay and decline. The model would appear to be the "primitive communism" of the Paris Commune of 1871, defined in Chinese terms as an alliance of "soldiers, peasants, students and Red Guards." Such a combination is said to have been installed in the city of Taiyuan, capital of the province of Shansi. It may well prove to be an unstable and inherently incoherent association of widely different groups: soldiers, who if they are to govern, must leave their units; peasants who to participate must cease to farm; students who will soon be too mature for further higher education; Red Guards who cannot be kept out of school indefinitely, and in any case soon grow up. As an instrument for ousting isolated eminent party men and mobilizing mass pressure to degrade them, such a union may well be most efficient; as an instrument for governing a great country it is an administrator's nightmare.

The administrators, indeed, spared thus far in the campaign of denunciation, seem to realize these dangers, and in the person of their most eminent representative, Prime Minister Chou En-lai, have actually uttered warnings that the state machinery and the major industries must not be involved. They seem to follow a line of cautious neutrality, never opposing the Cultural Revolution, supporting it with words, but attempting to restrain it with warnings. In one view this effort is doomed to failure: when Mao has finished with the party bureaucrats he will next attack and attempt to remove and purge the ministers of state and the civil servants. It is also argued in support of this view that if Western observers can predict that the civil service and its leaders would otherwise ultimately inherit all the authority of which the party is now being deprived, Mao must see the danger for himself; he does not propose to cut off Charles's head in order to make James king.

There is also the enigmatic role of the army, the last resort, the underlying force which supports all authority in any state. Lin Piao, Minister of Defense, is not certainly in full control of the army in the sense that he can count on all its high commanders in all parts of the country to do his bidding, however contrary to their inclinations or previous traditions. If the opposition to the Cultural Revolution and Mao Tse-tung were really as widespread and as organized as the official Peking press claims, it would seem very strange that conditions of near chaos could be tolerated month after month without it being thought necessary to call in the army to restore order. But indications or allegations that this has been done are far from clear or proved. It is suggested by some observers that China may be drifting toward a situation such as developed in Indonesia: a failing leader whose policies are becoming discredited and who himself may be losing his touch with reality; an army slowly finding itself the only coherent force capable of arresting growing disorder; a civil service waiting to join in support of whatever power group finally gains the victory.

Another view, at least equally credible, and equally hypothetical, considers that aided by his immense prestige and control of the central media of publicity in the capital, Mao must win the first round at least, while the army stands aloof, and the civil service remains outwardly loyal. But when it comes to setting up a government and regional authorities, upon the model of the Paris Commune of 1871, it is difficult to accept the probability that such a system could work competently for very long, if at all. In a few years Mao himself may be either too old and failing to maintain any real control; or he may die. If the civil service and its leaders remain untouched, they, with the probable support of the army, would take over, and while perhaps continuing to give lip service to the ideals of the Cultural Revolution would put the Red Guards back to school and restore the effective role of the party, although no doubt under new men who would be much less independent of the civil service than the former party hierarchy.

An element of further doubt is injected by the very extreme attitudes adopted in foreign affairs, particularly with Russia. It is clear that Mao is trying to force the Russians to break diplomatic relations. It would seem certain that he must know that such a break could not end there but would be followed by a permanent breach in the Communist world, in which China would be outlawed by the majority, probably the big majority of Communist parties. This would seem to make the realization of China's ambition to lead the Communist world wholly unattainable. This must be, therefore, a change of policy, either induced by the conviction that China cannot under his leadership ever reach this goal; or more probably, in the light of Mao's known character and beliefs, that it is no longer a desirable goal at all. Russia and the European Communist states are all fatally tainted by the disease of revisionism; they are rotted through and through: China, The Pure Land, must avoid defilement, and in the manner of the Chinese Communist Party's original retreat to Yen-an rebuild in the stronghold, which Mao is shaping, a new center from which in years to come the true Communists can once more issue forth to battle and to triumph.

However little such an idealistic policy might appeal to most of the Chinese educated class, Communist or not, it is certainly in character with the Thought of Mao Tse-tung. It is to some degree confirmed by the almost complete indifference to and aloofness from other foreign contacts which now prevail in Peking. Ambassadors of even the most friendly Asian states cannot find any ranking official willing to receive them if they call upon the Chinese Foreign Office. Whether this is a deliberate reduction of contact—as suggested by the massive recall to Peking of Chinese diplomatic personnel serving abroad—or due to the fear of the officials for any visible contact or relations with “imperialists,” is uncertain, but the former explanation seems the more likely.

It has been suggested that an important motive for the Cultural Revolution and the creation of the Red Guards was the genuine fear of the Chinese leadership that war with the United States was imminent. Thus the nation had to be inspired with revolutionary zeal capable of withstanding a major nuclear attack, for which China has no defense. Bourgeois elements who could well prove unreliable had to be ousted from power. Those party leaders who may have advocated caution, or even diminished involvement in the Vietnamese War, were hounded out as potential traitors. There is some evidence that in late 1965 the Chinese genuinely entertained these fears; but that was several months before the Cultural Revolution and the Red Guards became major phenomena. There is also now strong evidence that these fears no longer dominate the minds of China's leaders. It may be, in fact, that the Cultural Revolution and its inevitable disruption of many organizations and consequent unsettlement of the public mind could not be risked until the leaders were confident that the danger of war with the United States had greatly receded.

Lin Biao

China cannot be expected to renounce, publicly, its support for wars of national liberation; that would be “revisionist.” But all current indications point to a growing desire to avoid tiresome foreign commitments ranging from relations with Russia to the support of Communist movements in Asia and elsewhere. This, too, is intelligible in terms of the Thought of Mao Tse-tung. The Communist Party in China itself had first to find and secure a strong base: Kiangsi proving a failure, The Long March brought the party to far-off Yen-an. Aided by predictable outside pressures upon the enemy (the Kuomintang), the Japanese invasion enabled the Communists to secure very wide public support and clandestine control of vast areas of so-called Japanese occupied territory. After being for more than ten years based on Yen-an, the party was strong enough to enter the open contest for power, and to win it. Today the attempt to wrest control of the Communist world from Russia has failed; the expectation of widespread Communist revolutions or coups in Southeast Asia is fading; it is once more a time to consolidate the base and wait for the inevitable change in the situation; for by definition, the situation must change, and in favor of Communist aspirations. But this may take several years. Mao can devote his last years and strength to making sure that the nation is set on the right road and that doubtful, bourgeois and revisionist elements are eliminated. The real aim is long term, and he will not live to see it; the immediate task is vital and must be completed swiftly; it is only in this sense that Mao Tse-tung is an old man in a hurry.

THE RIGHT HAS NINE LIVES

FRED J. COOK

Mr. Cook is the author of many important special articles for The Nation.

The 1964 election, which was supposed to have settled the matter, in retrospect settled nothing. The direct confrontation between inimical political faiths—liberal and ultraconservative—resulted in a historical election disaster for the radical Right, and the natural prevalent tendency was to say, “well, that takes care of that.” Only it didn’t. The radical Right flourishes today as vigorously as ever, and it promises once more to dominate the Republican convention of 1968. What happened?

President Lyndon B. Johnson, widely touted as the wiliest politician of his time, has contributed to this revival by dissipating the greatest consensus in modern American politics over the divisive issue of Vietnam and by his malign genius for creating widespread public mistrust in the credibility and motives of his Administration. But it would be folly to blame the tenacity of the far Right solely on the blunders of the President. The truth is that, buried though it was in the electoral avalanche of 1964, the far-Right movement was never dead. It is indigenous to the American scene in this latter half of the 20th century; and, unlike know-nothing follies of the past, its roots are deep, its power structure awesome.

This reality conflicts with a good deal of wishful thinking, summed up most vividly in “the little old ladies in tennis shoes” wisecrack. The implication was that the radical Right comprised just another bunch of kooks and crackpots, fringe fanatics who didn’t really matter. Even so astute an observer of the modern scene as Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., has been beguiled by this myth into overlooking the depth and permanence of the movement’s hold on the body politic. At least three solid bases give the radical Right endurance and stability:

¶ A broad hold at the grass roots. Millions of Americans feel threatened and act out their resentments. Some believe themselves menaced by the Negro drive for equality (an emotion that affects the workingman as well as the middle-class resident of suburbia); some couple this racial hatred with a dislike of Jews; some respond with religious fervor to the call for a holy war against communism, and couple every progressive idea intended to make life meaningful in a mass society with Communist ideology. This is the passion base of right-wing radicalism, but it must not be forgotten that it is also an extremely powerful financial base, a resource more significant and more vital than the contributions of H. L. Hunt.

¶ Powerful financial support from millionaire respectables. The alliance of the grass roots and the executive suite is fostered by a whole complex of common fears and detestations. Joint concern with the safeguarding of prerogatives impels support of propaganda activities that brainwash the American people, as one observer puts it, “daily, hourly, year in, year out. It never stops.”

¶ A growing sophistication. The crude appeals to passion and prejudice still go on, but they are now supplemented at the top by a new suavity. This approach appeals to the same basic prejudices, but the message is cloaked in charm and good taste. Television programs are put together with consummate artistry; slick magazines offer good writing and shun Eisenhower-was-a-Communist idiocies; and book clubs aimed at the conservative market whet the appetite with brochures whose style would not shame the Book-of-the-Month Club.

The voice of the grass roots is still to be heard in Gerald L. K. Smith. A recent cover of Smith’s The Cross and the Flag was emblazoned with three main features, virtually a composite theme song of the radical Right: “LBJ and the Jews,” “The Rape of the Church,” and “Inside Report on the UN.” This is the meat-ax approach, and Gerald L. K. Smith has been peddling it since the early thirties, when he first emerged as a disciple of Huey Long. Though he is no longer the headline figure he was briefly in those years, he is still going strong and does very well financially.

“He’s the one man in this field who files meticulous financial reports on all donations over $100,” says a spokesman for Group Research in Washington, the liberal-oriented research outfit that keeps an eye on the activities of the radical Right. “His reports show that in the first ten months last year he took in nearly $300,000 for his Christian Nationalist Crusade. Now, you can go through his list of donations, as we have time and again, and you won’t recognize more than one or two names in the lot. His contributions come from every state, virtually every county—and from towns so obscure you never heard of them. When you think that he is raising probably better than $300,000 a year from such sources, this spells out to a lot of grass-roots support.”

The same kind of backing supports the activities of the Rev. Billy James Hargis’ Christian Crusade. His reports show that in 1965 he took in $1,107,000. Within the past year, Internal Revenue revoked the Christian Crusade’s tax-exempt status because of its political activity, but Hargis insists the revocation won’t hurt him much because his support comes not primarily from big donors eager to claim a charity tax exemption but from a number of small believers dedicated to the cause. “Hargis doesn’t file the kind of reports Smith does,” says the Group Research investigator, “but from all we can learn, we are inclined to believe that he is right in this contention.”

Just what kind of people make up this army of the fearful and discontented on whom Gerald L. K. Smith and Billy James Hargis and Robert Welch rely for support? A fairly typical example, anonymous but by no means imaginary, is a solid family man in a New Jersey suburb, whom we’ll call Joe. Joe is an expert engineer-technician who makes a reasonably good living by repairing and servicing some of the gadgets of our industrialized society. Married, the father of two children, he owns his own home, and he and his wife are sober, industrious people. Joe likes to fish, likes to get out in the country; and when he takes a vacation, he and his wife pack up the kids and go off to some fairly isolated spot where man has not yet completely ruined nature. Here, almost anyone would say, are fine people: solid, substantial, down-to-earth, nothing phony about them.

Yet to Joe and his wife, it is clear that something is drastically wrong in modern America. Every time there is a race riot in Los Angeles, Joe becomes more convinced that the Negro "must be put in his place." He is incensed by what he considers the coddling of the Negroes in our cities, and he feels ever more certain that there is too much compromise, too much political wooing of the Negro vote. As he expresses it, Americans don't have the guts to stand up and fight for their heritage any more. Joe strongly suspects that the reason they don't is that their will and determination have been insidiously undermined by a creeping socialism, masquerading as liberalism, and that it will take drastic action to reverse the trend. So he and his wife believe that Robert Welch and his Birch Society are right, that they see the modern world realistically; and, if you happen to get Joe and his wife talking about the assassination of John F. Kennedy, you will hear them say: "Well, it was terrible, of course, an awful thing to happen to anyone, but if that was the only way we could get rid of him, it was a good thing."

No one knows how many Joes there are in modern America, but the success of the radical Right, the flourishing of its myriad organizations, indicates that there must be millions. To keep these millions almost fanatically dedicated, to keep pushing the doctrine into the minds of others not yet infected, requires a never-ceasing barrage of propaganda, and it is here that the second powerful ally, the millionaire reactionary and his controlled corporations, comes to the aid of the grass roots.

H. L. Hunt, the Dallas oil billionaire whose Facts Forum and Life Line programs were carried by hundreds of radio stations, probably stands as the symbol of this activity in the popular imagination. His new endeavor, Youth, consists of some thirty to forty teen-aged evangelists, trained to deliver three-to-four minute patriotic orations to business and civic clubs. Hunt's prominence as an angel of the radical Right has tended somewhat to obscure the fact that he is only one among many, and that he probably spends a lot less of his own money for the cause than do some others.

General Electric, for example, helped to underwrite Harding College in Searcy, Ark., as a right-wing brain trust and first put Ronald Reagan on the after-dinner circuit, polishing up the cowboy for the governor's chair. Allen-Bradley, of Milwaukee, helped to underwrite Dr. Fred C. Schwarz's Christian Anti-Communism Crusade (still doing well, with an income that ranges from $600,000 to about $750,000 a year). Because many reports are incomplete, it is impossible to document the full extent of such financing, but Group Research staffers have become convinced that large corporate and foundation support of the radical Right is increasing. Occasionally an isolated event suggests the magnitude of this support. For example, Dallas Bedford Lewis, the head of the Doctor Ross Dog Food Company, had been for many years a financial pillar of the radical Right. When he died recently, he left a will, which his widow is now contesting, bequeathing $1 million each to the John Birch Society and to Dan Smoot.

Among the living, kicking angels of the radical Right probably none is more important today than Patrick J. Frawley. Frawley built Papermate Pen into a property that he later sold to Gillette for $15.5 million; he then took the controlling power in Eversharp, Inc., and the Schick Safety Razor Company. Since 1961, he has been chairman of the board of Technicolor, Inc., where his vice president was a former Hollywood hoofer named George Murphy, now the junior U.S. Senator from California, and still listed as a director of Technicolor.

Frawley first came to public notice as an important supporter of the radical Right in 1960 and 1961, when he joined forces with Dr. Schwarz in producing the "Greater Los Angeles School of Anti-Communism." In October, 1961, Frawley's firms picked up the tab for a three-hour telecast of a star-studded extravaganza from the Hollywood Bowl, billed as "Hollywood's Answer to Communism."

During the 1964 election campaign, Frawley sent 40,000 copies of Phyllis Schlafly's book, A Choice Not an Echo, to Catholic priests throughout the nation. In a covering letter on Schick stationery, Frawley wrote: "I am convinced that how we Catholics vote on November 3 will decide not only the future of America but also the future of five hundred million Catholics and of the whole free world."

The Goldwater debacle did not convince Frawley that the final word had been spoken; indeed, it seems only to have inspired him to mightier endeavors. In a study of his activities on June 24, 1966, The Wall Street Journal quoted him as saying that he gives away his annual income of "several hundred thousand dollars," and it enumerated, as follows, some of the causes that feed on this bankroll:

¶ Frawley sends $5,000 a year to each of five groups which "fight communism full time," one of these being Dr. Schwarz's Christian Anti-Communism Crusade.

¶ Eversharp pays $20,000 monthly for a daily five-minute radio program about the cold war produced by the American Security Council and aired on 1,000 stations across the nation. Frawley's companies have also put up $100,000 for an ASC-sponsored contest on how businessmen can fight more effectively against communism.

¶ Eversharp paid $175,000 in 1965 to telecast over N.B.C. the awards ball of the Freedoms Foundation at Valley Forge, and it contributes regularly to the foundation.

¶ Eversharp backs the Cardinal Mindszenty Foundation and the Jewish Council Against Communism.

¶ Eversharp and Frawley have backed the Moral Re-Armament telecast, "Up With People," which has been shown five times a week in some fifty cities. The Journal estimated that this sponsorship has cost the companies at least $150,000.

This is not the sum of Frawley's ultra-Right activities. Through the advertising budgets of his companies he contributes to a variety of periodicals. William Buckley's National Review often gets a full-page advertisement, usually either the inside back cover or a page at center spread; half-page ads go into The Wanderer, a lay Catholic weekly of highly conservative content published in St. Paul, Minn. Far larger advertising sums go to Pace, a slick-paper, imitation Life, aimed at the college and young-family market. Pace would solve the complex problems of the modern world by reliance on the eternal verities of God, Motherhood, Morality and Country. It is Ronald Reagan in slick prose and upbeat pictures of young, 100 per cent Americans, and for this Schick, Eversharp and Technicolor regularly contribute 3 or 4 full pages of advertising, including the inside front cover and often both sides of the back cover.

Of all Frawley's activities, the one that undoubtedly reaches the greatest audience is the daily radio broadcast of the American Security Council. The ASC was founded in 1955 by a group of former FBI men to keep tabs on employees in American industry and to watch out for "Communist and other statist activities." In other words, it is a private loyalty-clearance outfit, and for its services in protecting American industry from the intellectually wayward, or potentially wayward, some 3,500 companies regularly contribute about $250,000 annually. ASC's ties with the far Right have always been close. Loyd Wright, the militant California rightist, sits on its advisory board, and Gen. Robert E. Wood, former head of Sears, Roebuck, and backer of right-wing causes, sent out a special fund appeal in 1964. In recent years, the ASC has expanded its interests to include cold-war indoctrination and advocacy of a "hard-line" foreign policy. Editors of the program are Dr. Walter H. Judd, the former ultraconservative Republican Congressman from Minnesota, and Sen. Thomas J. Dodd, the almost equally conservative Democrat from Connecticut.

Advertisements for up-coming programs are frequently taken in local newspapers. In Washington, in the last full week of January, this was the fare that was being advertised: January 23, Dr. Judd—"Soviet Union: No. 2 on the High Seas"; January 24, Dr. Judd, interview with Dr. Lev Dobriansky—"Korea's Economic Progress"; January 25, Dr. Judd—"Soviet Version of Island Hopping"; January 25, Dr. Judd, interview with Dr. Georgi Dimitrov—"Tito's Release of Djilas"; January 27, Dr. Judd—"The Africans We Heed." Another week's programs featured a couple of performances by Senator Dodd, one on "Peiping and Hanoi," the second on "Communist Attack on Chancellor Kiesinger." The titles indicate the slant of a program beamed five days a week from coast to coast; aired by stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Guam and Puerto Rico; carried overseas by Radio Free Europe and the Armed Forces Radio.

Frawley's one-man crusade is only a single instance of the heavy financial underwriting of the radical Right. The leading organization in financing, power and influence remains the John Birch Society. When the society was founded in late 1958, it had the backing of ultraconservative businessmen, including former presidents of the National Association of Manufacturers; it still has that kind of support. Robert Welch had hoped to operate on a budget of $6 million in 1966; he had to be content, he has said, with a mere $5 million—a figure that is still $2 million above the society's revenues for the previous year.

In the world of the Birch Society nothing has changed. Welch, who at one point pretended to be withdrawing from active control, remains the dictator of his monolithic organization. He continues to see Reds and subversives everywhere. The United States, he estimates, is now 60 to 80 per cent controlled, and is surrounded by a world-embracing sea of Red. Despite the alleged pervasiveness of the menace, it has been seemingly powerless against the Birchers. In New York City last year, they won a controversy over the right of their members to belong to the police force, and they followed this up by playing an important role in the November defeat of the Civilian Review Board proposal.

On the national scene, the society was more active than ever. It put together a new, fifteen-minute weekly radio program that was being heard over 176 stations at the end of October. ORFIT, the Organization for Repeal of Federal Income Taxes, was made an affiliate. Civil Rights Seminars were sponsored locally with the help of Birch staffers. The Jewish Society of Americanists, composed entirely of Jewish members of the John Birch Society—the Birch ghetto, you might say—was organized and started a newsletter. A front called TRAIN—To Restore American Independence Now—was organized to promote the society's long-standing objective of getting the U.S. out of the UN, and vice versa, and a film strip denouncing the UN was produced. Two other films hammered hard at pet Birch Society hates. Show Biz in the Streets attacked street demonstrations by students and by civil rights and migratory workers; Anarchy USA attacked what it called "the civil rights fraud" and concluded that civil rights leaders were "simply part of a world-wide movement directed by Communists to enslave the world." On top of all this, Welch announced in Los Angeles in mid-January that he is really going to steam up the Birchers' long-standing campaign to impeach Chief Justice Earl Warren. On the foreign scene, he views the Vietnamese War as a devious liberal plot. We ought "to get it over with," he says, and argues that the Johnson Administration doesn't really want to win—it wants to keep the war going so that it can impose rationing and rigid wage and economic controls, subjugating all of us.

Old, hard liners like the Birch Society are being abetted by a number of new organizations devoted to the task of intellectual propagandizing. Probably the most important of these is Constructive Action, Inc., founded in Whittier, Calif., in early 1963. According to one of its brochures, "The basic objective of Constructive Action, Inc., is to provide the American public with educational materials alerting them to the threat of Socialist and Communist inroads in our American institutions and to the erosion of our personal freedoms by advocates of the welfare state."

M. W. Brainard, a retired engineer and corporation president, formed Constructive Action and became its president. He was also a trustee of the Americanism Educational League, and an important contributor to Howard Kershner's Christian Freedom Foundation. Right-wing doctors, lawyers and educators were on the board of Constructive Action, and so was Walter Knott, proprietor of Knott's Berry Farm.

Constructive Action aimed from the start at getting the widest possible distribution for the periodicals and books of the radical Right. It offered to supply the waiting rooms of doctors, dentists, lawyers and professional people with reading racks loaded with such materials. Human Events, the ultraconservative Washington newsletter, became a major display on these racks, and a check showed that, of the fourteen periodicals with which CAI regularly stocked waiting rooms, seven were on the "approved list" of the John Birch Society; of the forty-seven "basic" book titles it distributed, thirty-seven had won Birch Society approval.

The book distribution activity of CAI reached a notable peak during the 1964 campaign when it got behind John Stormer's None Dare Call It Treason and, according to its own claim, "purchased and distributed nation-wide over 2 million copies in five months." CAI pays a lot of attention to college campuses. Wealthy supporters of the movement write checks, and the CAI undertakes to see that 1,000 books (or whatever a particular check is good for) get into the hands of youth. In Michigan, CAI has paid a lot of attention to key college campuses—those from which the state's political leaders historically have come and where, presumably, the leaders of tomorrow are being educated—and it goes through the dormitories from door to door, distributing its texts.

On another level, the Conservative Book Club at 81 Centre Avenue, New Rochelle, N.Y., keeps a steady stream of selections flowing to the ultraconservative market. The club is affiliated with the publishing venture of Arlington House, and some of the books it distributes are its own, some from general trade publishers. On its list last year were books like Black and Conservative by George Schuyler, a veteran Negro editor who has been on the Birch Society circuit; a revised edition of Human Action, by Ludwig von Mises, a Birch Society editorial adviser; and The Warren Revolution by L. Brent Bozell of the National Review.

The Conservative Book Club's promotional literature is well written. At the moment, it is hailing the virtues of a forthcoming selection—Ralph de Toledano's RFK, The Man Who Would Be President. The come-on blurb says in part, "Bobby Kennedy Is Driving for the White House. Could Our Country Survive Him?"

The cumulative effect of this propaganda blitz is felt in two principal ways: at the polls and in insidious influence in Congress. The election of 1966 was like a shot of adrenalin for the radical Right. Though notable Republican victories were scored by moderates—Percy in Illinois, Hatfield in Oregon, Brooke in Massachusetts—the tide throughout the nation appeared to be overwhelmingly conservative. Group Research specialists emphasize that not a single spokesman for the extreme Right went down to defeat in an election in which the bodies of liberal Democrats were left cluttering the landscape. Americans for Constitutional Action, billed as the counter-poise for Americans for Democratic Action, but a group that interlocks with the John Birch Society, claimed that 180 of the 225 candidates it either endorsed or actively supported won election in 1966, a score of 80 per cent. Of the 121 Congressmen up for re-election who had ACA ratings of 60 per cent or better, only one was defeated—and he was Glenn Andrews, a Republican running in an Alabama district. And California, of course, produced the great and dramatic triumph that is making the radical Right drool: Ronald Reagan, the B-movie actor with the handsome profile and the bland and vague morality program, trounced liberal Edmund Brown.

In Congress, this money, propaganda and demonstrated power at the polls translate into influence at many levels. One of the most striking examples of its force may be found in the story of the continuing, nearly three-year stall of the consular treaty with the Soviet Union. This treaty, signed in Moscow in June, 1964, has been checked in the Senate by a barrage of mail and telegrams spawned by a Washington outfit known as the Liberty Lobby, aided by certain émigré groups. The lobby, with headquarters located almost in the shadow of the Capitol, hopped on the issue almost the instant the treaty was drafted, proclaiming in its July, 1964, Liberty Letter: "SECRET LBJ TREATY DANGEROUS RED PLOT." The letter declared: "Johnson and his friends in the State Department cannot establish this espionage network for the Soviet Union." Senate ratification of the treaty, it pointed out, was necessary, and so the Senate "must become again the battlefield where patriots can resist." This diatribe, with its implication that even the President was little more than a stooge for the Red conspiracy, was widely distributed by Goldwater supporters during the 1964 campaign.

Despite the Goldwater disaster, the Liberty Lobby has prospered. In 1963, it operated with a budget of less than $65,000, but in 1965 it reported revenues of $434,239, a figure, it was estimated, that put it in the ranks of the top ten radical-Right organizations. The founder and moving spirit of the Liberty Lobby is Willis Carto, a Californian who worked briefly in Birch Society headquarters in Belmont, Mass., and has long been associated with rightist causes. An indication of his thinking may be found in his proposal that all Negroes be shipped back to Africa.

Actually, all the treaty does is establish a legal framework for resuming consular relations between the two nations; by so doing, it would give Americans traveling in Russia a degree of protection they do not now have. Though the treaty does not stipulate the opening of new consulates, it is the general understanding that one new consulate, staffed by some ten to fifteen Russians, would be opened here, and that the United States would open a similar consulate in Russia.

Relying on a letter from J. Edgar Hoover that seemed to say such an arrangement would throw open the doors to Soviet espionage, the Liberty Lobby laid siege to the Senate. The treaty, reported out favorably by a 2-to-1 margin in the Foreign Relations Committee in 1965, never got to a vote. It was similarly sidetracked last year, and in the current session of Congress the propaganda began again, with some writers even contending that Russian diplomats could bring in enough atom bombs in their diplomatic pouches to cripple the nation.

This frenzy finally became too much for the moderate Republicans in the Senate, and Sens. Thruston B. Morton, of Kentucky, and Hugh Scott, of Pennsylvania, denounced what they called "professionally inspired hate mail." Morton added: "This avalanche is largely the result of a carefully planned and well-financed 'big-lie' operation designed by paranoids and fear mongers." With Republicans calling for strong Presidential leadership to get the treaty through, President Johnson got Hoover to say that he guessed his FBI could keep tabs on another ten to fifteen Russian diplomats without collapsing from overwork. As of this writing, it seems that the treaty will soon be ratified—after more than two years of unscrupulous obstruction.

In many other ways far more subtle, the influence of the radical Right is already making itself felt in this 90th Congress. Drew Pearson, for example, has called the infiltration of Congressional staffs by radical rightists "the most serious threat to democracy since the Communists infiltrated political-front organizations and labor unions in the 1930s." He has charged that half the South Carolina delegation is "infected with the virus," and he has accused the office of Rep. Mike Feighan (D., Ohio) of trying to help Frank Capell, the right-wing pamphleteer who was convicted in the ugly smear of Sen. Thomas Kuchel, the liberal Republican from California. Capell's latest production is a pamphlet accusing Communists of killing actress Marilyn Monroe to cover up an affair she was alleged to be having with Sen. Robert Kennedy. So far does the radical Right go.

On more obvious levels, radical-Right influence shows in the power structure of the Republican Party. Rep. Melvin R. Laird, the conservative who played a major role in writing the Goldwater platform of 1964, still heads the powerful policy committee of the House; and in the Senate, George Murphy, Frawley's side-kick in Technicolor, has been jumped into a sensitive command post—chairman of the Republican Senate Finance Committee. The chairmanship of this committee on both the Republican and Democratic sides of the Senate carries enormous power; both the late John F. Kennedy and Barry Goldwater used it to solidify their positions with party leaders across the country and collect the IOUs that made their later Presidential nominations possible. Therefore, it is no insignificant matter when Senator Murphy, only two years in office, is elevated over the heads of party veterans and given the reins of the committee that will collect and distribute funds for the Senatorial contests of 1968. It can hardly be good news for a liberal like Tom Kuchel who faces the battle of his political life in California.

Nor is there much reason for anyone to look forward optimistically to the Presidential contest of 1968. In that election the Republican Party, if it is to justify its existence, must give the voters a valid choice. But already the cards are stacked. The rightists who seized control in San Francisco in 1964 have so arranged matters that the largest single bloc of delegates (356 out of 1,333) will come from the South, which is Goldwater and radical-Right territory. To this steam roller will be added California, the nation's most prosperous state. Further inroads have been made into the party structure in the Far West and the Midwest. The Young Republicans are still securely in the hands of the radical Right; the ultras' influence with women's groups in the party remains strong. It will take a virtual miracle to nominate a moderate like Gov. George Romney, of Michigan. As of now, it looks as though it will be much easier, and much more likely, for the Republicans to nominate that new-new man of the people, Richard Milhous Nixon.

THE CYBERNETICS OF BLUNDER

MORDECAI ROSHWALD

Mr. Roshwald, author of Level 7, a novel of a future war, teaches at the University of Minnesota.

Contrary to popular belief, science is simpler, less complex, less sophisticated, than reality. It is true, of course, that scientific formulas may prove quite intricate; this, however, does not mean that the things they try to formulate, including situations produced by laymen, are less complex. It is the attempt to generalize that makes for the intricacy of science, yet its intricacy is no guarantee of reliability: the particular, the unique, may well escape the net of the formula, however finely knotted it may seem. In the realm of political affairs, the net has had singularly big holes, while the situations retain an unusual degree of individuality. In other words: the generalizations are too broad to net the phenomena. No wonder that such a peculiar situation as that of Vietnam slips through the net.

Modern social scientists—in their attempt to be scientific, to grasp reality in general formulas—incline to think in models. When you ask a social scientist today why Nation A wages war on, or makes peace with, Nation B, do not expect an answer “because of economic interests,” or “because of traditional hostility” or “because of man’s insanity.” Such answers are regarded as fit for a journalist or a philosopher. The scientist will tell you it is all bound up with the decision-making process. Only very few people seem to realize that this phrase means no more than that decisions in politics are made, and that there are agents who make them. Most laymen—and not a few nonlaymen—seem to believe that the answer is one of substance and that a formula exists which really explains how decisions are made. And if one finds it difficult to understand how a single formula can encompass decision making in such diverse countries as the United States, Russia, China, Congo and Vietnam, there is always the consolation that what is difficult for men is a mere child’s game for electronic computers.

It is hard to know to what extent computers have participated in making decisions in various decision-making situations concerning the war in Vietnam, but it is a fair guess that the computer mentality has had a considerable impact on the involvement in Southeast Asia. This mentality implies that one can rely on science and ignore common sense, that one should trust theory and forget about reality, that there are objective answers which dwarf the significance of subjective experiences. The domino theory, the game theory, the escalation model, are all expressions of this sophisticated credulity.

Nobody has tested the domino theory yet, though one could be suspicious of a model which is based not even on the domino game but on the way a 3-year-old child plays with dominoes. So far the nations of Southeast Asia have shaped their policies with a rather un-domino-like individuality, if we bear in mind Indonesia, Cambodia and some other examples.

The slightly more sophisticated notion that in a conflict between a superpower and an underdeveloped, small nation, all the trump cards are in the hand of the mighty is another case of naïveté. The game theorists and their credulous flock simply forget that human beings—for better or worse—do not behave according to rules, however logical. Human beings, especially in the dangerous game of politics, do not behave rationally—if they did, there would have been no wars in the first place. Some people, and nations, prefer martyrdom—however absurd it may be—to peace. Some people, and nations, are sensitive on points of honor. Some are not sportsmanlike at all, and prove bad losers. You can play chess with someone who accepts the rules, but if he ignores them, there is no way of predicting the outcome of a game, even if one party has a crucial advantage. For without rules the game ceases to be one, as the Vietnamese situation proves.

The naive acceptance of the game theory as a pattern for dealing with international conflicts may be not only due to the credulity of politicians and generals in the omnipotence of the new science; it may also stem from the American pattern of social and economic life, which fits into and reinforces the concepts of game theory. This pattern is well known: competition within the framework of law, i.e., accepted rules. If the small business goes under because the corporation is stronger and has escalated competition by de-escalating prices beyond the resistance power of the small firm, this surely should apply to the conflict between U.S.A., Inc. and Uncle Ho’s grocery store. The trouble is that Uncle Ho does not abide by the rules. Possibly, he may be thinking in altogether different concepts, though having been to the West, may express them in “models” as well. His model, one would guess, is the rice paddy, or swamp: the heavier your boots, the deeper you sink. This may make him conclude—at his own peril—that the barefoot Vietnamese have an edge over the well-shod soldiers of the richest and best-equipped army in the world.

The blunder is here and one can only express a belated wish that the policy planners and decision makers had had the sense to ponder about the mentality of their potential adversary and the social and political realities of Indo-China, before plunging into the conflict, confident in their superiority and confiding in computers and game-theory specialists. Had they read, carefully, Graham Greene's The Quiet American, instead of relying on mechanical computer logic, they might have sensed the subtleties of the political arena in Southeast Asia. But then Greene is a novelist, an artist with an instinct for the unique and peculiar—not a scientist who carries the universal answer in a simple formula.

That belated advice to politicians applies also in a democracy to the ordinary citizens. To ponder about the other side, without thinking of oneself as the ultimate model of humanity, would have spelled more caution. The mere pondering and thinking about a political situation, instead of relying on conflict specialists and electronic brains, would have led to more public interest, more public knowledge, and less obscurity and apathy. Even the present suspicions about the credibility of the President, which are the expression of a residual common sense in the populace, need not have become so deep, had there been a continuous interest in and knowledge of the situation.

Whether these attitudes—of politicians and citizens—would have prevented the present blunder is hard to know. What is now more important—they may prevent similar blunders in the future.

CALIFORNIA REVOLUTION 7

LIFE IN THE INSTANT CITIES

THEODORE ROSZAK

Mr. Roszak teaches British history at California State College at Hayward.

Berkeley

Well over 100 New Towns of one description or another are presently under construction or in the planning stage in the United States. More than one-third of them are in California, and it is likely that the state will continue to dominate these efforts at shoring up the disintegration of American cities. California's seemingly uncheckable population boom; its citizens' masochistic fascination with the agony of freeway commuting; the pre-eminence in California's economy of light industry which can locate almost anywhere; the vast accessibility of California land to speculators and private developers—these factors will probably continue to invite and encourage New Town and satellite city developments in California.

There is also the fact that urban sprawl and blight seem to be far more hideously advanced in California than any place else on earth. In many cases the destruction has been for nothing better than to create ghost towns. In some of the cheaper and more hideous San Francisco Bay Area tracts (they bear names like "Tropicana Village" or "Eden Roc" or "Olé!") down payments and terms are so low that transient families can buy, move in, dilapidate, then abandon the property and vanish. It is no secret that many areas of California are grossly overbuilt with such tracts and that both savings and loans associations and developers are sweating to save sour investments. (See "The Easy Lenders" by Michael Harris; The Nation, August 22, 1966.)

As of today, nothing worth mentioning in the way of an enforceable official program or an active public agency stands in the path of this state-wide devastation. So, by default, the very few efforts to plan and direct the chaotic growth of California have emerged from the real estate interests themselves. It is certainly the most significant single aspect of the New Towns—not only in California but across the nation—that they are the product of private planning and investment. In marked contrast to the British and Scandinavian New Towns, most of which have been government undertakings from first to last, the American New Towns are an effort by private capital to solve the problems of urban decay. One might suspect from the outset that in this instance as in so many others, public good and private gain won't mix, and that no better than a bad compromise between the two will result.

The two most ambitious New Towns now under construction in California are Foster City, located about 20 miles south of San Francisco on the San Francisco peninsula, and Valencia, in the San Fernando Valley, north of Los Angeles. Another as yet unnamed town, which is far larger and in some respects more interesting than either of these, but which is still very much in the planning stage, will rise on the 88,000-acre Irvine Ranch east of Los Angeles, and will use a new branch of the University of California as the economic core for its projected 500,000 population. Most of the other California New Towns are either little more than glorified housing tracts—cum-shopping centers, or well-to-do old folks' towns, like the various Leisure World developments, and are too trivial or too eccentric to merit attention as efforts at city planning.

But both Valencia and Foster City are comparable to Robert Simon's Reston in Virginia and James Rouse's Columbia in Maryland. [See Architecture columns by Ervin Galantay, The Nation, December 12 and 26, 1966.] They purport to be conscientious attempts to inhibit urban blight by achieving Ebenezer Howard's vision of the garden city. Indeed, Howard's idea of the self-contained satellite town—totally planned from the beginning, embracing all the vital services of a community and supported by its own economic base—is frequently referred to in the literature for both towns.

Valencia, whose designer is Victor Gruen and Associates, is the more grandiose effort of the two; Foster City is further along in the building (4,000 people are already living there). The site for Valencia is the 44,000-acre Newhall ranch, about 20 miles north of Burbank and presently inhabited by many cattle and a few hundred oil wells. The plans call for a city of 200,000 to 250,000 population by 1990, largely supported by its own industrial park. This, along with the projected Irvine, is by far the largest New Town development in America, dwarfing even Reston which is planned for 75,000 inhabitants on 6,750 acres, and at least six times as large as Foster City, which is expected to have a population of only 35,000 on 2,600 acres by 1974. (Foster City more nearly approaches the dimensions of Howard's model, which was planned for 32,000 people.)

Foster City takes its uninspired but no doubt ego-gratifying name from T. Jack Foster, an Oklahoma land developer. In the early 1960s, Foster bought Brewer Island, a swampy grazing area in San Francisco Bay just east of San Mateo, filled it in here and there, diked it to form lagoons and canals, and set about investing half a billion dollars in "a new kind of metropolis, pre-planned every step of the way." The gushing promotional literature for Foster City insists on exaggerating the community into a "metropolis" when it isn't calling it a "dream."

Nevertheless, Foster City requires attention because it is an example of what the New Town concept has come to mean among private builders—and through them to the public at large. It was, for example, the subject of a special and very ambitious exhibition in 1965 at the San Francisco Museum of Art; therefore, to a large part of the Bay Area public it exemplifies the New Town idea. Unfortunately, the first thing one notes about the project is the amount of Madison Avenue persuasion that envelops what offers itself as a sober attempt to solve a major social problem. This viewpoint is also symptomatic of many of the gravest weaknesses of profit-based town planning.

But before turning to those weaknesses, what is there to be said in favor of instant cities like Valencia and Foster City? I think there are two points to be credited to their planners (both sites boast of having been two whole years in the planning). To begin with (as at Reston and Columbia), a deliberate effort has been made, at least in theory, to break away from the depressing dormitory suburb, and to turn instead toward a more organically planned community. The Valencia developers put it this way:

Parts of the Valley could be profitably turned over to tract developers and become an extension, in style and function, of the variegated sub-cities and "bedroom" towns of the San Fernando Valley. Or they [the developers] could elect to create an island of reason in the path of the metropolitan sprawl. . . . Once having rejected the attractions of the conventional sub-division, the builders are committed to a city. A city which will never need the violent therapy of rebuilding.

This means that Foster City and Valencia hope to see a major portion of their populations employed in local business and industry. So a large portion of each site has been set aside for industrial parks. Of the first 4,000 acres of Valencia to be developed, a concentrated 600 acres will go to industrial uses. Of the 2,600 initial acres of Foster City now under development, 310 are reserved for industry. I believe that autonomy will prove difficult to achieve, but it is commendable that, at least on the drawing board, developers recognize the need to dam up the urban sprawl and to diminish commuting.

The rest of what is good about the New Towns can be summed up under the heading of physical planning. One need only survey the plans for Valencia or walk a few streets in Foster City to realize that in these projects private developers have come a long way since Charles Levitt, soon after World War II, set about turning his New Jersey tracts into desolations of fragile and identical match-box homes crowded into a monotonous concrete and asphalt grid. Both Valencia and Foster City have promised to foster variety, recreational space, intelligent traffic control and some sense of neighborhood. On this last point the literature of the two developments reaches high-sounding sociological eloquence. According to Valencia's copywriters:

Of special concern to the planner of Valencia is an environmental answer to the restoration of neighborhoods, those comfortable clusters ideally comprised of compatible humans with similar ideals and goals, which deliberately and by design include both interdependence and privacy. . . .

Thus, at least the physical form of neighborhoods has been drawn into the plans of the New Towns. The main civic center of Valencia is to be surrounded by "villages," each with a population of 6,000; and each village is to be composed of "neighborhoods" of 200 to 700. Foster City will comprise nine "neighborhoods" of about 4,000 each. It must be noted, however (I shall come back to this point), that these smaller component communities are defined almost entirely by their physical planning, not by social integrity.

As for variety and visual appeal, the towns achieve them by providing for a great deal of open space (a very great deal more in the plans for Valencia than for Foster City), parks, malls, riding trails, lakes and lagoons. Auto traffic is intelligently controlled to permit a good deal of uninterrupted foot traffic—especially in Valencia, where, supposedly, children may walk to schools and stores without having to cross streets. Foster City is built around a winding canal which is supposed to carry a certain amount of picturesque boating.

The commercial and residential architecture also contributes to the planned variety. High rise civic centers in Foster City will include two great glass boxes by Mies van der Rohe. Each town is employing a number of domestic builders, and each builder is providing a selection of styles in a broad price range. The base price for homes in both towns will apparently be $22,000-$25,000 (this for very "compact" homes, apparently intended for "retired couples"), and will slope up steeply from there to perhaps $60,000 homes in Foster City and what are called "estate-size ranchos" in Valencia. There are also apartment house accommodations in both towns. These are lavish "garden apartment" arrangements (clusters of buildings connected by lawn and built around a clublike recreation center: pool, sauna bath, putting green, etc.). Rentals for two-bedroom apartments rise from just above $200 per month.

One sees at once that whatever architectural variety is produced, the price range screens out one kind of social variety: low-income families. Foster City speaks of "a balanced community," but it will cater, as do most New Towns, to the middle, upper-middle class. (The price range in Reston is $27,000 to $46,000.)

Finally, to finish off what there is to be said in behalf of physical planning: all the basic facilities of the towns have been established in advance of the building. Both towns will provide sewers, not septic tanks, and have buried their power lines. Such are the best points in the plans for Valencia and Foster City. Added up, they promise prospective inhabitants—and this is by far the major emphasis of all the literature for the two towns—a life of self-contained comfort, active leisure, lavish recreation, luxury and status. The promotional pictures show us happy families setting out for an afternoon sail on the lake or lagoon, children scampering barefoot through groves of fruit trees, housewives strolling about elegant shopping centers, patio barbecues, esplanades, horseback riding, swimming-pool parties, "flower-splashed malls," golf courses, tennis courts. . . . "The finest of all possible worlds!" And that, we may take it, is what these New Towns are meant to be all about.

Some of the luster must be rubbed off this sybaritic image at once. The promotional literature leaves many things very much out of its account. For example, Foster City lies just south of San Francisco Airport and directly in the flight pattern. The island of blue lagoons will thus be treated to the stimulating sounds of the jet age by day and night. And when the airport is opened to the new supersonics, the community should acquire all the charm of living next to the old Third Avenue "el" in New York.

The compulsive thrust toward prestige and leisure tends, in Foster City as in most contemporary American housing developments, to undercut economic value. Home construction often sacrifices finish and workmanship, even sensible design, to lavish effects and cut-rate luxury. Builders know that what sells a house these days is the sunken Roman tub, the spacious "family room," the "queen-size" antiques mirrors, the onyx-tiled entries, the double pullman sinks, the breakfast bar. And the garden apartment designers are probably right in believing that people will forgo adequate soundproofing and privacy to have the inevitable wall-to-wall carpet and garbage disposal. Edward Stone has designed for Foster City a monstrously congested and institutional apartment project called The Commodore (2 bedrooms: $225; 3 bedrooms: $295 per month). But it will doubtless prosper on the lure of its attached putting green and swimming pools. Tenants at the Commodore automatically belong to the "Racquet Club"—"all the fun of a resort combined with the privacy of a fashionable club."

More serious than the skimping on construction is the fact that whenever the mortgage bankers behind the New Towns feel that they must squeeze a nickel, the recreational amenities and the more imaginative architecture prove most vulnerable. Or so I understand from people who have been in on the planning at Valencia—where apparently there have been serious second thoughts about all those big parks and artificial lakes. It will be interesting to see, as village follows village into construction, how the profits of the last development affect the size of plazas and esplanades in the next.

No doubt the physical planning of such developments will always preserve a great deal more in the way of open space, eye appeal and recreation than is found in conventional housing tracts. Still, it is not in the least remarkable that a development pitched at this income level should be able to provide such amenities. After all, a suburban location, most of whose homes sell in the $30,000 to $40,000 bracket, and whose family rentals begin at $225 a month, had better provide a good deal more in the way of setting and conveniences than a "$99-down-moves-you-in" housing tract. The critical question about New Towns like Valencia and Foster City is whether they will be anything more than the usual sanitized suburban reservation. Will they help solve the problem of urban decay? Above all, will they overcome the social sameness and malaise of spirit that has come to characterize conventional suburbia?

One begins to sense the underlying ambiguity of Valencia and Foster City as soon as he sees how persistently their promotional literature emphasizes ease of commuting. The towns, one is assured, are never more than 20 or 30 minutes from anywhere one might want to get. Freeways are drawn in heavily on all the plans, and a projected brand-new freeway to San Francisco will apparently run up the bay along the whole eastern side of Foster City. (It is unclear how this freeway will affect those rather expensive properties now fronting the bay, or indeed how it will affect access to the bay for all the city's would-be yachtsmen.)

What is the importance of all these commuting facilities to a "self-contained" town? The answer becomes clear when one does a bit of make-believe house hunting in Foster City. No matter where you say you work, a realtor will tell you that Foster City is "near in," that a great many people in the development are commuting that far and farther. If you want to buy, they want to sell—and who cares about "self-containment"? Can one expect a realtor to turn down a sale because the prospect doesn't plan to work in the nearby industrial park? In brief, who is responsible for making sure that self-containment comes about? Surely one doesn't get self-containment simply because Victor Gruen has drawn a blue area on a map next to a yellow area.

There are other problems about self-containment. In Valencia, the largest single prospective employer at this point is Lockheed, but there is some doubt that Valencia housing will be within reach of many Lockheed em-employees unless the costs fall under $200 per month. And if Lockheed people will have difficulty reaching the base price on housing, what about the thousands whose semi-skilled or unskilled daily labor and services will be indispensable to a town of 200,000? Valencia is not a community in which shop assistants and shipping clerks, repairmen, policemen, firemen, barbers and beauticians, maintenance men, trash collectors, gardeners, bank tellers, service-station attendants and mechanics, waiters and waitresses—or for that matter even lower-paid professionals, such as teachers, nurses or librarians—could expect to live. Where will they live then? Back in the central city? Or perhaps somewhere nearby, in the nearest low- to middle-income tract: Valencia's own suburb? In the absence of careful planning and coordination one can easily imagine two-way commuting every morning: out go all the Valencia breadwinners whose work is not in the industrial park; in comes the cheap help to keep the city serviced. Such a system could certainly work; but it has nothing to do with solving the dilemmas of conurbation and the proliferation of freeways.

One begins to suspect that only under government direction can a real garden city be built. For perhaps only a public agency can successfully coordinate population with industry. (Indeed, in some of the New Towns an indirect helping hand from Washington begins to make self-containment begin to seem feasible. For example, the government has decided to locate a 2,000-man agency in Reston.) Moreover, only government could absorb the costs of setting up in the towns low-income housing that wouldn't be an intolerable eyesore or a potential slum tract from the outset. In the Finnish New Town, Tapiola, excellent family housing is available for purchase at as low as $2,500—with government subsidies.

Even if New Towns like Valencia and Foster City could achieve a fairly high degree of self-containment, that would not in itself make any great contribution to saving our cities. One of the standard criticisms of suburbia is its tendency to select high-income groups out of the core city—along with their taxes and purchasing power—and leave behind the poor and less socially adequate who obviously cannot finance the culture and social services of a major city.

Early last year San Francisco defeated a bond issue that would have provided necessary repairs to the War Memorial Opera House. More recently still, in August, the Actor's Workshop went out of business after fourteen years of distinguished work, and San Francisco is left without a major theatrical company. For a city of 750,000, San Francisco already supports a fair-sized cultural establishment: three major art museums, two opera companies, a symphony orchestra, a ballet company, a major library. And then there are the planetarium, the zoo, the aquarium, the parks and all the secondary educational-cultural paraphernalia that every major urban center is supposed to provide. Even so, the money that was needed to support the workshop and to repair the opera house no doubt exists in San Francisco, and is being put to less worthy uses. But clearly it would be a lot easier to get it up if the city could tap the money that is being hoarded in its well-to-do suburbs.

Will a 35,000-population Foster City be able to finance its own repertory theatre? The answer is no. Then is Foster City going to help San Francisco finance that theatre? Again, the answer is no. Foster City's money is earmarked for barbecue pits, sailboats, shopping on the "flower-splashed mall" and the usual distractions of suburban affluence. Now that San Francisco has managed to put together the private and public moneys to support another theatre company, the recently established Actors Conservatory Theatre, one may be sure that Foster City (remember it is only twenty convenient minutes from San Francisco) will want to enjoy it. Just as Foster City will want to send its school kids on excursions to San Francisco's art museums, zoo, planetarium, etc.

Valencia will be much larger, but even a town of 200,000 is not going to finance an adequate cultural establishment. That obviously is why there is so much hoopla about swimming pools and sauna baths and sailboats. They are as much "culture" as mortgage bankers and land developers are prepared to offer—which is one great reason why it is ludicrous to talk of these projects as "cities."

Suburbia's selfishness and parasitism have so often been lambasted that it is remarkable how unaware of this line of criticism the New Town builders seem to be. Lewis Mumford has summed up that criticism by calling the suburb "an asylum for the preservation of illusion." The Valencia and Foster City developers might almost have decided, with a kind of vicious perversity, to turn Mumford's criticism into their primary promotional theme.

And on the problems of urban blight they have nothing to offer. Here and there a heroic philanthropist struggles to rebuild the life of our cities, or the foundations step in, or, of course, the federal government. But neither the Valencia nor the Foster City developers will be able to claim credit for these city-saving efforts. On the contrary, their work runs in the direction of further destroying the balance between urban needs and suburban affluence, and so will do more harm than good.

It is, finally, on the issue of politics that Valencia and Foster City prove most deficient. In his Suburbia: Its People and Their Politics, Robert C. Wood has concluded that the fact or illusion of participative, town-meeting politics is what has very largely drawn people from the impersonal cities to the suburb. If that is true, then neither Valencia nor Foster City has cared to pay much attention to Wood. The absolute last thing that gets mentioned in their literature is politics, if it gets mentioned at all. One brochure takes up the blessings of Foster City in this order: location, education, shopping, recreation. Some brochures vaguely mention incorporation—it will happen some day, after the developers have finished moving in the industrial component, have determined the social and income composition of the town, and have set aside the land and concessions they intend to retain for themselves or their backers. We never discover the political meaning of the often mentioned "villages" and "neighborhoods." Are they really anything but colored areas on a designer's map, ringing the parks and shopping centers?

I suspect that the style of home that tends to prevail in these communities gives a hint of how significant the idea of neighborhood is. It is a house that ingeniously retreats into itself. The garage fronts on the street, shielding the house behind it. One enters and leaves home by car, through the garage. The front door is often opened by an electric buzzer and leads into a court, beyond which there is another entrance way. The design as a whole focuses on an internal atrium or court. Fences and landscaping further defend the house. It is a self-contained family unit that retreats from the street, the neighborhood, the world. Not insurmountably to be sure, but the mood of such design is obvious enough. (In the Reston development, however, one should note that homes have been clustered in the midst of collective lawns.)

A city whose sense of politics never gets beyond selfish defensiveness, and an obsessive concern for property values, is a sick city. In fact, one of the common diseases of suburbia is to be just independent enough to inhibit intelligent regional planning, but much too weak to prevail against major corporate interests, the military, or even the state highway engineers. In the Bay Area, for example, all the communities are far too dependent on military contractors to hold their own politically; but they just manage to frustrate all region-wide efforts to stop the pell-mell filling in and contamination of San Francisco Bay.

As an example of what this political vacuousness leads to, consider only one missed opportunity: Foster City and Valencia would be ideal places to start consumer cooperatives. They are large, closed-off markets, all of whose major services and merchandising could easily be handled by cooperatives: the groceries, department stores, gas stations, garages, movie houses, etc. And instead of banks, there could be credit unions. The result would be a community that not only saved itself a small fortune by preventing the chain stores from absconding with the profits of its consumption but that had some basic control over its economy. And this could lead to an interesting ethos—rather like that prevailing among co-operators in Berkeley, Calif., where consumer co-ops have been stupendously successful. But the developers have already leased to Safeway and Magnin's and Crocker-Anglo Bank, and thus have usurped a basic political decision.

The fact is, one cannot easily imagine what kind of politics can emerge when the New Towns have been developed. Once the basic decisions have been built in, what will the New Town governments decide—except perhaps the date of the local beauty pageant, or whether to rename a few boulevards?

To a certain extent, this usurpation of basic decisions seems to be a problem of even government-developed New Towns. But it ought not to be beyond the capacity

(Continued on page 350)

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Simplicity Behind the Disguises

LETTERS OF JAMES JOYCE. Edited by Richard Ellmann. The Viking Press. Vol. II. 472 pp. Vol. III. 584 pp. $25 the set.

KEVIN SULLIVAN

Mr. Sullivan is associate dean of the Graduate Faculties at Columbia University and the author of Joyce Among the Jesuits (Columbia University Press).

Le grand Joyce, Andre Gide had called him, and most of the literate world agreed. But when some ten years ago Stuart Gilbert edited a single volume of the letters of Joyce (a new and corrected edition is now published along with Richard Ellmann's two volumes of additional letters), many readers were put off by what seemed the unrelieved ordinariness of the man. Readers, I suppose, had expected that the artist who in his work had deliberately sought "to refine himself out of existence" would in his letters be somehow reassembled as recognizably human—perhaps as more than human. What in fact they encountered was the figure of a harassed but hardheaded businessman who, when the creative fires were banked, devoted his remaining energies to the unremitting, and often unavailing, promotion of his literary properties. This was human enough, all too human, but there was not much grandeur about it. The voice of the artist, when audible at all, came through those letters in the cautious countering tones of the petit bourgeois. And a reader, setting aside Gilbert's volume, might have been a little too ready to agree with Joyce's derisive self-assessment that he had, under the borrowed cap of a Milesian, the mind of a grocer's assistant.

But readers of these additional letters, well over 1,000 of them, are not likely to be disappointed. The businessman is still around, but now only another persona. "We all wear masks," Joyce as a young man had written to Nora Barnacle, and "can you not see the simplicity which is at the back of all my disguises?" In the same letter Joyce had also written "you do not know much of my mind," but Nora must have seen something of it ("simple-minded Jim," she called him); enough anyhow to have risked everything when she was asked and, being a woman of considerable simplicity herself, to have followed him on no more than a kiss and not much of a promise into self-imposed exile. That was the beginning. From then on Nora was the only person to whom Joyce, stepping from behind his mask and dropping all disguises, ever fully revealed himself. The letters in which he does so are among the most important that appear in Ellmann's collection.

Joyce spent most of the latter half of 1909 in Dublin while Nora remained in Trieste—their first prolonged separation since leaving the city together five years before. The letters they exchanged during this period (Nora's have not survived) are, from one point of view, a bizarre exercise in amor in distans; from another, a brave but no less bizarre attempt to preserve the sexual integrity of a monogamous union (not officially recorded until twenty years later) without forgoing, despite time and distance, mutual sexual excitation. Written with this purpose in mind, the letters are frankly erotic, the more unrestrained passages illustrating what experts in these matters have technically detailed in their handbooks on sexual pathology and—more relevant perhaps in this case—moral theology. There is nothing in Joyce's work, not even in the Circe or Penelope episodes of Ulysses, to match these passages, and where they are equaled in Finnegans Wake, the shock is cushioned for the reader, if it is felt at all, by the periphrastic—and prophylactic—ingenuity of the artist's multiple disguises. But though the letters are undisguised and direct in their sexuality, there is little in them likely to shock the modern reader. There are reasons for this.

In the state of benumbed enlightenment that has followed upon the so-called sexual revolution, most readers are, or would like to think themselves, unshockable. At the end of La Philosophie dans le boudoir, liberally translated and now generally available, the naïf, Eugenie, chortles ecstatically: "Here I am: at one stroke incestuous, adulterous, sodomite, and all that in a girl who only lost her maidenhead today!" After listening to Eugenie, whom no labor of love could weary, or similar accounts from countless other ladies, titled or plainly wrapped, the simple heterosexual pleasures of James and Nora may seem Arcadian in their innocence. But while Eugenie and her sisters are pornographic abstractions, there is no doubt about the reality of Nora and James Joyce. A reader may be only amused by the vicarious voyeurism of pornography, but he will take a very different view of an actual voyeur at a bedroom window—especially if that window looks like his own.

The problem thus raised in the Joyce correspondence has been tactfully handled by Mr. Ellmann. Not all of Joyce's extant letters to Nora Barnacle are reproduced here, and of those that do appear not all are reproduced in full. This would ordinarily be cause for complaint, but in this instance compliments seem in order. Joyce himself had more than once warned Nora: "Keep my letters to yourself, dear. They are written for you." Or again, "I wired you Be Careful. I meant be careful to keep my letters secret. . . ." The surest way of keeping the secret would have been to destroy the letters—as Joyce had apparently destroyed Nora's of that period. Nora, taking Joyce literally, kept the letters (why? one wonders) and, when they turned up in the Mennen Collection at Cornell some years after her death, their secret became readily accessible. At first only to scholars, who have so far exercised notable restraint in their use of them. Ellmann, in making the letters more widely available, has shown similar restraint. This has required both firm judgment and good taste.

The intimate moments in the life of a man and a woman can hardly be thought the concern of anyone else—excepting always the morbidly curious. Their love, which makes them unique, can be of great interest; but their coupling, which makes them like everybody else, strips them in that moment of intimacy of their uniqueness. "Beast gave beast as much," Yeats wrote in one of his later poems, and in another, echoing at a distance La Rochefoucauld's wry aphorism that the sexual act is a mark of the divine irony:

*But Love has pitched his mansion in
The place of excrement. . . .*

Though as good a case might be made for the divine economy, the simple point to be made here is that human love, whatever else it may be, is not exclusively or essentially sexual. (At one time "spiritual love" was to Joyce "lying drivell," a judgment that he was to temper and reverse in later years.) And yet the sexuality of an artist, especially of the artist who created Mr. and Mrs. Leopold Bloom, is among the legitimate interests of a critic and the public for whom he writes. Enough of Joyce's correspondence is printed here to satisfy that interest.

The importance of these letters—and of others less startling—is their relevance both to the content of Joyce's work and to the conscience, or moral awareness, that gave the work its form. The first is everywhere discernible. It is apparent in Nora's innocence of syntax and punctuation (in those letters which survived)—a fault happily heightened into art throughout the equally innocent run-along soliloquy of Molly Bloom. It is almost as apparent in the likeness of Martha Fleischmann (with whom Joyce carried on a silly flirtation in Zurich) both to the Martha who is Leopold's amorous pen pal and (Joyce addressed Miss Fleischmann as "Nausicaa" and signed himself "Odysseus") to Gerty McDowell. More speculatively, the cadenced sorrows of Anna Livia Plurabelle hitherandthithering back to the nothingness of the sea may carry in their flow the almost inarticulate anxiety of Joyce and the anguish of his daughter Lucia as that young girl faded gradually from among the living into the shadows of schizophrenia. In this way the letters indicate the matter, or possible matter, that Joyce used in his work. His real work of course was to transform all this into art by raising it to a new plane of intelligibility.

It is important, too, to keep in mind that while he was about this task Joyce was at the same time transforming himself. The man who sketched a draft of Stephen Hero was not the same man who wrote A Portrait, nor was this man the same as the author of Exiles or Ulysses, nor the latter the same again as the creator of Finnegans Wake. The letters also help to illustrate this other kind of transformation.

Nevertheless, there is a clear consistency in the development of the whole body of Joyce's work—in the movement, for example, from genre to genre: lyric to narrative (and micro- to macro-narrative) to drama to epic to a point, finally, where the epic is resolved again into lyric—that argues not only a singleness of purpose but a oneness of vision. Joyce's gaze does not shift; its object becomes, as the work progresses, more luminous under his gaze. The letters reveal something about this too, though it would require a full-scale study to demonstrate the ways in which the conscience of Joyce—agitated as it is in his letters to Nora—operates in determining the shape and tone of each of his books. At the risk of oversimplification, this can be only suggested.

"Now, my darling Nora," Joyce writes, "I want you to read over all I have written to you. Some of it is ugly, obscene and bestial, some of it is pure and holy and spiritual: all of it is myself." A fair summary. The dichotomy is neat and its resolution, though apparently asserted, is in fact impossible. For Joyce, however greatly he desired it, there could be no reconciliation between his image of Nora as "virgin or madonna" (she is to his manhood, he writes, what the Blessed Virgin was to his boyhood) and his counter-image of her as "fuckbird . . . shameless, insolent, half naked and obscene." He knows fully what he is about: "If this filth I have written insults you bring me to my senses again with the lash as you have done before. God help me!" To Joyce it is filth, to his countryman, Wilde, it would have been the delicious posturing of a pagan, to Freud—old stuff.

"The atmosphere," Ellmann writes in comment on these letters, "is not one of Catholic guilt." Catholics, right enough, have no monopoly on guilt, but Irish Catholics of Joyce's class and background appear historically to have had a notorious predisposition toward just the sort of guilt Ellmann refers to. And the atmosphere, if not Catholic, is certainly one familiar to an old and austere cut of moralist—Augustine ("Grant me, O Lord, chastity—but not yet!") is quick to mind—in the Catholic tradition. Even H. G. Wells, in a letter included in Volume I of this collection, recognized the impact of that tradition—"a monstrous system of contradictions" he called it—upon Joyce. Imagine the latter's bemusement to read in Wells's ferocious scrawl: "You began Catholic. . . . You really believe in chastity, purity and the personal God and that is why you are always breaking out into cries of cunt, shit and hell." Wells, I think, despite his heavy-handedness, was closer to the heart of the matter here. In any event, Joyce, brooding over these contradictions as a young man, thought at times he was going mad.

Joyce preserved his sanity by coming to terms with the impossible. "It is perhaps in art, Nora dearest, that you and I will find a solace for our own love. . . . O take me into your soul of souls and then I will become indeed the poet of my race." Nora was to take little solace from Joyce's art (she never read her copy of Ulysses), but through her, or beginning out of his love for her, Joyce was indeed to become the poet of his race. In him the juxtaposition of opposites (in lesser men mere contraries) was classical in its simplicity and provided a pattern for the work by which the complexities of experience could be reduced to intelligible order. To superimpose an ideal and essentially incorruptible world upon the "real" and manifestly corrupt world around us is to take a cosmic view of the latter and a comic view of both. Even the gods of Homer were moved to laughter at the sight, and not since the days of Cervantes has a comic artist displayed it in such rich and hilarious detail.

The simplicity which Joyce told Nora lay behind all his disguises is demonstrated in the letters in two ways: in the absolute faith he had in his own genius, and in a complete indifference to everything that could not be made to serve the ends of genius. That faith seems to have been both congenital and consensual; certainly it long antedated any visible proof that it might be justified, and certainly too it won the consent—sometimes amused but always genuine—of men like William Archer and W. B. Yeats and even, it appears, that of the redoubtable Lady Gregory. This explains too the irritation and scorn—amply documented here—that Joyce felt for those who he thought, rightly or wrongly, were obstructing the progress, publication, or appreciation of his work. The feelings approximate paranoia at times, but are just as often

Gertrude Stein's masterpiece

THE MAKING OF AMERICANS

(the hardcover edition is the only complete version)

$10.95 plus postage from

SOMETHING ELSE PRESS, Inc.

160 Fifth Avenue, New York City 10010

Or ask your bookdealer for it rerouted in the way of self-mockery.

From those surrounding him he extracted his own form of Peter's pence. Especially heavy tribute was laid upon his brother Stanislaus who quite accurately described their relationship in titling his own book My Brother's Keeper. Ezra Pound, who once sent him via T. S. Eliot a parcel containing, unknown to Eliot, a pair of secondhand shoes, saluted the master at another time as "Jhayzus Aloysius Chrysostum," and true to this role the master had in attendance, though at respectful distance, a complement of sometimes rich, always worshipful and generally helpful women. He used them—as he used the self-appointed disciples among his male acquaintances—always to advance the work in progress. There was neither cynicism nor egotism in this, or at least not so much as would appear had the artist been more, or the art less, durable.

The letters written during the last months of his life have a darker cast than the others. In the summer of 1940 the Germans had engulfed France, and the Joyces, removing from Paris to Saint-Gerand-Le-Puy in unoccupied territory, had apparently hoped to wait out this second war as they had the first in Switzerland. The circumstances, however, both personal and historical, were very different. The Vichy government was less than pleased with the presence of British subjects in its territory, and the Swiss were singularly uncooperative about allowing the Joyces entry into their own. Nearly all of Joyce's time during these last months was given to exhausting attempts, reflected in his letters, to effect this removal.

If he had once signed himself "Job" in mockery, he was now called upon to play this last role in earnest. He was more than half-blind (eleven eye operations in almost as many years) and plagued by sciatica and a duodenal ulcer not diagnosed (his doctors thought it mere "nerves") until the very end. His daughter was in a mental asylum, his son in distress over a broken marriage, and his daughter-in-law—in a state worse than Lucia's—had already been carried off to America. Nora during this time seems to have been in a state of shamed benumbment and of little help in attending to the practical details that wholly occupied Joyce. Meanwhile there was his grandson Stephen in school nearby who had also to be cared for—all of them cut off by the war from friends, funds and (so it was to turn out for Joyce) the future.

The Swiss finally relented and in mid-December the broken family made its way to Zurich. Within a month—on January 13, 1941—Joyce was dead. The tone of the last letters brings us back to another Joyce had written to his son Giorgio some time before: "My eyes are tired. For over half a century, they have gazed into nullity where they have found a lovely nothing."

The ultimate simplicity? Or a last disguise.

Aging Beautifully

THE MAKING OF AMERICANS (Complete Version). By Gertrude Stein. Something Else Press. 925 pp. $10.95. Harcourt, Brace & World. $2.95 paper (abridged edition).

STEPHEN KOCH

Mr. Koch teaches at the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

Gertrude Stein's second major work was a rehaul of the English language in the shape of an immense novel called The Making of Americans which, along with Joyce's two important books, is the most extended and successful experiment with the form of the novel and the syntax of English prose that the literature of the early 20th century has to offer. Written in 1907, the complete version was first published in 1925, and promptly went out of print. (Harcourt, Brace published a cut version in 1934, which also went out of print within two years.) The original has remained out of print for forty-two years, while a reputation for unreadability has pestered its obscure existence, as little boys pester an old lady rumored to have been a great sinner. For that reason, the book's reappearance now casts a certain light on the trajectory of a classic through the history of literary style. In Axel's Castle, Edmund Wilson confessed that despite his admiration he couldn't get through the book and doubted that anyone could. But Hemingway got through it, probably several times (he corrected the original proofs), and the book obviously constituted for him a 1,000-page lesson in literature. Now that any journalist stuffed in front of a typewriter in a crashing city room has Stein's syntactical revolution at his finger tips—from the "feel" of it—reading this "impossible" book is an odd experience, rather like listening carefully so as not to miss those chords in Beethoven's Third Symphony that made the most refined listeners of the time want to scream.

The Making of Americans is not at all unreadable; on the contrary, it is an easily accessible book, written in a plain, simple style which Stein's countless followers have permanently diffused into the air and made a sound in English.

Moving at a leisurely 100 pages an evening, the reader will sail through the whole thing in a little over a week. The style is very much Stein's own of course; there is no other prose quite like it anywhere, but it is neither new nor surprising. Whatever it once was, The Making of Americans is no longer a difficult book. Slipping into the idiom and the quirks of punctuation takes a little concentration, but as soon as the idiosyncracies click, the reader will find himself listening to the vindication of Stein's prophetic ear. Doubtless The Making of Americans was once almost impossible. But now, in the way time has with masterpieces, time has made it readable; time has made it go through that change which Stein herself called the fate of all classics—to become beautiful.

The reappearance of the book in 1967 is simultaneously exhilarating and depressing, a phenomenon which closely

MARX, ENGELS, and the POETS

Origins of Marxist Literary Criticism

by Peter Demetz

This book discusses the formation of Marxist literary doctrine and its origins in German 19th century radicalism expressed in the writings of Marx and Engels. Marxist critics Plekhanov, Mehring, Lukács, Adorno, Han Mayer, and Lucien Goldmann are also discussed in relation to Marxist critical theory and its attempt to derive artistic achievements from economic and social elements. A valuable contribution to understanding the remarkable men who formulated some of the most controversial ideas of our age.

$7.95

UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

75th Year

resembles the recent American première of Schoenberg's Moses and Aron by the Opera Company of Boston, or to carry the analogy to painting, the situation which would exist if New Yorkers were traveling to some obscure suburb of Baltimore, there to see the very first American showing of Matisse.

Writers still have a great deal to learn from Stein—both from her example as an artist, and from the formal properties of her work. Whether they will do so is a different matter; even though it is now set out in shiny blue covers as if it were new, The Making of Americans is after all a sixty-year-old classic, and its work in the evolution of style may be completed by now. (Stein's remarkable innovations in narrative technique, however, have never been really taken up by anyone; they are an open and very spacious field.) I hope these shiny blue covers and the words between them encourage some to take heart. For like so much of our own best writing, this monumental work was written underground; its author was a hilarious joke; publishers told her, "but Miss Stein, writing is obviously not your métier." Yet The Making of Americans changed people's lives before it was even in print, and for a time it did change the course of the art. It is some satisfaction to know that in a period like our own—so filled with all those novelists and poets who have made the word literature a synonym for boredom—a work like this has managed to survive despite critics and climates, that it has held out as Gertrude Stein herself taught writers to hold out, and that it has now risen to the surface again, as if it were new.

The novel takes as its subject two families: the Dehnings (of Bridgepoint) and the Hershlans (of a small Midwestern town); these families are brought together when Julia Dehning marries David Hershland. The book "describes" the grandparents, parents, siblings, servants and neighbors of these young people, discusses their marriage and its failure, and ends with a prolonged exploration of the young man, David, who was once spiritually alive and who now dies.

The Making of Americans is a novel, but it is only tangentially based on the forms of narrative. Its form, like its language, is based in a kind of discursive, analytic rumination. There is almost no dialogue of any kind, nor is there any of the traditional exposition that describes the town, "paints" the corner drugstore, tells what kind of car Mr. X drives or what brand of cigarettes Madame Y stuffs into her long green holder. The voice of the book is exclusively Gertrude Stein's voice, and she never drops it for a moment to mimic characters directly, though she sometimes quotes them herself with the inflection of someone quoting a friend in conversation.

For this reason, one never experiences the illusion of "seeing reality." One hears only Stein's voice in the act of describing and analyzing. Describing what? States of being, rendered as language. This is sometimes done as quasi-narration:

Mrs. Hershland and Madeleine Wyman were then for a while then closely in each other's living, Madeleine always then all the rest of her living was in her being in Mrs. Hershland's living. In Mrs. Hershland later there was weakening, she never had Madeleine Wyman in her as true being. In Mrs. Hershland, real being was rich right living, her Bridgepoint family living and her marrying, and her country house living and her children. Later in her living she was weakening inside her, she was scared then, her children were big around her and outside her, trouble was coming then, the country house living was ending and often then Mr. Hershland forgot her as being, and later then she died away from them and they soon, all of them then, lost remembering her among them.

Or analytically (note here how the "analysis" is coextensive with the "parsing" of the units of speech):

Every one is one inside them, every one reminds some one of some other one who is or was or will be living. Every one has it to say of each one he is like such a one I see it in him, every one has it to say she is like some one else I can tell by remembering. And so they go on repeating, everyone is always inside them and everyone is resembling to others, and that is always interesting.

And sometimes Stein speaks for herself:

There are many that I know and I know it. They are all of them repeating and I hear it. I love it and I tell it. I love it and now I will write it. This is now a history of my love of it.

The style of the book is the extended embodiment of Stein's awareness in the repetitious surge and flow of her private rhetoric—it is the extended experience of her voice speaking, knowing itself, and becoming awareness itself. In its concern for the precision of its rhetoric, the justness of its resonance and fugal repetition, this prose sets aside the attributes of narrative and takes on those of song, though the song in this case is a low, extended chant that takes as its motifs the experience of hearing people "repeat their being" through the medium of language. The analytic manner serves at once the function of description and the function of song—to make awareness be experienced impersonally, and to make it come alive.

Thus the book's hypnotic monotone, its repetitiousness, its narrowly defined vocabulary, and its absolute egocentricity of voice combine to raise the psychological narration to the impersonal condition of poetry. The reader should allow these elements to flow by and through him, as he allows musical recapitulation or as he participates in the singer's impersonal ego.

"Listen to a bird singing," Stein suggested. "It is always the same and yet it is always different each time." Exactly so. The voice in The Making of

THE GUARANTEED ANNUAL INCOME

What is it? How would it work?

Why does it have both conservative and liberal advocates?

Read GAIN, a newsletter of growing national importance.

Ad Hoc Committee for a Guaranteed Income

969 E. 60th St., Chicago, Ill. 60637

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 3-13-67
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

- ☐ One Year, $10
- ☐ Two Years, $18
- ☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____

STATE _____ ZIP NO. _____

Americans achieves an absolutely staggering variety on one resonating note.

The analogy to music may give the impression that the book is "contentless"—that it has no subject matter. On the contrary, The Making of Americans is Stein's awareness of others rendered as language. This language is designed to have all the attributes of consciousness itself. Consciousness is always of something and yet it is always something in itself. Stein refuses to complicate this dualism. Again, consciousness is always whole and complete, and yet it is extended in time, surging and flaring in a linear way, and like a line in geometry, it is potentially infinite and therefore always incomplete, ended only with death. The book's tempo is slow; it does not drop or pick up speed, but moves steadily through its ruminations at what one might roughly call clock time—the tempo of the ordinary conversing voice. Within these limits it has its moments of intensity and even rhapsody.

There are dead spots. Both Hemingway and Edmund Wilson report that near the end of the book the light flickers out. Hemingway was of the opinion that at a certain point Stein stopped caring, and sat placidly at her desk running her pen over paper with nothing to say. They are right, but I doubt that the reason was Stein's laziness. The problem seems to be in the subject matter: a young man and his spiritual death. The passages that describe women are the finest in the book, but Stein does not seem to have had much sensitivity as a writer to the male sensibility in any of its forms except fatherhood. In any case, the descriptions of fathers are the only interesting treatments of men in the novel. When Stein comes to describe the young David Herskland and his sense of life, it becomes clear that male sexuality and sensuality were simply blanks to her. And it may be that the subject of death also extinguished her connection with the prose. These strange passages offer the most interesting example I know of the subtle miracle involved in giving feeling to language, making it be awareness. The words, the style, the forms, the rhythms in the David Herskland chapter are the same as those in the most incandescent passages of the book. And yet the language is dead.

That should not keep anyone from reading this extraordinary work of art. It remains to be seen whether The Making of Americans can nourish the art of the future as it once nourished that of the past. In the meantime, here is Gertrude Stein at last and once again.

Stormy Revelations

J.M.W. TURNER: His Life and Work. A Critical Biography by Jack Lindsay. New York Graphic Society. 275 pp. $12.50.

JOSEPH SOLMAN

Mr. Solman is a painter, art teacher and commentator. He is the subject of the art book, Joseph Solman (Crown).

Modern art criticism has paid homage to the last works of Monet and Turner, but with the unfortunate slant of picturing the artist as a fascicule of rare retinal sensations, full of skill but devoid of thought. Both artists were, indeed, masters of a variety of painterly concepts, and Turner's long career was particularly marked by alternating states of growth and crisis, consonant with a heroic stature. If Turner is invoked by the present crop of "color field" and

"candy-stripe" painters, these acolytes have curiously blurred the text of their high priest.

Perhaps the most salutary aspect of Jack Lindsay's book on Turner, therefore, is his portrait of the artist as an acute thinker, a probing, tormented individual, whose scenes of sea storms are both pictorially exciting and full of complex symbolism. He reveals a man involved in the social ideas of his epoch and in the attempt to encompass many of these ideas in his agitated canvases. Lindsay's approach is simultaneously to carry forward Turner's biography and artistic development, explaining the symbolism inherent in many key paintings, the artist's social ideals as reflected in his favorite poets as well as his own verse, and, finally, Turner's amazing color revelations.

Wading through a vast bibliography, complete sell out on newsstands reserve your copy — subscribe NOW

Sputnik is launched in the United States!
sputnik—a Soviet digest magazine

PRINTED IN ENGLISH
EDITED IN MOSCOW

Available in the U.S. for the First Time sputnik is a monthly pocket-sized digest of 11,000 Soviet newspapers, magazines and periodicals.

sputnik's 250 pages (24 in color), report what the Soviet people think about themselves; their lives; their country, the U.S. and the world.

sputnik covers picture stories; on-the-spot reports; Soviet travel; science; education; sports; hobbies; fiction; memoirs; fashions; business news; humor.

sputnik gives you the pick of the Soviet press in easy-to-read, condensed form.

NOW! $5.00 PER YEAR FOR 12 MONTHLY ISSUES. SAVE $1.00 OVER THE NEWSSTAND PRICE.

- Featured in Sputnik this Month
- WILL MACHINES ENSLAVE MAN?
 - CAN OUR BODIES CURE CANCER?
 - EUROPEAN SECURITY; PAST, PRESENT, FUTURE
 - TRAINING YOUNG EXECUTIVES
 - SEX EDUCATION FOR TEENAGERS NECESSARY?
 - SEEING THE USSR BY CAR
 - DO RUSSIANS KNOW MORE ABOUT US THAN WE KNOW ABOUT THEM?

Sputnik Magazine ☐ 1 Yr. ($5.00)
155 West 15th Street
New York, N. Y. 10011 ☐ 2 Yrs. ($9.00)
Please enter my subscription to Sputnik
Name.....
Street.....
City.....State.....
☐ enclose check.....M.O.

N-1

Lindsay churns up a bit too much material in the early chapters. But the litter clears away by Chapter V, "The World of Poetry," in which he deals with Turner's indebtedness to the poet James Thomson. Lindsay includes quotations from Thomson's poems as well as Turner's own poetry, found in the painter's sketchbooks. Though other painters of the period besides the great

Blake wrote verse, Lindsay claims that "Turner was alone in seriously and consistently trying to link verse and painting, and thus deepen his consciousness of aims."

What were the painter's aims? In canvases like "The Destruction of Sodom" and "The Plague," painted in 1805 when Turner was 30, his themes were still those of cataclysm "that men were bringing on themselves by corruption, greed and violence." But during the next five years Turner was to concentrate on direct landscape, particularly his sea themes, pouring "his most passionate concern and anguish, his deepest insights into them, till the storm on land and sea became for him a complex and finely articulated image of social and spiritual crisis."

In the chapter, "Hannibal Crosses the Alps," Lindsay brilliantly analyzes one of Turner's key pictures of the 1812 period, describing the new elements of design taking place in the artist's work (the arcs, vortexes and gyres), as well as the feelings of hope and despair symbolized in this painting. In "Politics and Symbolism," the author examines Turner's social insights as evidenced by the painter's long friendship with the radical Fawkes, the elaborate allegorical content in many of Turner's important canvases, and the influence of the poet Akenside (along with Thomson) on his philosophy.

Lindsay is thorough in tracing Turner's growth as a painter; his long artistic journey through the influence of Claude, Poussin, the Dutch landscapists, Cozens and Richard Wilson, to his own broad style—a stubborn caravan that should remind young artists that originality is not the first task of the painter. Lindsay is particularly eloquent in his description of a group of late water colors which he terms color structures. "Colours are used to create recession without the least element of chiaroscuro or local effects; broad bands and opposed colour masses. . . . At moments forms emerge with a faint persistent clarity, set securely in space, yet floating on a mist of transience. Again and again we wonder at the grip on tone and structure which makes of the least colour-wash something that is firmly rooted in time and space, and suggests the fullness of the scene by a sort of slow breathing, a palpitation of obstinate life, like the universe on the edge of bursting out of chaos."

It was fortunate for Turner that he became a Royal Academician in his early 20s and that his early vigorous paintings won him enough public approval to make him independently wealthy in his later years. His mature style, broadly spumed with white, was called "soapsuds and whitewash" by the critics. Ruskin arrived on the scene none too soon and hailed him Master. During the Cézanne and cubist periods, Turner was regarded by art critics as literary and melodramatic; today he is sacrosanct—one of the great color innovators, a paradox prophesied by Turner's own trenchant definition: "It is not the love of arts that prompts a critic but vanity and the never ceasing lust to be thought a man of superior taste."

The well-chosen examples in color and black and white are too few for such a scholarly book. At least two dozen more should have been included to illustrate Lindsay's fine analyses. Nevertheless, the book is a highly valuable contribution to our understanding of "the artist of a paradisiac earth and also of tragic catastrophe." Let us hope Lindsay may some day interest a publisher in the printing of the 390 color structures locked in the National Gallery. It would make a glowing sequel to the present work.

THE HAYSTACK

*In memory I see a youth
And a girl looking into each other's eyes
In the surge and height of their life principle,
Which they do not understand.*

*On a northern lake in a rowboat
They catch a glittering fish, slight
Catch, they think nothing of it.
Grace is theirs, youth's insolence.*

*Back at the house an old man
Drools and cannot speak a word.
They look at each other. They drool.
They fall together behind the gray-green haystack.*

RICHARD EBERHART

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY

Graduate School of Social Work

Master of Social Work

Two-year graduate curriculum in preparation for the professional practice of social work in the casework, group work and community organization methods.

Scholarship and fellowship opportunities available

Applications to be made before April 1

For complete information, write to:

Director of Admissions Graduate School of Social Work

NEW YORK UNIVERSITY
3 Washington Square North
New York, New York 10003

LAKEHEAD UNIVERSITY

PORT ARTHUR, ONTARIO
CANADA

APPLICATIONS to teach the following subjects in Economics at the General and Honours level, and possibly also at the Master's level are invited: Principles of Economics, Economic History, History of Economic Thought, Labour Economics, Mathematical Economics, Money and Banking.

Applications, accompanied by a curriculum vitae and the addresses of three referees should be sent to Dr. G. O. Rothney, Dean of Arts.

Lectures commence September 1967. Rank depends on training and experience.

Minimum annual salaries:

Assistant Professor	$ 9,300
Lecturer	7,500
Professor	15,300
Associate Professor	11,800

Teaching responsibility approximately 8 hours a week.

Qualified U.S. citizens seeking a challenging position in an atmosphere of academic freedom are especially welcome.

Coming APRIL 24

The Nation's
SPRING BOOK NUMBER

FILMS/Robert Hatch

The Royal Shakespeare production of Marat/Sade which dominated the Broadway season last year, has been made into a compelling, repellent and photographically beautiful film. It is unmistakably the same interpretation of Peter Weiss's play, but Peter Brook, who directed both versions, is cunning in both mediums, and he has remodeled his stage creation for the screen. There have been losses as well as gains.

The principal loss—and one senses almost from the outset that it is gone—is the extraordinary drive, the circus-like agility, rush and wild efficiency that Brook engendered in the theatre. His stage Marat/Sade was orchestrated like some devil's symphony (indeed, it seemed to me at the time that the manic trumpeter in the left-hand box was actually conducting the proceedings below him). This spectacle of dexterous chaos was inevitably high spirited; the tone was incongruous in a context of insanity and may well have taken liberties with its author's intentions. However, the humor of bedlam is an old idea that has been making a comeback in our theatre, and purely as spectacle the production was a reeling masterpiece.

On the screen, we come up much closer to the action; indeed, we are for the most part inside that nightmarish bathhouse, ducking and dodging (a hand-held camera that also ducks and dodges reinforces the illusion) among the distracted Thespians. As a result, one looks with conscious appreciation at the myriad individual inventions of this incomparable cast, whereas in the theatre one was aware only that wonderful bits were there to be seen (as in a Breughel phantasmagoria) if one but had the time to focus on them. The screen effect is more shocking; I am not convinced, though, that it is more compelling. The stage production created an illusion of insanity; the screen attempts to document it. However, when you look this closely at feigned madness, what you principally see is make-up and mannerism. The Lon Chaney effect is ghoulishly naive.

Also, paradoxically, I felt more removed at the same time that I was brought closer. This is so because Brook has framed his movie as a play within a play within a film. He has set a row of bars across what was originally the front of the stage and placed on the fixed-camera side of it an audience of Parisian notables for whom the inmates perform their show of caged hostility in the guise of historical charade. In the theatre, we were those Parisian notables, and there were moments when the footlights seemed an all too fragile barrier. Now who are we—an audience behind an audience? More puzzling still, we seem to be a disembodied eye that drifts into and away from the action as the composition of events dictates. It is difficult, thus, to take a position with respect to what is going on, and empathy is unquestionably lost.

A clear gain for the screen is the duel of words and wills between Marat (Ian Richardson) and Sade (Patrick Magee). These two, who embellish their characterizations with no tics or droolings, no rolling eyes or spastic mouths, are indeed the maddest of all. It is their manner of speech that gives them away—the calm and inhumanly precise articulation of controlled lunacy. These steel-cut exchanges in close-up produce the awkward fact that one is forced to attend somewhat to the ideas that are mouthed so gloriously, and to worry again that Weiss intends us to take some message from the pronouncements on freedom, death, truth and the spirit of man. But assuming that brilliant madmen will deliver themselves of pathetically impotent ideas, the parry and thrust is physically thrilling.

I think that Marat/Sade offers little if any content beyond its actual presence. Little content, that is, that can still kindle speculation. The proposition that today's revolutionary is tomorrow's tyrant, that men kill in the name of love and seize power in the name of equality are too well domesticated in our flock of guilty knowledge to raise a stir. To take dramatic advantage of such notions today, you must find the oblique ways in which such plagues breach our defenses. Weiss goes at it head-on, as though he had just discovered the perversity of abstract principle.

So Marat/Sade seems to me more theatre than drama. It is perhaps a lesser achievement for that reason, but in the hands of Peter Brook and in the persons of the Royal Shakespeare Company, theatre is raised to a height of proficiency that confers its own delight. It is a remarkable feat to achieve this success twice in two very different mediums. In the film I miss the great dance of the humane bedlam at Charenton, but on the stage I did not appreciate the alert concern of the nursing sisters or the brisk violence of the male attendants that work a lean counterpoint into the extravagant waste of lunatic emotion. And I was much moved, as

A new BASIC PAMPHLET

VIETNAM: Corliss Lamont VS. Ambassador Lodge

In two lively and hard-hitting Open Letters to Henry Cabot Lodge, United States Ambassador in Saigon, Dr. Lamont puts his classmate (Harvard, 1924) on the spot with embarrassing questions about his key role in American military intervention in Vietnam. These Open Letters are unique in that they continue the Lamont-Lodge debate that started more than 40 years ago when the two were undergraduates.

Dr. Lamont shows that President Johnson's war of aggression in Vietnam is illegal, immoral and a violation of America's traditional ideals for world peace. An important pamphlet for peace groups.

Single copy, 25c; 10 copies, $2.00; 20 copies, $3.50

BASIC PAMPHLETS, Dept. N, Box 42, Cathedral Sta., N.Y. 10025

'The habit grew on me...'

So writes a subscriber, explaining why he has been reading The Nation for the past thirty years.

In an age of hyperbole, The Nation makes few claims for itself. It will not make you rich or alluring to the opposite sex.

Some readers buy it because it carries the toughest crossword puzzle now being printed in America. More buy it because the editors have a greedy curiosity about what really happens behind the velvet curtains of public relations and the pious admonitions of government.

The truth is not often given away free—you have to dig for it. The Nation has been digging for 101 years and its readers never seem to tire of watching the editors work.

subscribe to

THENATION

America's most habit-forming magazine

The NATION
333 6th Avenue
New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a new subscription to The Nation.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Mos., $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

name

address

city state zip no.

3-13-67

I had not been previously, by Glenda Jackson's portrayal of Charlotte Corday as a distracted girl reaching out for the comfort of sanity through the memorized lines of her hysterical role in the pageant. Finally, the camera work in the film, its acid pastels flaring and bleaching in sun-struck exposures, its focuses pouncing and retreating, its field expanding and contracting as though through an ungoverned iris, is disconcertingly beautiful, and I believe (as I hope never to confirm) the true visual world of dementia.

THEATRE HAROLD CLURMAN

If I were interested only in reporting my immediate reactions to stage fare I should have this to say about Barbara Garson's MacBird! (Village Gate: 185 Thompson St.): I laughed four or five times, I smiled faintly an equal number of times. I thought Jeanne Button's costumes clever, the staging by Roy Levine entertaining, William Devane engagingly like "Robert Ken O'Dunc" in looks and accent, and that Stacy Keach imitated his prototype "MacBird" efficiently. In view of the event, I liked the saloon atmosphere—with drinks at a price. I was unaffected by the show most of the time—neither offended nor elated—but I was pleased that it had happened.

More important than all this—I have often declared that opinions as such are of little moment in criticism—I was interested in the show's origin in the community and how it is received.

Let no one say that the play has no political significance. True, the script is a spoof: a parody of the ham Shakespearean manner. The characters, by this time it is almost needless to say, are John Ken O'Dunc, patterned on the late President, Robert Ken O'Dunc, on the Senator, Ted Ken O'Dunc, on his junior brother, MacBird on Johnson, Egg of Head on Stevenson, the Wayne of Morse, on guess who! etc.

It has been said that the first part of the play is better than the second because it deals with things that have happened (the assassination of Kennedy), while the second is fiction or fantasy (Robert Ken O'Dunc aided by his cohorts kill MacBird). To make this distinction is simple-minded. Nothing in this play has happened; the presumption that John Ken O'Dunc was murdered at the instigation of Lady MacBird is not conceivably intended as a serious indictment. Just as a dream bespeaks the reality of a wish or ■ anxiety, so MacBird! indicates what its author and those who in one way or another respond affirmatively to the play feel about our present statesmen and politicians.

They think Johnson an absurd demagogue and hypocrite, that Robert Kennedy's "pulpy heart" is replaced by "a precision instrument apparatus of steel and plastic tubing," that the Earl of Warren, against his conscience, may have served as a scapegoat, that the Egg of Head is ■ man who, when urged to take a firm stand, wavers and says: "I know you think I'm acting like ■ toad, but still I choose the middle of the road." And if this isn't what our friends think, it represents how they feel: totally disgusted, altogether distrustful, entirely irreverent or, as the Fugs say about all our leaders, "Nothing! Nothing! Nothing!" Say what you will, and I shall, this is a definite though probably futile political sentiment.

Barbara Garson, who is 25 and part of the Berkeley New Left, is ■ political activist. Her play is a gesture of the "youth movement." That it amounts to a resounding Bronx cheer or a stink bomb, and that these are less damaging than dynamite, is not very important in itself. What matters is that numerous young people (not to mention many of their elders) believe that such manifestations as MacBird! are imperative.

More telling in a way is the fact that certain sophisticated folk approve of MacBird!—but somewhat slyly. They speak of Mrs. Garson's satirical faculty (as if it existed in a void), her ability to handle iambic pentameter, both of which talents are on a collegiate level. They praise her theatre sense, which is hardly superior to that of the lampoons one might see in dozens of American and English universities. Such backbench rebels rarely assert that Mrs. Garson's sentiments find an echo in their own spirit, that they second her motion.

I welcome MacBird! for the "subversive" intentions, not because I am opposed to this or that public figure but because what is called "subversion"—sharp and insistent criticism of our society from top to bottom—is a needed corrective, a purgative of our Stygian world. The play speaks of the "Pox Americana," which is only a passable pun; it also refers several times to our politicians' ambition to devise a "Smooth Society," which is much better. What troubles me, however, is that many of our cultivated gentry should express so much glee at the pseudo-brilliance of these schoolboy shenanigans and tomfoolery. Better this than nothing, I agree, but are we so low in precision, daring and eloquence that we should speak of such trifles as though we were in the presence of Swift, Gogol, Hogarth, George Grosz, Brecht; or even the Village Vanguard revues of the depression years, or more recently, The Premise, the Second City and Beyond the Fringe?

I laughed at Mrs. Garson's adept use of two four-letter words; they exploded at just the right spots. I suppose her to be a spunky young woman who might accomplish more in fields outside the cabaret or the stage but, to repeat, I am worried by the kind of accolade accorded her by more adult persons. Seats of power are never shaken by hoots and toy barbs. The show will not be suppressed. Radical changes in our ways of thinking and behavior are ■ long way off if such things as MacBird! inspire us with a sense of being on the road to a new day. Folks who enjoy and applaud the play may well go on voting for people very similar to the objects of Mrs. Garson's derision.

The rebellion of true satire moves us to struggle rather than to sound the breaking wind of impotence. As a symptom of something stirring among the young, MacBird! may be encouraging, but I look forward to the day when our good kids will have grown up. Much more acutely, I hope those grownups will not be satisfied with making kids of themselves.

Reviewing Peter Shaffer's Black Comedy (The Nation, February 27), I referred to the Kabuki (Japanese) tradition of playing all scenes—including night scenes—in full light. This is primarily a Chinese tradition, and Mr. Shaffer got the scheme for his play from that source. My error was caused by my having seen a similar play performed at the Kabuki theatre in Tokyo. Apologies to all.

RECORDS

BENJAMIN BORETZ

THE MUSIC OF ARNOLD SCHOENBERG: Volume 4. Complete Music for Solo Piano. Songs for Voice and Piano. Donald Gramm, Ellen Faull, Helen Vanni, vocalists; Glenn Gould, piano. Columbia M2L 336/M2S 736.

The principal relevance of this album is its representation of the early Schoenberg vocal literature previously unavailable on recordings. For even the Op. 1 songs reveal astonishing compositional maturity and the abundance of ideas and insights that Schoenberg seemed to command at every stage of his activity. Indeed, for many listeners the songs of Op. 1 and 2 may be the most fruitful introduction to the quality of Schoenberg's thought. In the absence of the neogrammatical problems posed by later pieces, and in a traditional context, one finds Schoenberg attempting to realize in tonal terms many of the constructional ideas for which he later developed a self-contained new syntax. But his effort to expand tonality to project these extended relational ideas is extraordinary, and, in a sense that ought to be more prevalent, heroic. Thus the awareness projected in Op. 1 and 2 of the kinds of relation, from smallest- to largest-scaled, that can be articulated by configurations and successions of pitches within the resources and limits of a tonal reference is surely maximal. And the increasing interest of Schoenberg and his students in the ramifications of these relations beyond the referential limits of tonal structure can be perceived, even by a relatively uninitiated listener, as a direct outgrowth of the preoccupa-

PINTER'S "THE HOMECOMING"

"A MASTERFUL PLAY. PINTER IS AN ARTIST, ONE OF THE BEST TO HAVE ENTERED THE WORLD'S STAGE IN THE LAST TEN YEARS."

—Harold Clurman, The Nation

THE ROYAL SHAKESPEARE COMPANY IN
THE HOMECOMING

PRICES: Mon. thru Sat. Evgs.: Orch. $7.50; Front Mezz. $6.75, 5.75; Rear Mezz. $4.75, 3.75, 3.00. Wed. & Sat. Mats.: Orch. $5.75; Front Mezz. $5.25, 4.75; Rear Mezz. $4.25, 3.25, 2.50. Please enclose stamped, self-addressed envelope with order. List several alternate dates.
MUSIC BOX THEATRE 239 W. 45 St., N.Y. 246-4636

tions one finds in these songs, as they began to generate a language of their own from "inside" the traditional framework. This development is, in fact, evident even in the immediate relation between the two sets of songs; the far greater complexity in texture and polyphony in Op. 2 is an extraordinary one-opus leap. And by the time of the Op. 15 Book of the Hanging Gardens, a new world of musical coherence has already emerged: the tonal reference is now only a sonority and the extrapolations have become the heart of structure.

But unhappily, it is impossible to recommend the album as in any sense comparable with the earlier volumes in this series. Where almost all the other performances (under Robert Craft) have been, if not definitive, manifestly superior to others currently available, the reverse is true in the present instance, largely as a consequence of Glenn Gould's aggressively irresponsible and idiosyncratic playing. I find myself particularly unappreciative of the subjection of Schoenberg's hardheaded ideas, tonal, atonal and twelve-tonal, to grotesque exaggerations of articulation that virtually dissipate the continuity. Gould also distorts and misrepresents dynamic and other textual matters unambiguously indicated in the scores—in the name, presumably of a kind of "personalization" demonstrating that Schoenberg's music has as much spiritual grandeur as all the other music on which this particular interpretative outrage is traditionally visited. Moreover, the piano music has already been recorded in performances that are not only adequate but often impressive in their interpretive insight, in particular by Charles Rosen and the late Edouard Steuermann.

Perhaps even more obtrusive are the inadequacies of the singers chosen to accompany Gould in his performances of the piano-vocal music. In the case of the early songs, and even aside from manifold inaccuracies, it is impossible to discern any basic concept of phrasing, succession or dynamic differentiation (not just relevant or significant ones but any at all). And a comparison of Helen Van-ni's perfunctory performance of the Book of the Hanging Gardens with the Bethany Beardslee-Robert Helps recording (on Son-Nova) is almost invidious. Miss Vanni's singing seems a paradigmatic instance of perfect-pitch vocalism: while many of the pitches produced are within reasonable range of those requested (although the number of alternating departures from and returns to correct intonation is most disconcerting), there is almost never a sense of interval, of the relations between successive pitches and groups of pitches. As a result, restatements of the same notated pitches are never quite alike, a characteristic that almost trivially guarantees incoherence to any musical structure, but seems particularly inappropriate in the work of the composer who first spoke of "composing with intervals." In the end, the album's primary value may be as a useful demonstration of why one should not urge too strongly that "standard-repertoire" performers ought to feel obliged to perform the 20th-century literature as well.

CALIFORNIA (Continued from page 340)

of a government to absorb the costs of patiently taking a prospective New Town population into consultation about the shape and character of its town. This could be done in areas close to major cities which are presently covered with ugly tracts and senseless strip developments. Here, with federal money, state and local governments might begin aggregating already populated land and then planning New Town projects with the residents, gradually replacing what may already be decaying suburban housing with an organically designed community. In this way New Towns might achieve desirable locations close to metropolitan centers, as well as democratic involvement in their creation. And the latter experience would be a useful discipline for many of our city planners whose ideas of "what people need" come out of textbooks and blueprints and various mystical sources of inspiration. Would such land acquisition be expensive? Of course it would. Buying up the land for such New Towns might for a time cost the government almost as much per month as it is presently spending to devastate Vietnam.

The conclusion seems widely accepted now that the privately developed New Towns are not going to solve America's urban problems—except for those middle- and upper-class whites who are really in the market for escape rather than a solution. And in so doing, they are in the way of causing very great harm. For by creating the impression that private enterprise is "carrying the ball" where New Towns are concerned, the developers are taking the pressure off state and federal government to assume responsibility in the building of real garden cities.

LETTERS (Continued from page 322)

war—often a self-indulgent pursuit—but what Vietnam and the Vietnamese are like, what is the quality of life that is being destroyed there, what they feel. From three in the afternoon till ten at night, this program earnestly, with love and humor in a modest spirit that precluded any use of the situation for egotistic purposes, justified its dedication as "An Act of Respect for the Vietnamese People."

Denise Levertov

P. S. A line from my poem, "Life at War," was misquoted in the same article—it should have read "burnt human flesh is smelling in Vietnam."

New York City

DEAR SIR: I am sure Mr. Lourie does not wish to deny that he talked with me on the phone and that he told me in person (after the Napalm Poetry Reading) where the caravan would be on Feb. 2. That he may not have recognized me at the stops in the Bronx and at 95th St. and Broadway is understandable under the circumstances. But at both places I talked with his fellow poets and members of the audience; I received literature passed out; and I chatted with a member of the Pageant Players, who was a personal acquaintance. How a reporter gathers information and impressions is his prerogative; Mr. Lourie may have his own ways. But I am disturbed that he does not seem to have read the whole article; otherwise, how could he say, "If he had chosen to tell how we were belted with eggs . . ." when indeed I specifically mention the attack by Cuban exiles? Perhaps having one's name misspelled is just cause for anger. I apologize.

If he had read on, he would have seen that my article was not merely about the Poets' Caravan. My point was not to denigrate their efforts but to question how audiences might best be reached and how to convince them of the need to oppose present U.S. policy in Vietnam. The element of épater le bourgeois, which consciously or unconsciously was in the Poets' Caravan venture, I felt did not help to accomplish this purpose.

Curtis Harnack

Crossword Puzzle No. 1192

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS:

- 1 See 28 across
- 5 Is to be otherwise considered as a final statement? (2, 2, 2)
- 10 and 15 across Might also be South or Central, if a non-first-class Italian gets mixed with what Whitman heard. (5, 7)
- 11 It should be proper if one can, and yet not remember the face. (5, 4)
- 12 Motion may be at least temporarily stopped by it. (7)
- 13 Would one make demands on a former screen star? (7)
- 14 Is the salad of a poor sailor? (6)
- 15 See 10 across
- 18 One gets by with this gear, perhaps. (7)
- 21 Either of the dancers in the fancy house on the corner? (6)
- 24 Possibly a pecan's more appropriate before dinner! (7)
- 26 Mail a good one for the favorite voyager? (4-3)
- 27 All the more like a riot, or fair, perhaps. (1, 8)
- 28 and 1 across It sounds as though it should be especially regular, but in fact it's very unusual. (13)
- 29 Behaves like a bonny boat, but some bikes have more than two. (6)
- 30 A postulate is a bad omen in what 11 properly is. (8)

DOWN:

- 1 Recent leaf to turn over? (2, 4)
- 2 Not necessarily histories, even though they tell of important engagements. (4, 5)

- 3 Logically, how some kids are brought up across the ocean. (7)
- 4 Called again, if the numbers in the book are wrong? (7)
- 6 Extra money in the till, but probably not good for the draft. (7)
- 7 How old is the moon on January 1? (5)
- 8 and 23 down Wand, no longer dark? (3, 5, 2, 4)
- 9 Box, perhaps, with someone looking for a snap job. (6)
- 16 Having become sick, gains as they say? (3-6)
- 17 A change of places is not ordinary for the TV. (8)
- 19 Change for a dime, put into what should be charged. (7)
- 20 A light substance to study, such as D'Artagnan. (6)
- 21 Scene of some fighting in a card game?
- 22 Variety of bean, in addition? Light, in part! (7)
- 23 See 11 down
- 25 Nose-ring in the middle, or just a sort of ring? (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1191

ACROSS: 9 Venetian; 10 Nordic; 11 Maniacs; 15 Overpays; 20, 24, 1, 26, 14, 12, 8, 28, 17, and 4 Little drops of water, little grains of sand, make the mighty ocean and the pleasant land; 22 Insight; 27 Rehaired. DOWN: 2 Americana; 3 Evincend; 5 Tonnage; 6 Large; 7 Behalf; 13 Posts; 16 Put up with; 18 Liners; 19 Aphasia; 20 Lurched; 21 Loosen; 23 Iliac; 25 Proa.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 111 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

ORIGINAL LITHOGRAPHS, ETCHINGS: Chagall, Miro, Braque. Moderately priced. Send 50c for color-illustrated catalogue. Kirschner, 90-39 36th Avenue, Elmhurst, New York 11373.

PUBLICATIONS

THE CRUCIBLE OF LIFE

by Garry De Young

(The Atheist who brought suit against the State of Delaware to have Bible reading and prayers removed from the public schools of Delaware.)

104 pages of running comments on our contemporary American Scene, this book has already won acclaim in Canada and the author was interviewed over the Canadian Broadcasting station, in response to his astute insights and polemics.

Price $2.00

Order your copy immediately from: Garry De Young, Cass Lake, Minn. 56833

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

What to do until the revolution comes! Read NEW WEST, a radical magazine for political activists. 11 issues, $2.00. Box 2125N, Santa Monica, California 90405.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON N. ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

VACATION

CARIBBEAN HIDEAWAY: Cool, quiet privacy. Near beach. Special deal entire summer. Write: Sassman, Box 757, Carolina, Puerto Rico.

APARTMENTS—UNFURNISHED

Live in a Miles van der Rohe Apartment... adjacent to Branch Brook Park... 25 minutes from Manhattan. Community activities: Little Theatre, newspaper, classes, clubs. Rentals from $89. Request brochure: COLONNADE, Dept. N, 381 Broad, Newark, N.J.

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

AUSTRALIA WANTS YOU! Government assisted passage. Unlimited Opportunities. Latest Government Information $1.00. Austeo, Box 3623-FF, Long Beach, California 90803.

PERSONALS

INCOME TAX RETURNS PREPARED. Washington Heights-Inwood Tax Consulting Service. Specialists in returns for teachers, instructors. 914-735-5113 or SW 5-7315.

Buy Your Books through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to:

THE NATION

Reader's Service Division

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

THE NEW REPUBLIC

Here's what reading The New Republic will do for you...

- give you an independent, authoritative opinion on Vietnam, the New Left, China, the UN, Civil Rights, the new Congress, major world issues.
- keep you abreast of government and politics by TRB's Washington comment, James Ridgeway's in-depth reporting on rebuilding the slums, automobile safety, water and air pollution, Andrew Kopkind's moving articles on the future of black power, Alex Campbell's comprehensive look at Asia...plus many authoritative contributing writers.
- inform you with the prompt (and usually the last) word on theatre by Robert Brustein, movies by Pauline Kael, books and the literary scene by Stanley Kauffmann, music by Robert Evett.
- delight you with satirical cartoons by Bill Mauldin, Jules Feiffer, Robert Osborn.

THE NEW REPUBLIC

Try NR — see for yourself

20 WEEK
TRIAL — $1⁹³

CLIP AND MAIL COUPON TODAY!

Yes! Send me 10 issues of The New Republic. I want to see how 20 weeks with the NR will keep me abreast of things, and I enclose $1.93 (because I know the expense of billing me would preclude the offer).

TO: THE NEW REPUBLIC Subscription Dept. NA
381 West Center St., Marion, Ohio 43302

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY _____ STATE _____ ZIP _____

MAR 21 1967

THEATRE AT YALE JULIUS NOVIKOV

THE LIBRARY
THE NATION

MARCH 20, 1967 35 cents

Draftees Who Say 'No'

LAYING FREEDOM

on the

LINE

PAUL GOOD

A.B.C. and IIT Marriage in Haste

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

South Arabia Nasser and the Sultans

JOE ALEX MORRIS, Jr.

AMERICAN MYSTERIES

CHAMBERS & HISS / DAVID CORT

AMELIA EARHART / CARL DREHER

REMARKABLE CHICAGOANS / RICHARD STERN

UCLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
UCLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

NEWSPAPER N

LETTERS

Mistakes no policy

Williamstown, Mass.

DEAR SIR: Amid some words of wisdom, John McDermott's premise in "Vietnam Is No Mistake" [The Nation, Feb. 13] is, I believe, mistaken. He contends that U.S. victory in the Cuban missile crisis was a "disaster" because it demonstrated that there was "only one international superpower," that "there is no balance of power in the world," and that "America has no power rival in any part of the world." This is quite wrong. Kennedy and Khrushchev faced a reality of a wholly different order. Moscow agreed to withdraw the missiles. Washington agreed not to invade Cuba and to withdraw Jupiter missiles from Turkey. There was no "victory," but a compromise between equals, followed in 1963 by the beginnings of a hopeful American-Soviet détente—prior to death in Dallas.

McDermott's error is compounded by his interpretation of the motives of LBJ & Co., to whom he attributes Realpolitik astuteness in waging war in Vietnam in order to split China and Russia, discredit both and "roll back" Communist power. . . .

This policy is not clever but idiotic. Is Washington "happy with the progress of the Vietnamese War"? When the greatest military power on earth, after years of effort and vast squandering of life and treasure, proves wholly incapable of crushing rebellion in a small, poor country of peasant patriots, what "happiness" accrues to the perpetrators of the crime? . . .

The tragedy is not a product of conspiracy but of stupidity—against which, as Schiller once wrote, "even the gods are helpless." In The Bitter Heritage, Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., poses the issue more accurately: "Vietnam is a triumph of the politics of inadvertence. We have achieved our present entanglement, not after due and deliberate consideration, but through a series of small decisions. . . ."

The McDermott approach will get us nowhere. . . . Americans, if they wish to survive, must somehow convince their leaders that they have made a ghastly blunder which must be rectified. Obfuscation is not helpful in the enterprise.

Frederick L. Schuman

desperate rally

Rochester, Mich.

DEAR SIR: With reference to the letter from W. H. Spooner [The Nation, Feb. 20] advising us "to rally around the President and bury our differences lest we have a Reagan on the national scene," may I suggest that relative madness does not become wisdom simply because it can be contrasted with absolute imbecility? Does Mr. Spooner forget that we have already rallied around Johnson to save ourselves from Goldwater?

Harold Fromm

simply murder

New York City

DEAR SIR: Even if we accept the contention of the Air Force that military installations and military oriented buildings are its only targets in North Vietnam, the fact is that during these raids numbers of civilians are killed, houses destroyed, that despite the "accuracy" of the bombings, many of the bombs are far off target. Now the Air Force knows the logistics of its own maneuvers, knows what percentage of bombs will hit on target, and knows that if these targets are located in populated areas then almost certainly many civilians will be killed. Thus we come to the conclusion that in these raids the Air Force

(Continued on page 372)

EDITORIALS

Should There Be a Draft?

Almost since the cold war was launched with the proclamation of the Truman Doctrine in 1947, it has been impossible to debate the ends of foreign policy. The necessity to stop communism, anywhere and everywhere, answered all questions in advance. We are, however, still privileged to debate means, and the coming controversy over the draft will not only be important in itself but will permit a discussion of the purpose of conscription, and hence of foreign policy in the large.

This twofold debate starts off auspiciously. Both Congress and the White House have released fairly meritorious studies of the manpower situation. There is much unrest and dissatisfaction which will now find expression. With a June 30 target date, only a limited amount of the customary obfuscation and confusion can be tolerated. The debate promises to be clarifying.

The issue in the forefront at this early stage is fairness. Almost everyone wants the draft to be as fair as possible; at least that is the only position that can be taken publicly. Actually, a great many people benefit by the unfairness of the present system. The surest way for a young man, sound in mind and limb, to avoid going to war is to stay in school. Automatically, then, the poor, and especially Negroes, who cannot aspire to higher education, do a disproportionate part of the fighting and dying. Few of the privileged, though aware of the fact, will argue that this is the way it should be. They will have to find other grounds for defending the status quo.

Fairness, however, is not the primary issue. If the draft were not needed at all, there would be no question of fairness or unfairness. The crucial issue is whether we need a mass army: if we don't, we don't need the draft. Obviously we do need a mass army—and a mass navy, and a mass air force—if we are to intervene wherever class warfare breaks out, or communism threatens to take over a country (whether by force or free elections does not really matter).

In fact, by all indications our armed forces are not nearly large enough if we are to continue on this course. In Southeast Asia we have some 500,000 men under arms in three small countries—South Vietnam, Thailand and Laos—with a fourth, North Vietnam, under aerial and artillery bombardment. We have about another 75,000 men offshore in the Seventh Fleet. Since we have had to make this large investment of personnel in a fairly small place, we obviously must have a big army and we must draft young men to fill up the ranks—if our foreign policy is to remain unchanged.

On this assumption, the draft will become a hot political issue. Everything indicates that the middle class will shortly be relieved of its partial exemption. With the prospect of sons being sent to the jungles of Vietnam, many fathers and mothers for whom the war has been a matter of remote concern will now take a personal interest. Many of the prospective draftees who have been shielded by their status as present or future students will have to choose between going to war in a cause in which they do not believe and resisting the draft in one way or another. But, overall, it should be noted that the lottery gimmick—actually a reversion to the method of World War I—together with the priority to be given to 19 year olds, enlarges the pool of eligibles. It lays the ground for an expanded military force—one large enough to fight another world war on the order of the previous ones. We might need 10 million men under arms to thwart the Communists wherever their way of life impinges on the capitalist way.

Thus the debate on the draft may lead to a reconsideration of what Walter Lippmann calls the sovereign issue of our time—whether the interest and duty of the United States is to involve itself in the Vietnams of the future. If present foreign policy is projected into the future, these young men will be needed.

Mr. Johnson's Two-Step

Striving to maintain a balance of sorts between the hawks and the doves, the President takes a step toward one, then a step toward the other. The steps, however, are not of equal length: each move brings him nearer the position of the hawks who, by their nature, are never satisfied and always press for an even less restrained reliance on force. There is no possible equilibrium for Mr. Johnson in this process. Whether he senses it or not, he is walking into grave political danger, and dragging the Democratic Party with him.

What the President must reckon with is the growing frustration in a country whose citizens have been fed for twenty years on cold-war doctrine, on an oversimplified definition of our place in the world, and on the notion that we can lick every other nation with one hand tied behind our back. How is the public to reconcile this world outlook with our inability to conquer a wretched little country of rice paddies cultivated with water buffaloes by illiterate peasants who live in thatched huts? The patience of these Americans, nurtured on advanced technology, space exploration and the mechanized household, is rapidly running out. Unless Mr. Johnson, who plunged them deep into this mess, can come up fairly soon with victory or an "honorable" peace (the two are not far apart), it is Mr. Johnson who will take the rap.

Nor do these dissatisfied citizens lack leadership and advice. They may not be inclined to listen to the moderate voice of Harold Brown, the Secretary of the Air Force, who says with exemplary good sense: "If we should come out as well in Vietnam as we did in the Korean War, I would consider it a great success." How much more exhilarating to pick up U.S. News & World Report

IN THIS ISSUE

March 20, 1967

EDITORIALS

354

ARTICLES

358 South Arabia:

Nasser and the Sultans

Joe Alex Morris, Jr.

361 A.B.C. and ITT:

Marriage in Haste

Robert G. Sherrill

365 Draftees Who Say 'No':

Laying Freedom on the Line

Paul Good

371 Latin America Bans the Bomb

Linda Eder

BOOKS & THE ARTS

373 Of Guilt and Resurrection

David Cort

374 The Lady Vanished

Carl Dreher

376 Farming the Tundra

Richard Stern

378 Playing It by Ear

Bennett Kremen

379 Art

Max Kozloff

381 Theatre

Julius Novick

381 Love (poem)

Gerald Jonas

383 Crossword Puzzle

Frank W. Lewis

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

London
RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Bonn
C. AMERY

Canberra
C. P. FITZGERALD

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1967 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 1434 Westwood Boulevard, Los Angeles, Calif. 90024. Tel.: GR 4-3547. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE
NATION
Combined with FRONTIER

Vol. 204
No. 12

and be told by Gen. John K. Waters, U.S. Army (Ret.), that "the U.S. can do anything in the world that she wants to do—so let's get on with this task and get it cleared up." Or Sen. Richard B. Russell: "I am convinced the use of superior force is the only means by which [Hanoi] can be forced to the conference table. We have the means, and we should not hesitate. . . ." Or Rep. Mendel Rivers: "Flatten Hanoi, if necessary [and] let world opinion fly a kite." Or Gen. Curtis LeMay: "Instead of negotiation, our objective must be to make the war so costly for the Communists that they will end it." Or Barry Goldwater, who calls for intensification of the war "to end it as quickly as possible."

These pressures, contained thus far, will mount and find an outlet, probably via George Wallace's third-party candidacy, catering to hate, fear and frustration, and as a side benefit promising to keep the Negro in his place. On the Republican side, the prospect is for the nomination of a right winger, perhaps Richard Nixon, who masquerades as a middle-of-the-road aspirant but will take on whatever coloration seems to promise the most votes. Nixon may not be hawkish enough to satisfy the voters unhinged by frustration, but the prospect of a Johnson-Nixon-Wallace contest must surely be enough to daunt the minority that still cling to the idea that foreign affairs can be managed with an admixture, at least, of good sense and good will.

When Mr. Johnson began to accelerate the Vietnamese War, he probably did not foresee these consequences. If he had foreseen them, it is difficult to imagine that he would have done what he did. Yet with every passing month his chances of extricating himself grow smaller and smaller. The best chance of ending this miserable war is through the action of forces outside of the White House of such magnitude that the President will have his hand forced, before it is forced by the chauvinists on his right.

A Coalition for Peace

But is it possible? In politics, one must always assess the alignments that are coming apart before one can guess what might become possible in the future. Recent developments support what Sen. George D. Aiken, one of our most level-headed legislators, recently said: ". . . at home the postwar bipartisan consensus, which since World War II enforced the conduct of foreign policy in its important dimensions, has been fragmented. . . . The conduct of foreign policy has become a major source of public unrest and frustration all across the land." Nothing could be more salutary than the breakup of a coalition that, without debate or adequate discussion, has blindly approved cold-war policies for twenty years, allowing successive administrations—Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson—to carry on policy almost independently of Congressional control. The change is important, but can anything positive come of it?

Senator Fulbright's hearings last year, carefully limited in scope and labeled "education," represent the first serious attempt on the part of the Senate to regain some of the power which it had relinquished. Since then, events have unfolded rapidly:

(1) Sen. Joseph S. Clark, in a move as unspectacular as it was astute, proposed a resolution which would limit the commitment of troops in South Vietnam to a number not greatly exceeding those already there, and would instruct the Administration to refrain from military activity over North Vietnam. If the President desired to exceed a troop strength of 500,000 he would have to ask Congress for a declaration of war. To head off Senator Clark's move, Majority Leader Mansfield had to offer a substitute resolution which obliquely indicated dissatisfaction with the war and expressed hopes for peace. However equivocally, some members were trying to get the Senate to assert its independence.

(2) Sen. Robert Kennedy made his speech, and it was steam-rolled by the Administration before the words were out of his mouth. But what Kennedy said was more notable for its background than its content. He had crossed the Rubicon and taken public issue with the President, while carefully avoiding any hint of personal animosity—of which there is a certain amount, especially on the President's part. There will be a further hardening of attitudes. Kennedy cannot retreat; rather, he must look for future chances to press forward.

(3) Then came Senator Aiken's notable speech. The question he has raised is whether a new bipartisan determination to end the war in Vietnam and establish a sensible foreign policy can take the place of the disintegrating coalition. Mr. Johnson has been relying for support principally on a line-up of conservative Republicans and conservative Democrats—a strange alliance for one who insists that he thinks of himself as the heir of Franklin D. Roosevelt. At the same time, the sharpest divisions are emerging in the President's own party. The conservative Democrats are at least as far from the left-of-Center Democrats as the latter are from the conservative Republicans. Javits and Kennedy are closer on Vietnam than, say, Richard Russell and Kennedy. A newcomer like Percy of Illinois, seeing the debate with a fresh viewpoint, in effect supported Kennedy. These tendencies are indicative of future agreements which the war is likely to bring about.

If the Republicans had the wit and courage to nominate a team in 1968 that would offer a tangible hope of peace, Democrats would desert Lyndon Johnson in droves. Even without such a development, with both parties divided, a coalition for peace is not a mere figment of the imagination. It must begin with like-minded individuals collaborating on key issues. They face a common peril and are offered a common opportunity. It is not impossible, then, that concerted action will develop to repudiate a policy that has reached a dead end.

The Brassy Trumpet

Maxwell D. Taylor is no ordinary retired general. He does not explode with screwball ideas like the Air Force general, now deceased, who pleaded at a service club luncheon to be allowed to bomb the atom bomb installations of the Soviet Union. Taylor is a gentleman, a diplomat and strategist, and an author. His book, The Uncertain Trumpet, had considerable influence in hardening U.S. foreign policy. Consequently his short work, Responsibility and Response ($3.50 for 84 pages) cannot be dismissed as mere bombast. It must be taken seriously as a possible forecast of America's role in the world; so construed, it will arouse forebodings in all but the most maniacal hawks among us.

In Taylor's world outlook the non-American nations are divided into three categories: revolutionaries or, more generally, "troublemakers," to be forcibly held in check by American military power; "victims" of the troublemakers to be defended militarily and economically; and would-be "bystanders" who are obligated to help us suppress the troublemakers. While the arch-troublemakers are of course Communists, other types are included. Taylor's book was derived from lectures he delivered some time ago and Sukarno of Indonesia is included among the troublemakers; so is Nasser of Egypt, who deals with the USSR when it suits his purposes but permits no Communist movement in his realm.

Taylor believes, quite simply, in the American mission to police the world during the calculable future. Where Metternich aspired only to curb revolution in Europe, Taylor sees the world as our counterrevolutionary responsibility. We have the weapons, but do we have the will? The possible weakness of the latter is his principal worry. As an afterthought, he concedes that there may be practical limits to our power. One would think that his own failure in Vietnam, and the present stalemate there, would enjoin more prudence on his strategic theorizing, but the effect is slight.

That Taylor's view remains a powerful influence in Washington is shown by President Johnson's directive of less than a year ago, creating the little-known Senior Interdepartmental Group (SIG) at a time when the National Security Council was falling into desuetude. SIG's chairman is the Under Secretary of State; the other members are the Deputy Secretary of Defense, the Administrator of the Agency for International Development, the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, the Director of the U.S. Information Agency and a White House liaison man. SIG, in Taylor's words, is to have jurisdiction over "all those activities abroad which involve more than one department or agency, or which are of such nature as to affect significantly the overall United States program in a country or of a region."

The power of SIG and the influence of General Taylor, its architect, may dismay some Americans, but in many quarters it is a welcome proclamation of American strength. Roger Lewis, president and chairman of General Dynamics, one of the biggest government contractors, is one of those who approve. General Dynamics has had its ups and downs, the principal financial tribulation being the loss of $470 million in the production of the Convair 880 and 990 jet airliners in the early sixties. Since then, General Dynamics has stuck to war goods. In Forbes (December 1, 1966), Lewis expresses views complementing those of Taylor. There used to be an enemy to focus on, he points out—the Germans in World War II, for instance. "Today," he continues, "there is no such focus. The tensions of the world are continually changing, and in the midst of all these changes, this country is forever getting richer and, in relative terms, smaller. The real enemy, then, is not going to be some specific people but a condition of hunger or poverty or despair." Forbes comments that our future enemies, on this premise, are not people but conditions "which can come into being in one country almost as easily as in another." And the moral drawn from this entirely accurate observation is not that we should attack the causes of poverty but that we should continue to arm ourselves against the poor—who will always, and everywhere, be with us.

Reviewing Responsibility and Response in Book Week (February 12), Malcolm W. Browne comments that by transforming Taylor's ideas into a working Executive body, President Johnson has moved foreign affairs and war one step further from the American people, and of course from Congress, which is supposed to represent the people, especially in intervals when the President does not. Browne sees Taylor's book as posing what foreign nations—and many Americans—have come to regard as "The American Problem."

The Wrong Symbol

It is late in the day to call attention to the essential crassness of the National Book Awards, whose eighteenth annual presentation ceremony took place on March 8. An awards ceremony is predictable; those expecting truth, poetry or passion should take their business elsewhere. But to have invited Vice President Humphrey as the principal speaker was the kind of obvious mistake the distinguished members of the Awards Advisory Committee and the Boards of Judges cannot be excused for allowing to occur. (If their plea is powerlessness, so much the worse for the nature of the occasion.) At its best, the invitation can be seen only as an effort to ignore the despair and rage over our government's conduct in Vietnam felt by a significant number of intellectuals and artists. At its worst, it was an attempt to use the publishing community as part of the patina of "consensus" which gilded the proceedings at Lincoln Center. Fifty to 100 writers, editors and publishers walked out of the audience for the duration of the Vice President's speech; they refused to play a part in an act of deliberate evasion.

Nobody cares to spoil a party, or turn down a prize, or be rude to one's host, and that no like gesture came from the platform is understandable. Vice President Humphrey unnecessarily reminded the audience that the walkout represented one of our free-speech prerogatives, and he used his speech to extol the safely stirring works of Mark Twain, Thomas Paine and Jefferson, among others. Nothing wrong there.

And nothing wrong either with the quality of the books that did receive the awards. If the party turned out to be a troubled one, it was because of the symbol represented by the Vice Presidential office in a period of violent intellectual dissent. Under the circumstances, the choice of speaker was an incredibly insensitive one.

'The Quintessential Harry'

The tributes paid to Henry Luce were, of course, a just and fair measure of the remarkable position he had come to occupy in the roster of the great American journalists. The tributes, which ranged from fair to fulsome, reflected a nearly unanimous feeling that Luce possessed a quality of prevision which, in retrospect, had added an extra dimension to his stature. Although not expressly stated, it was as though the course of events had vindicated his conception of America's role in the world. And of course it had.

"The quintessential Harry," as Newsweek pointed out, was Luce the Imperialist. Not only did he greatly admire Theodore Roosevelt but he was "forthrightly and unashamedly an American imperialist—first, last and always. . . ." Among imperialists, the frank, no-nonsense types are always preferable to those who mask their objectives in pious rhetoric. One can be grateful that Luce never made the slightest pretense of being anything other than what he was—an old-style, hard-nosed imperialist. He never attempted to conceal his personal views or to deny his prejudices. And who today, reflecting on his career, will say that he was not a prophet?

In a famous Life editorial on "The American Century," written in 1941, he said that it was time "to accept wholeheartedly our duty and our opportunity as the most powerful and vital nation in the world and in consequence to exert upon the world the full impact of our influence, for such purposes as we see fit and by such means as we see fit." No ambiguity there. At the time, this kind of plain-speaking grated harshly on ears attuned to the rhetoric of Roosevelt and Willkie and Wallace. The applause was not deafening and there were even catcalls. But a quarter century of dedication to the pursuit of cold-war policies has toughened us; we are not as sensitive to the moral implications of policy as we were then. Today we are not particularly affronted by "the arrogance of power." We no longer draw back from the suggestion that it is not merely our right but our clear duty to police the world.

Not only did Henry Luce have a realistic prevision of the postwar world but he put the resources of the journalistic empire he had created at the service of the New American Imperium. He did not hitch his wagon to a star—he put its weight behind the juggernaut of American power. In this sense he picked the right time to die: when it seemed as though his ideas had triumphed and before the consequences of this triumph could return to haunt him.

SOUTH ARABIA

NASSER AND THE SULTANS

JOE ALEX MORRIS, Jr.

Mr. Morris is Middle East correspondent for the Los Angeles Times. He has been reporting from the Arab world over the past fifteen years.

Beirut

Sometime soon, possibly before the end of 1967, the British will have pulled out of South Arabia, a vast desert backwater bigger than the United Kingdom itself, which stretches around the southern rim of the oil-rich Arabian peninsula from the Yemen to the feudal sultanate of Muscat and Oman. The withdrawal has already begun. As of January 1, no more British service families are being sent to South Arabia, and the huge military housing ghetto built by enterprising merchants on reclaimed land in the heart of Aden crown colony is slowly emptying.

The British decision to get out is provoking civil disorder in the area. Financed by the Egyptians and operating from the sanctuary of Republican Yemen, terrorists are daily throwing bombs in Aden. In the trackless back country that used to be called the West Aden Protectorate and is now the South Arabian Federation, wild, dissident tribesmen ambush patrols and shoot up the picturesque Beau Geste forts that dot the barren mountains and dry river beds. At present, two groups appear to be responsible for the bulk of the violence: the Front for the Liberation of South Yemen (FLOSY), which operates out of Yemen with Egyptian support; and the National Liberation Front, which lost its support from Cairo when it refused to merge with FLOSY. The two groups, thought to be working under an uneasy truce, use terrorist tactics to upset British plans to launch the South Arabian Federation. Further trouble is expected with the arrival of a UN mission within the next few weeks.

The situation resembles Palestine before the British withdrawal in 1948, only this time Arab will be fighting Arab, instead of Arabs against Jews. Casualties are fairly high: 363 killed in 1965 and 1966, including twenty-nine British servicemen. But it was not the cost in human lives but the critical economic situation facing Great Britain that dictated the pull-out.

Why all the bloodshed if the British are serious about leaving, as they certainly seem to be? The answer, at least in Arab nationalist eyes, is that while the Union Jack may well be hauled down some sunny day, the devious plotters in Whitehall don't give up that easily. The whole structure of the South Arabian Federation, in which sixteen nominally independent sheikdoms and Aden have joined together, is to the nationalist a heinous British scheme to perpetuate their rule through feudal back-country sultans who are at their beck and call.

Naturally, the British and the aforementioned sultans look at the situation somewhat differently. To them, the Egyptian-inspired terrorism is nothing less than a prelude to a Nasserite take-over attempt in South Arabia the moment the British are gone. There is an element of truth in both views. For that reason, the crown colony of Aden, with 285,000 people the largest single element in the Federation and vastly more advanced than the hinterland, had to be dragooned into joining the Federation. The result so far has been that for months past the colony has lived under emergency rule with all normal legislative and executive functions scrapped. Hardly, one might say, good training for the independence which is just around the corner.

Like it or not, Aden is now committed to the struggle on the side of the sultans, but not all of South Arabia has taken the plunge. The most important state to stand aloof from the Federation is Qa'iti, the largest in all South Arabia, with an estimated 300,000 people in an area the size of Pennsylvania. Because Qa'iti completely dominates the other two states in the old Eastern Protectorate, all three have stayed as far as possible away from the muddle going on to the west.

The reasons for this abstention have been numerous. One was pure avarice: Pan American was searching for oil in the east at the time the Federation was taking shape, and the rulers there were not eager to put themselves into a situation where they would have to share the prospective loot with the westerners. Another motive was self-preservation. There was a strong feeling—so far it has held good—that the eastern states would be spared Egyptian-inspired terrorism as long as they did not commit themselves to the Federation. A third factor was national feeling. The core of the Eastern Protectorate is the Hadhramut, a potentially rich and occasionally fertile valley that stretches some 300 miles through the barren mountains. It has that special evolutionary combination of promise and uncertainty which produces unusual people. It is the graveyard of legendary kingdoms that go back into prehistory; it was a rich prize in the Queen of Sheba's days, and she was but one of many who coveted the valley. It produced art, sculpture and civilization, and an outward-looking community of traders and soldiers of fortune. The Hadhramut gives the eastern section of South Arabia a special sense of identity, and its people set themselves apart from those of the west, whom they look upon as Yemenis, no matter what the British and the sultans say.

Hadhramis have settled all over the eastern world, making merchant fortunes in Indonesia, Malay and elsewhere. Mercenary soldiers from the region were the Hessians of the east: until his fall from power the Nizam of Hyderabad recruited them exclusively for his private army. Nobody ever kept count, but authorities in the capital, Mukalla, figure there is one Hadhrami abroad for every two at home. In short, a resourceful and imaginative people. Like the Yemenis but unlike most Arabs of the peninsula, the Hadhramis work hard and are not afraid to soil their hands. The valley today displays the monuments to their skills and sweat, whether the spectacular mud skyscrapers of Shibam or the palatial residences, some with swimming pools, of retired merchant grandees who accumulated their wealth in far-off lands and came home to die.

Reasonably prosperous on its overseas remittances, splendidly isolated, and not particularly inconvenienced by the warring influence of the British Raj, Qa'iti could have gone on forever had not the outside world rudely intervened. This began in a negative way in the 1950s, when emergent nationalisms in Indonesia, East Africa and elsewhere began to slow down the streams of money coming back home. Estimates vary, but émigrés from the Hadhramut were probably sending back $10 million yearly. This flood tide is now down to a trickle, the bulk of which comes from Hadhramis working in the oil fields of Saudi Arabia and the Persian Gulf.

Another intrusion has been commercial. Mukalla, a dramatic town nestled between the Arabian Sea and the barren red-brown mountains, currently suffers from horrendous traffic jams in its narrow unpaved streets where a few years ago there was no problem at all. The cars and trucks are all Japanese; the automobile age has come to Qa'iti because the Japanese, eager to break into a British preserve, offered local dealers fantastic credit terms with no repayment for two years. People buy cars despite the fact that there is no place to go beyond the immediate environs of Mukalla: even the road to the airport crosses soft sand and requires a jeep.

But really important outside penetration is political. Independence is hardly more than a year away and the winds of political change are beginning to blow up strong. To an outsider, this may seem odd, Qa'iti being generally thought of as a flyblown backwater. The fact is, however, that its citizens enjoy more political freedom than do Arabs of any independent state except Lebanon. Newspapers of every political view and from all over the Arab world circulate freely, and pictures of Gamal Abdel Nasser adorn every other shop front. Whatever else may be said about the heritage of British colonialism, it offers more freedom of expression than do those who succeed it in the name of freedom.

The other side of the coin, at least in Qa'iti, is that the British have done little to prepare the citizenry for independence, aside from providing direct subsidies to keep the administrative machinery and security forces going. The people of Mukalla, not the British, raised the money for the city's telephone and electricity system, and generally the same holds true throughout the Hadhramut. One reason for this is that as long as it was comfortable to do so, the British looked upon both the protectorates as just that—areas in which they had defense and advisory treaties with the local rulers, but in which, at least theoretically, they did not mess in domestic affairs. This attitude changed only when the Yemen revolution of 1962, together with Britain's steadily deteriorating economic and international position, made it clear that sooner or later South Arabia would have to stand on its own feet or sink beneath the rising tide of nationalism. That South Arabia had no oil and that modern military transport techniques made the Aden base obsolete were other factors.

Because Qa'iti stayed out of the South Arabian Federation, it doesn't fit any pattern developing for the future. Those who feel the Federation to be basically unstable—and their number is not small—think this a gain for Qa'iti. The sultans of the Federation, who have chosen to stand and fight together, are convinced it means that the Eastern Protectorate will be the first to fall under Nasser's influence. This would affect not only them but the Sultanate of Muscat and Oman on the east, where significant oil discoveries have been made and are just now coming into production, and where the back country is in a near-chronic state of dissension.

The sultans could be right. Once the British leave, the Eastern states will either have to scratch up another $1.4 million annually or disband the famed Hadhramut Bedouin Legion, one of the last colonial barefoot brigades and the principal instrument of maintaining such order as exists in the whole region. More important, Qa'iti is coming of political age with an archaic system of government which continues only because British authority is just a few hours' flying time away at the big Aden base. The base too is due to be disbanded by 1968 at the latest, and the British are already reinforcing their limited garrisons in the gulf—where the oil is.

The Qa'iti system is nominally headed by His Highness Sultan Ghalib bin Awad al-Qa'iti. Sultan Ghalib is a stripling of 18, who succeeded to the silver-embossed Nepalese settee that serves as a throne last October when his father died. A soft-eyed youth whose mother is an Indian, he really wanted to go up to Oxford and continue playing the cricket he learned at prep school in England. The Indian connection is not accidental. The sultan's great-grandfather commanded the Nizam of Hyderabad's army, and the family has been based as much in India as in Arabia. Ghalib spoke Urdu before he spoke English. He learned Arabic as a teen-ager, and still speaks it with an Indian accent.

In Qa'iti this is not resented as much as it might be elsewhere. The Hadhramis, thanks to their roving ways, have lost much of the xenophobia that characterizes most Arabs. Ghalib has taken to wearing the flowing Arab headdress instead of the Indian-style turban affected by his predecessors, but rumor has it that his mother still plans to marry him off to a suitable Indian girl. One gets the feeling that she'd better hurry. Even if the sultan's nominal authority survives and becomes real after independence, it is Arab and not Indian nationalism that will shape the future of his state.

This course is evident not only from the ubiquitous pictures of Nasser but from the shape of the politics now developing in the Hadhramut. Two parties have reached what might be called the incubating stage, and they reflect the major reality in Arab politics today, the confrontation of the Arab radicals who look to Nasser and the conservatives who rally around King Feisal of Saudi Arabia. The Nasserites in Qa'iti are lumped together in the Arab Socialist party, which claims a membership of some 7,000. The conservative faction is the Saudi-supported South Arabian League, which is active throughout the two protectorates.

Or, rather, it was. The League has been banned in Qa'iti, following two demonstrations against the party. In the first, which happened at an up-country town, a leading member of the party leaned out of a window of his house and fired a rifle at the demonstrators, wounding four. The second incident occurred in Mukalla where, incredibly, the same sort of provocation produced a similar reaction. In that case, however, a member of the party threw a grenade at demonstrators from the roof of the party offices, killing one and injuring forty-five. This was too much for the local authorities. They moved in and arrested party leaders, thirty-five of whom are now on trial. They also found caches of grenades and arms and a list of party members. The total membership was reported to be 160, which didn't say much for King Feisal's powers of persuasion or for his money. The meager count may eventually hurt the party more than the trials and official ban.

Qa'iti State thus enters a time of transformation in parlous, dubious shape to govern itself. The ruler is 18, the British are leaving, the Nasserites are strong and what appeared to be the only organized opposition to them is in disgrace.

Whatever happens in Qa'iti will most certainly be paralleled in the two smaller states of the Eastern Protectorate; the future there may or may not take shape independently of the convulsions already plaguing the Western Protectorate and Aden. The Hadhramis, being a proud and independent people with some resources of their own, may eventually come up with a national solution of their own, independent of both King Feisal and President Nasser. But the cards do not lie that way now.

The clearest sign of what is to come is found in the attitude of the former Grand Vizier of Qa'iti, a suave and distinguished man of 43, named Ahmed al-Atass, who has served the state for twenty-three years. "I'm thinking of retiring," he said recently. "I feel sorry for the Sultan. He won't find the kind of man who can replace me soon." Al-Atass reflects the general political malaise in the state. "After years of British mistakes, it's not easy to change policy here," he says. Another sign was the collapse of recent attempts to elect a municipal council in Mukalla. The elections had to be canceled because the required number of candidates failed to present themselves.

Though Qa'iti is the largest and most populous of all the South Arabian states, what happens there will not shake the world. But it will be watched closely as a portent of things to come elsewhere. From the Yemen around the southern rim of the peninsula to Bahrain in the Persian Gulf, Britain today holds similar sheikdoms and sultanates in protective treaty relationships. Some, containing huge and largely undeveloped oil reserves, are vital to Britain's economic life line. The Saudis know this, and King Feisal is said to be prepared to spend what he must to keep Nasserite influence out of the region. But if his efforts in Qa'iti are any indication, it will be another case of too little and too late.

A.B.C. & ITT: MARRIAGE in HASTE

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington, D.C.

The American Broadcasting Company, the third largest television network in the country, and the International Telephone and Telegraph Co., the world's largest manufacturer of telecommunications products (the ninth largest employer in the world), are now in the throes of merger, and the spectacle is about as fascinatingly unsightly and dangerous as two elephants mating on a rolling railroad flatcar. The blame for any lack of decorum lies not with either A.B.C. or ITT but with the Federal Communications Commission.

There have been so many lapses and omissions, so much secrecy and haste, in the handling of this immensely important transaction that the Federal Communications Commission deserves U.S. Sen. Gaylord Nelson's recent description: "just another regulatory agency that has become a willing tool of the industry it is supposed to regulate."

The actual consummation of the merger—the biggest ever processed through the FCC, and also certainly one of the most controversial—has been held up temporarily while the U.S. Justice Department bickers with the FCC majority in an effort to get the commission to reopen the case and reconsider it from the antitrust and profiteering position. This is certainly not an unreasonable request by the Justice Department. There's enough bigness involved, and enough rumors about ITT's wanting to bleed A.B.C. of both money and imagery (the companies allege that the life-giving flow would be in the opposite direction), to make it a legitimate study for Washington's antitrust sleuths.

There may be some good reasons for permitting the merger, but the FCC majority—Chairman Rosel H. Hyde, Robert E. Lee, Lee Loevinger and James J. Wadsworth—has made not the slightest effort to find out what they are. As soon as ITT and A.B.C. said they were engaged, these four commissioners said go ahead. Never mind hearings or evidence of public need, marry away! It was the most forward display of submission to special interests that Washington has seen for some time.

Nevertheless, the episode has a bright side of sorts. Though it may not do any practical good, at least the public got some good blows in from the minority dissent (Kenneth Cox, Robert T. Bartley, Nicholas Johnson) and especially from Johnson, the remarkable young man who until recently, as Maritime commissioner, was beginning to bring some order to that shattered industry, and who now, as the newest FCC commissioner, brings to a usually calloused agency a real voice of outrage.

Last fall, when the FCC was going through the charade of "deciding" whether or not to permit the merger, Johnson, Cox and Bartley pressed ITT with a list of questions. Among them was this one:

"Suppose ITT owned a large telephone utility in a developing country ruled by a military government and

A.B.C. news had prepared a documentary series on the poverty and repression in the country. Suppose further that the government in question then said to ITT: 'Either kill the news series detrimental to our government or face action adverse to your telephone utility, action which may include discriminatory taxes, canceled contracts or, if necessary, expropriation.' How would ITT react in such a situation?"

That question, along with a lot of other cutting ones, still has not been answered, or the answers have not been made public. Mostly the questions revolve around possible conflict of interest. Could A.B.C. be expected to produce a slashing documentary in opposition to loan sharks? (ITT owns Aetna Finance Company, which has 227 small loan offices.) Could we look for some tough reporting from A.B.C. in regard to profiteering by the insurance industry? (ITT owns most or all of the Alexander Hamilton Life Insurance Co. and the American Universal Life Insurance Company, and half of the Great International Life Insurance Company.) Would A.B.C. be allowed to editorialize in favor of mellow relations with Russia? (ITT set up the Moscow "hot line," the Distant Early Warning Communication system and communications for NATO and SHAPE.)

But the stickiest questions of all arise from ITT's foreign entanglements, which it has had from its beginnings a generation ago as a holding company for telegraph and telephone firms in Puerto Rico and Cuba. Today ITT has significant holdings in forty countries. Some of them are not pleasant places to do business, but ITT survives by going along with the ruling cliques and by encouraging the United States Government to do likewise.

At a 1964 stockholders' meeting, ITT President Harold S. Geneen is reported to have observed:

"Recent events in Brazil have dramatically supported an improving turn of events there, and I draw your attention to the significance of President Johnson's recognition of the new Brazilian Government, in line with what may well be known in the future as the 'Mann Doctrine,' after our assistant secretary of Latin American affairs, who recommended it." He said that the U.S.'s recognition of the Brazilian dictators "considerably strengthened . . . the security of all our operations in underdeveloped countries."

On the same occasion he is reported to have said: "Finally, there is the very important basic policy of the U.S. Government, expressed by Congress in the Hickenlooper amendment to the AID program, which has increasingly aligned the U.S. Government with those countries that show integrity in their handling of invested properties of the U.S. shareholders."

ITT has had property expropriated in Brazil and seven other countries, and it has become hypersensitive to the whims of Latin American tyrants. Perhaps it can't be blamed for that, but it makes all the more pertinent the question put four months ago:

What would ITT do if A.B.C. worked up a documentary that offended the government of Brazil, and Brazil said "kill it or we'll put your Companhia Telefonica Nacional out of business"? ITT also owns telephone companies in Chile and Peru. It has companies that manufacture, sell and service telephones and electronic equipment in Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Ecuador, El Salvador and Venezuela, not to mention seven manufacturing plants in friendly Mexico, which doesn't push around Yankee investors as it once did. ITT has had property expropriated by Castro in Cuba. To what extent would it permit A.B.C. newscasters to say even an oblique kind word for Castro?

It would be helpful to know who are the ten top ITT stockholders in each country where it does business. The minority commissioners asked for this information, and presumably got it, but the FCC refuses—by a vote of 4 to 3—to make the list public. It would be interesting to identify, for instance, the top ten stockholders in Germany, a country in which one ITT subsidiary alone manufactures and sells more than $60 million worth of goods each year. Are there any ties interlocking with, say, Krupp? The public should know.

Commissioner Johnson made the point in his dissenting brief that the 1934 Communications Act has a section aimed specifically at ITT; it forbids granting a station license to "any alien or the representative of any alien, any foreign government or the representative thereof, or any corporation organized under the laws of any foreign government. . . ."

With some justification, surely, Johnson wonders where that puts the legality of the ITT-A.B.C. merger since, from a proxy statement filed in February, 1965, it is known that ITT agreed to let the Chilean Government buy up to 49 per cent of the common stock of ITT's Chilean telephone subsidiary. The Chilean Government names three of the company's directors.

Furthermore:

ITT owns 13 per cent of the shares of Indian Telephone Industries, Ltd. The Indian Government owns more than 75 per cent of that company. ITT has a 20 per cent slice of a French telecommunications research company. The French Government is the majority stockholder. ITT owns 5.5 per cent of a Swedish company. The Swedish Government owns 50 per cent of the same company.

So at least four foreign governments consider themselves business associates of the future owner of America's third-ranking radio and television network. These foreign countries can also consider themselves at least distant partners in the ownership of 400 movie theatres in thirty-four states, inasmuch as Paramount Theaters is a subsidiary of A.B.C.

Commissioner Johnson also suggested that at least a whiff of illegality (based on the 1934 law) is arising from the fact that "three ITT officials are members of foreign legislative bodies, two of the British House of Lords and one of the French National Assembly. Another is a former premier of Belgium. And several have positions with ministries of foreign governments or as officials of government-owned industries." Johnson is quick to admit that he does not know all the foreign governmental ties of ITT, and he offers these only as "a hint" of the total involvement abroad.

Just recently, Trygve Lie, first secretary general of the United Nations, was elected to a six-man board of Standard Telefon Og Kabelfabrikk, a Norwegian subsidiary of ITT. John Birch Society members may be uneasy watching A.B.C. news, knowing that one fractional element of the parent company is staffed by such a famous one-worlder. But they will probably be no more uneasy than the "doves" who will view A.B.C. news in the knowledge that 25 per cent of ITT's income (about $500 million) is from U.S. defense and space contracts. And when A.B.C. gives three or four hours to following a capsule flight, from countdown to splash-down, can it be considered altogether a public service, undiluted by any effort to sell the public on the worthiness of ITT's space business?

Of course, executives of both A.B.C. and ITT solemnly affirm that ITT-A.B.C. will in no way be influenced by its Pentagon-NASA foreign income, but their assurances often recall former Secretary of Defense Charles Wilson's definition of "what's good for" the country. At the FCC hearings, the following exchange occurred between Commissioner Johnson and John Mc-

Cone, former head of the Central Intelligence Agency, and now on the ITT board of directors. Italics are added:

JOHNSON: I presume in your relations with your companies abroad and income abroad you are obviously concerned with the interest of those nations where you have plants, aren't you?

McCONE: Very much so.

JOHNSON: And you try to work closely with those governments in maintaining good relations with them?

McCONE: Yes. That is important not only from the standpoint of ITT, but it is also important from the standpoint of the interests of the United States Government. In that regard, the interests of the government and the interests of the company are parallel. . . .

JOHNSON: But do you see any possibility that there might sometime be an instance in which A.B.C. would want to do a public affairs documentary on an issue involving a foreign country and its relations with the United States, that the interests of ITT might be somewhat different from those the A.B.C. producer would like to represent?

McCONE: No, I couldn't imagine that. . . . I think the problem here would be whether such a program would be in the national interest, in the interest of informing the public, in the interest of supporting maybe, things that this country wants to accomplish: certainly not in programing in the interest of some foreign activity of ITT. I couldn't imagine that.

And a little later, when Johnson requested McCone's comment on the fact that "the interests of ITT are served by maintaining public interest in the space program," McCone hewed to the same line of patriotism: "I would question very much whether an A.B.C. producer would support the space program because of the benefits to ITT. I think if he was going to support the space program he would support it because it was in the national interest to do so . . . certainly, as director of ITT, this is the only reason I would support the space program, that it was in the national interest, not in the special interest of the corporation."

Two members of ITT's board will sit on A.B.C.'s board, four members of A.B.C.'s board will sit on ITT's board, but McCone insists that they can keep their hats straight.

When Leonard M. Goldenson, president of A.B.C., testified, Johnson challenged him to mention one time when A.B.C. had put on a program which risked irritating members of its board of directors. After some thought, Goldenson said that Howard K. Smith had put on a documentary about Nixon which had offended some board members and some stockholders. This evoked from Johnson the dry reply that while he commended Goldenson for "your courage" in putting on a program involving Nixon, he would prefer to have an example of a public affairs program "directed against some substantial economic interest, which is what we are really talking about here."

Goldenson could not recall a program of that type. Nor could he remember any National Broadcasting Company program that attacked the economic interests of the Radio Corporation of America (RCA), which owns N.B.C.

Goldenson, like McCone, repeatedly stated his conviction that A.B.C. would not bow to the economic interests of ITT. But Commissioner Kenneth Cox observed that Goldenson had not always been so sure of A.B.C.'s adamancy in the face of economic pressures. "I hope it is not a breach of confidence," said Cox, "but I think once in a private conversation you said you did not think it desirable to have people on A.B.C.'s board of directors who have interest in products advertised on A.B.C. television."

Throughout the two days of hearings, the minority commissioners tried to get some guarantee of objectivity from the A.B.C. and ITT executives, but no tangible guarantee was forthcoming, and the more the commissioners pressed the point, the angrier the merging executives became. It was a classic standoff of sincerity: one side sincerely gave its word that it would be objective; the other side sincerely regretted that a promise was not sufficient assurance where temptation ran into the billions of dollars.

But, in any case, this was all meaningless jousting, a useless waste of tempers. The merger had been sewed up for months. The directors of both companies agreed to terms on February 14, 1966, and within four months the trade press was writing that the majority of the Federal Communications Commission was ready to approve. The majority of the commissioners had not even wanted to hold a public hearing; it had wanted to approve the merger before the slow-moving Justice Department cranked itself into motion and began to study the anti-trust features of the transaction. "The majority's treatment of this case, in my judgment, makes a mockery of the public responsibility of a regulatory commission that is perhaps unparalleled in the history of American administrative process," Commissioner Johnson wrote in his dissent. "From the outset, the outcome of this case has been a foregone conclusion."

When, grudgingly, the commission majority agreed to brief hearings, the Justice Department did not send a representative. There was nobody there to speak for the public's interest. Three members of the commission majority asked ITT and A.B.C. officials no questions; the fourth majority member spent his time abusing a member of the FCC staff for testifying that the commission should move slowly and carefully because "the transaction you are asked to approve eclipses in size and surpasses in importance any other transfer of broadcast interests the commission has yet been called upon to consider," and kept stressing the point that it was the acquisition of "one of the most powerful mass media extant—a major national radio and television network and seventeen radio and television broadcast stations—by one of the largest and most highly diversified corporate complexes in existence." The commission majority was unimpressed.

The role of Assistant Attorney General Donald F. Turner's antitrust division in the case has not been impressive. As usual, it took too long getting started in its investigation; and then, when it was common knowledge that the commission was about to approve the merger (Morton Mintz told exactly what the FCC would do in a story in The Washington Post on November 2, three weeks before the commission acted), Turner kept dawdling. Finally, on November 21, he issued an equivocal warning to the commission of possible antitrust implications in the case. Even this tepid warning was enough to precipitate action. The letter from Turner arrived at the FCC offices after the 6 P.M. closing, and yet the commission approved the merger before 10 A.M. the next day.

Now, because Turner became furious at being insulted in this way and has since been demanding that the commission reopen the hearings—and because there is talk in the House Small Business Committee and in the Senate Small Business Monopoly Subcommittee and the Senate Antitrust Subcommittee of possible investigations—the commission has agreed to consider any new evidence the Justice Department may want to present.

But this is not likely to change the commission's decision, and there is a very good chance that the Justice Department's "help" will now only steer the argument away from where it belongs. It would, after all, be difficult to prove that the merger would reduce competition. If the merger of RCA and N.B.C. did not noticeably reduce competition, neither would the merger of another electronics manufacturer with another network.

Some good will come from the merger. A.B.C. President Goldenson estimated that his stock in the company will increase in value by about $1 million. And ITT President Geneen will have a more widely publicized corporation, something that he has wanted ever since he took over ITT in 1959. He has repeatedly deplored ITT's lack of image. "You can stop fifteen people in the street and not one will know what ITT is," he said. "That bothers me."

